START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-023

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 23

Volume 45

BSO
Pops
1924

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 45

BSO
Pops

1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES,
CAL.
TIMES
MAR 7 - 1924

To Conduct Symphony

GEORGE SCHNEEVOIGHT, of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city. He is one of the best of continental leaders, having received engagements all over Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 13 1924

Symphony Orchestra To Feature Wagner

Especial Interest Expressed In Composition, "A Siegfried Idyl" To Be Played

There is particular interest at the moment in Wagner's, "A Siegfried Idyl" in that the composer wrote this score from themes in the music drama of that name to be performed on the first birthday of his son, Siegfried, who is now visiting in this Country and conducting our principal orchestras. This number is prominent on the striking and beautiful program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in City Hall auditorium, this City, Wednesday evening, March 26.

The Ride of the Walkyries, one of the finest instances of descriptive music, is still another Wagnerian work which will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland. The fact that these two numbers are so well known to local patrons who have frequently heard them as Lemare transcriptions for the organ, will enhance their interest. Brahms' First Symphony will be the principal piece of the coming concert, the wonders of this score being too numerous to mention. The program also will be featured by several novelties and tone poems.

The Music Commission will give prompt attention to mail orders for reserved seats. These should be sent to Room 59 City Hall, Portland, care of the Music Commission and checks should be made payable to the same.

SOMEBODY EVERY 25

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 12 1924

Margaret Matzenhauer Here With the Boston Orchestra

Pierre Monteaux conducted the Boston Symphony in an all Wagner program at the Acadamy of Music last night. He chose the Prelude to "The Meistersinger," A Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's Narrative in Act I of Tristac and Isolde, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser", the Ride of the Valkjries, Waldweben from "Siegfried" and Brunnhilde's Immolation scene from "Gotterdammeung".

So perfect is the unity between Pierre Monteaux and his orchestra, that one hesitates to say he conducts. It is almost as if he were an inseperable part of the orchestral body which took its being and living from his motion. Each conductor puts his individual stamp upon his work, and Monteaux is best recognizzed by delicacy; the most delicate perception of phrasing, an almost scholarty regard for delicacy of mood variation. Sometimes one can see him making a scale of his orchestra upon which he weighs each tone with the greatest care.

He conducted "The Meistersinger" with a fine regard of melodic continuity. Monteaux's scale is made to hold vast weight and in Isolde's Narrative he burdened it with great passion and knowing sorrow. With the Bacchanale he did wild, strangely beautiful things. And yet, he had an undercurrent of darkness and longing there which was uncanny in its contrast. Walweben was Spring, and nothing more can be said.

Margaret Matzenhauer was soloist with the Boston Symphony. She was a dramatic Bruanhilde, giving a Valtyne of great sweep and power. Her voice gave a wonderful suggestion of flight and freedom and wild exultation.

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 5 1924

MONTEUX FOR LAST TIME IN PORTLAND

Will Make Farewell Visit to Portland with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Closing Municipal Concert Course

Not only Portland but Lewiston and Auburn musical people are anxious to be present at the "farewell visit" of Pierre Monteux to Portland, when he comes with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Portland City Hall, March 26.

They had read with regret that at the completion of this Winter of his fifth season, Mr. Monteux will be succeded by Serge Koussexitzky of Russia, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra. He has already established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country and during the last three years has made a name for himself in Western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

The past year has been called the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it will not soon be forgotten that the superb of orchestra of today is the creation of Pierre Monteux. The audience now booking in will show him, if proof is needed, how warmly is is regarded by his admirers in Maine.

Mail orders for seats are being received at Room 59, City Hall auditorium, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OTTAWA
CANADA
ISSUE OF
MAR 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS STRAVINSKY.

One of the most remarkable musical scores of the twentieth century is "Le Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring) by Stravinsky, the Russian composer, which sets a precedent in the development of rhythmic complexity and in harmonic and counterpointal daring. This difficult score, which few conductors have even attempted, had its first performance under the direction of Pierre Monteux in the season before the war in Paris and London, both in ballet and concert form. The first performance in Paris caused a riot in the audience similar to that of the premiere of "Tannhauser" in the same city. Since then, the supreme fire and brilliance of this music has come to be recognized in Europe. America, however, had scarcely heard the "Sacre du Printemps" until Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently introduced it to Boston and New York. In each case the score and its performance caused a demonstration in the audience—not of anger but of enthusiasm, an indication that America is more sympathetic than Europe to musical innovation.

(Continued on Following Page).

The music describes the worship of the coming spring in a pagan and almost prehistoric Russia. The rites involve the choice of a maiden for the sacrifice. The chosen one finally dances herself to death. The spirit of the music is as wild and savage as the subject. Its impelling rhythms, whether approved of or not, are irresistible.

The score exacts a huge orchestra, with additional instruments in each section. Certain instruments are used as they have never been used before.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a fine program in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 12 1924

PIERRE MONTEUX COMPLETING FIVE YEAR LEADERSHIP

Offers Striking Program On Final Night Here

The pending annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland will take place on Wednesday evening, March 26. The concert has particular interest in that it will constitute the farewell appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux ac conductor of the Orchestra. This greatest of French leaders is now completing his five year term in this position and will at its conclusion return to France where the demand for him is insistent. This season has proven one of the very finest in the history of the orchestra which has had many illustrious conductors. It as been many times stated that the eloquent quality of the performances under the greatest executive achievement.

The program which Pierre Monteux has made for his farewell appearance in Portland is beautiful and striking in the highest degree. The principal number will be the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, one of the greatest scores in the symphonic repertoire which is often called this composer's masterpiece. Richard Wagner will be represented by A Siegfried Idyll and The Ride of Valkyries from his opera The Valkyrie. The Czech composer, Smetana is nationalistic symphonic poem, The Moldau will be played. It is a characterization of his country and people as reflected in the waters of the beautiful river which flows through his land. The evening will close with a brilliant French score Lalo's overture to Le Roy d'Ys.

The seat sale for the local concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Musisc Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, City Hall, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 14 1924

FINAL CONCERT HERE WILL DRAW FROM FAR AND NEAR

Most Brilliant Program Ever Given by Boston Symphony Will Be Enjoyed

Music lovers from Lewiston, Auburn, Augusta, Waterville, Bath, New Hampshire, Boston, and even New York, have already filed applications for seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission, Wednesday evening, March 26.

There are many reasons why there is greater interest than ever before in the local engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For one thing the concerts this year have been the most brilliant in the history of the famous organization. Then again, it will be the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, who is recognized as having formed and moulded the present orchestra in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage and artistic enthusiasm. To this previously well equipped body Mr. Monteux has given life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music. His performances throughout this season have provoked the most enthusiastic plaudits. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba and two French horns.

A symphony orchestra has been rightly described as the most minutely perfect of human organizations. This is indeed a matter of necessity, for symphonic music, with its complexities of construction, and endless subtleties of shading, exacts the utmost talent from the performers. In difficult passages of darting swiftness 100 musicians must play in absolute unanimity a false note from a single man would be disastrous. They must all be accomplished and virtuosos and thorough artists. They must be as instantaneously responsive as a flicker of light to the lightest movement of the conductor's baton.

A Symphony Orchestra strives for two qualities in particular, a beautiful shimmering tone from each choir (whether the violins, or 'cellos, or violas, or horns, or another), and a balance of intensity between the choirs playing at once which will make all audible, while the melody stands out with the exact degree of intensity desired by the conductor. Thus subtleties of the ensemble are acquired only by many seasons of joint practice by the musicians.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all splendid virtuosos, have been enabled through long association under the skilled guidance of the world's greatest conductors to attain this proficiency to a remarkable degree. The leaders of the various sections are in each case foremost masters of their instruments, and scarcely to be matched elsewhere. These leaders are in most cases members of long standing. In fact, the only new-comer among them this season is George Fourel, who crossed the ocean last Summer to become the first viola. He left behind him in Europe an enviable reputation which he has amply confirmed in his present post. The only newcomer last year was Richard Burgin, the concertmaster. A native of Poland, he had led the more important orchestras of Russia, Poland and Scandinavia in this capacity, and also impressed the public of that part of the world by his tours as individual artist in concerts of his own. He has likewise given concerts in America with signal success.

Applications for advance reservations should be made through room 59, City Hall, care of the music commission, to whom checks should be payable.

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Boston Symphony Head On Last Tour

Portland Will See Pierre Monteux For Last Time This Month

Of interest to prospective patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium is the fact that Pierre Monteux, who, with the completion of this Winter of his fifth season, will be succeeded by Serge Koussevitzky of Russia, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will preside.

Mr. Monteux will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra. He has already established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country and during the last three years has made a name for himself in Western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

The past year has been called the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it will not soon be forgotten that the superb of orchestra of today is the creation of Pierre Monteux. The audience now booking in this city will show him, if proof is needed, how warmly he is regarded by his admirers in Maine.

Mail orders for local concert seats are being received at Room 59, City Hall auditorium, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
MAR 7 - 1924

To Conduct Symphony

GEORGE SCHNEEVOIGHT, of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city. He is one of the best of continental leaders, having received engagements all over Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 13 1924

Symphony Orchestra To Feature Wagner

Especial Interest Expressed In Composition, "A Siegfried Idyl" To Be Played

There is particular interest at the moment in Wagner's, "A Siegfried Idyl" in that the composer wrote this score from themes in the music drama of that name to be performed on the first birthday of his son, Siegfried, who is now visiting in this Country and conducting our principal orchestras. This number is prominent on the striking and beautiful program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in City Hall auditorium, this City, Wednesday evening, March 26.

The Ride of the Walkyries, one of the finest instances of descriptive music, is still another Wagnerian work which will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland. The fact that these two numbers are so well known to local patrons who have frequently heard them as Lemare transcriptions for the organ, will enhance their interest. Brahms' First Symphony will be the principal piece of the coming concert, the wonders of this score being too numerous to mention. The program also will be featured by several novelties and tone poems.

The Music Commission will give prompt attention to mail orders for reserved seats. These should be sent to Room 59 City Hall, Portland, care of the Music Commission and checks should be made payable to the same.

SOMEBODY EVERY 25

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PORTLAND ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 14 1924

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 15 1924

Margaret Matzenhauer Here With the Boston Orchestra

Pierre Monteaux conducted the Boston Symphony in an all Wagner program at the Acadamy of Music last night. He chose the Prelude to "The Meistersinger," A Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's Narrative in Act I of Tristac and Isolde, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser", the Ride of the Valkjries, Waldweben from "Siegfried" and Brunnhilde's Immolation scene from "Gotterdammeung".

So perfect is the unity between Pierre Monteaux and his orchestra, that one hesitates to say he conducts. It is almost as if he were an inseperable part of the orchestral body which took its being and living from his motion. Each conductor puts his individual stamp upon his work, and Monteaux is best recognizzed by delicacy; the most delicate perception of phrasing, an almost scholarty regard for delicacy of mood variation. Sometimes one can see him making a scale of his orchestra upon which he weighs each tone with the greatest care.

He conducted "The Meistersinger" with a fine regard of melodic continuity. Monteaux's scale is made to hold vast weight and in Isolde's Narrative he burdened it with great passion and knowing sorrow. With the Bacchanale he did wild, strangely beautiful things. And yet, he had an undercurrent of darkness and longing there which was uncanny in its contrast. Walweben was Spring, and nothing more can be said.

Margaret Matzenhauer was soloist with the Boston Symphony. She was a dramatic Bruanhilde, giving a Valtyne of great sweep and power. Her voice gave a wonderful suggestion of flight and freedom and wild exultation.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 1924

MONTEUX FOR LAST TIME IN PORTLAND

Will Make Farewell Visit to Portland with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Closing Municipal Concert Course

Not only Portland but Lewiston and Auburn musical people are anxious to be present at the "farewell visit" of Pierre Monteux to Portland, when he comes with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Portland City Hall, March 26.

They had read with regret that at the completion of this Winter of his fifth season, Mr. Monteux will be succeeded by Serge Koussexitzky of Russia, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra. He has already established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country and during the last three years has made a name for himself in Western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

The past year has been called the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it will not soon be forgotten that the superb of orchestra of today is the creation of Pierre Monteux. The audience now booking in will show him, if proof is needed, how warmly is is regarded by his admirers in Maine.

Mail orders for seats are being received at Room 59, City Hall auditorium, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OTTAWA CANADA
ISSUE OF
MAR 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS STRAVINSKY.

One of the most remarkable musical scores of the twentieth century is "Le Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring) by Stravinsky, the Russian composer, which sets a precedent in the development of rhythmic complexity and in harmonic and counterpointal daring. This difficult score, which few conductors have even attempted, had its first performance under the direction of Pierre Monteux in the season before the war in Paris and London, both in ballet and concert form. The first performance in Paris caused a riot in the audience similar to that of the premiere of "Tannhauser" in the same city. Since then, the supreme fire and brilliance of this music has come to be recognized in Europe. America, however, had scarcely heard the "Sacre du Printemps" until Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently introduced it to Boston and New York. In each case the score and its performance caused a demonstration in the audience—not of anger but of enthusiasm, an indication that America is more sympathetic than Europe to musical innovation.

(Continued on Following Page).

The music describes the worship of the coming spring in a pagan and almost prehistoric Russia. The rites involve the choice of a maiden for the sacrifice. The chosen one finally dances herself to death. The spirit of the music is as wild and savage as the subject. Its impelling rhythms, whether approved of or not, are irresistible.

The score exacts a huge orchestra, with additional instruments in each section. Certain instruments are used as they have never been used before.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a fine program in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April [illegible].

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PORTLAND ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 12 1924

PIERRE MONTEUX COMPLETING FIVE YEAR LEADERSHIP

Offers Striking Program On Final Night Here

The pending annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland will take place on Wednesday evening, March 26. The concert has particular interest in that it will constitute the farewell appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux ac conductor of the Orchestra. This greatest of French leaders is now completing his five year term in this position and will at its conclusion return to France where the demand for him is insistent. This season has proven one of the very finest in the history of the orchestra which has had many illustrious conductors. It as been many times stated that the eloquent quality of the performances under the greatest executive achievement.

The program which Pierre Monteux has made for his farewell appearance in Portland is beautiful and striking in the highest degree. The principal number will be the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, one of the greatest scores in the symphonic repertoire which is often called this composer's masterpiece. Richard Wagner will be represented by A Siegfried Idyll and The Ride of Valkyries from his opera The Valkyrie. The Czech composer, Smetana is nationalistic symphonic poem, The Moldau will be played. It is a characterization of his country and people as reflected in the waters of the beautiful river which flows through his land. The evening will close with a brilliant French score Lalo's overture to Le Roy d'Ys.

The seat sale for the local concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Musisc Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, City Hall, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

FINAL CONCERT HERE WILL DRAW FROM FAR AND NEAR

Most Brilliant Program Ever Given by Boston Symphony Will Be Enjoyed

Music lovers from Lewiston, Auburn, Augusta, Waterville, Bath, New Hampshire, Boston, and even New York, have already filed applications for seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission, Wednesday evening, March 26.

There are many reasons why there is greater interest than ever before in the local engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For one thing the concerts this year have been the most brilliant in the history of the famous organization. Then again, it will be the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, who is recognized as having formed and moulded the present orchestra in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage and artistic enthusiasm. To this previously well equipped body Mr. Monteux has given life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music. His performances throughout this season have provoked the most enthusiastic plaudits. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba and two French horns.

A symphony orchestra has been rightly described as the most minutely perfect of human organizations. This is indeed a matter of necessity, for symphonic music, with its complexities of construction, and endless subtleties of shading, exacts the utmost talent from the performers. In difficult passages of darting swiftness 100 musicians must play in absolute unanimity a false note from a single man would be disastrous. They must all be accomplished and virtuosos and thorough artists. They must be as instantaneously responsive as a flicker of light to the lightest movement of the conductor's baton.

A Symphony Orchestra strives for two qualities in particular, a beautiful shimmering tone from each choir (whether the violins, or 'cellos, or violas, or horns, or another), and a balance of intensity between the choirs playing at once which will make all audible, while the melody stands out with the exact degree of intensity desired by the conductor. Thus subtleties of the ensemble are acquired only by many seasons of joint practice by the musicians.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all splendid virtuosos, have been enabled through long association under the skilled guidance of the world's greatest conductors to attain this proficiency to a remarkable degree. The leaders of the various sections are in each case foremost masters of their instruments, and scarcely to be matched elsewhere. These leaders are in most cases members of long standing. In fact, the only new-comer among them this season is George Fourel, who crossed the ocean last Summer to become the first viola. He left behind him in Europe an enviable reputation which he has amply confirmed in his present post. The only newcomer last year was Richard Burgin, the concertmaster. A native of Poland, he had led the more important orchestras of Russia, Poland and Scandinavia in this capacity, and also impressed the public of that part of the world by his tours as individual artist in concerts of his own. He has likewise given concerts in America with signal success.

Applications for advance reservations should be made through room 59, City Hall, care of the music commission, to whom checks should be payable.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Boston Symphony Head On Last Tour

Portland Will See Pierre Monteux For Last Time This Month

Of interest to prospective patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium is the fact that Pierre Monteux, who, with the completion of this Winter of his fifth season, will be succeeded by Serge Koussevitzky of Russia, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will preside.

Mr. Monteux will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra. He has already established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country and during the last three years has made a name for himself in Western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

The past year has been called the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it will not soon be forgotten that the superb of orchestra of today is the creation of Pierre Monteux. The audience now booking in this city will show him, if proof is needed, how warmly he is regarded by his admirers in Maine.

Mail orders for local concert seats are being received at Room 59, City Hall auditorium, Portland. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 5 1924

Monteux Not Tyrant With Baton; Cool, But Precise

Pierre Monteux, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Daughter, Denise, Aged 10, And Son, Claude, 2 1-2.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants—of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is appearing in his fifth and final season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26, is not of this type. He is a charming gentleman. Better than that he is a delightful human being. One but needs to see him in his own home to realize this to its fullest extent, for good nature and hospitality run in the family.

He has a dark-eyed daughter, Mlle. Denise, aged 10, a petite French beauty who bears some impress of her father's personality, and an adorable youngster of a son, Claude, aged two and a half, who, like the erring musician in his daddy's orchestra, is sometimes politely but firmly called to task. Then there is Mme. Monteux who also abounds in engaging qualities. It is a matter of regret to their many friends in this country that Mr. Monteaux has already established his family in Paris, where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Monteux's method with his orchestra is that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breath exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear.

Mr. Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He was first prominent in his youthful days in Paris, his native city where he took part in several chamber music ensembles. He soon found his true vocation as a conductor and became famous through his championship of some bold new music which aroused demonstrations and counter demonstrations in the audience. Touring Europe for years as head of the Ballet Russe, he first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subseqently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. From that post he was called to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where his efforts have found their best fruition.

Mr. Monteux was met socially by many Portland people last season as well as on the occasion of his earlier appearances here, and it is anticipated that his farewell engagement will be made the occasion of several brilliant social funcions before and after the local concert.

was the guest of Mrs. Chase A.

LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA

1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY To GIVE PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the week at Carnegi Hall, New York, are: Thursday evening, Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative Act 1, Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tanhauser" Bacchanale, Act 1, Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III, "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II, "Forest Murmeurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer; Saturday afternoon, Schumann, Symphony No. 4, D Minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de printemps," "The Rite of Springs," A Picture of Pagan Russia (a) The Adoration of the Earth (b) The Sacrifice, cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 16 1924

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conducton of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived home last week from Europe, being a passenger on the steamer Paris of the French line, docking in New York.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1924

At the Symphony Hall, Boston, Georg Schneevoist, guest conductor, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program which included a symphony by Sibelius, Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 and Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Margaret Matzenauer as the assisting artist, gave a magnificent Wagner program last night at the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux proved himself thoroghly conversant with the varying moods of Wagner, his readings of the selections being sympathetic and impelling.

Mme. Matzenauer was in fine voice, singing the Isolde's narrative from "Tristan and Isolde" and Brunhilde's immolation scene from "Gotterdammerung." The former number made a far better impression than the scene from "Gotterdammerung," as in the latter instance the orchestra was a little too heavy for the voice. But notwithstanding this, Mme. Matzenauer charmed her audience with her handling of the numbers and was recalled several times.

Among the other numbers of the program the "Siegfried Idyll" was probably the best. Monteux's rendition of this was quiet, slow, and poignant, setting forth the nature themes of Wagner so well that one was reminded of a placid brook flowing through a shaded wood, with the summer sun playing now and then in flashing beams over its surface. The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was played with all the abandon and wild tensity with which the composer was imbued. Other numbers completing the program were Waldweben from "Siegfried," the Ride of the Valkyries from "Tannhauser" and the prelude to "Die Meister singer von Nurnberg."

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF

MAR 15 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Ottawa concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take place in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, is already being keenly anticipated by music lovers in this district. This orchestra is one of the best known, not only on this continent, but also in Europe, so we may expect much and will not be disappointed.

From the statements of the leading American critics, the orchestra is once more at the high standard of artistic efficiency that made it so famous under the great Conductor Muck. The present conductor, Pierre Monteux, has lived up to his high European reputation and brought the organization to the high level it was before the war. The opening concert for the Boston season stressed this desired result.

When Pierre Monteux stepped upon the platform of Symphony Hall in Boston on that occasion, before the great audience and orchestra assembled, a storm of applause greeted the illustrious French conductor, whose present season will culr nate his contract. The program included Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Dukas' "The Perl," Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." Hundreds applying for admission had been turned away, since all seats for the series of twenty-four concerts were re-subscribed last spring. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba, and two French horns.

The concert was called the most brilliant the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever given. Philip Hale thus described it in the Boston Herald:

"Mr. Monteux was greeted with heartiest applause that was unusually long-continued. This welcome must have shown him, if proof was needed, how warmly he is regarded, and how highly he is respected by the Symphony audience.

"It will not be soon forgotten that the superb orchestra of today is his creation. He formed and moulded it in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage and artistic enthusiasm. To this well-equipped body he gave life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music.

"For years it was customary to write perfunctorily about the first concert of a season; sometimes it was thought necessary to write in a semi-apologetic vein—'the players were scatetred during the summer; they have not yet, of course, wholly found themselves'—and so forth and so on.

"But the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall. No wonder that the performance throughout provoked enthusiastic plaudits. A finer interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony has not been heard in many years."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

MAR 15 1924

MUSIC

All-Wagner Programme By Boston Symphony At Academy

Music lovers who prefer (as many do) their Wagner without the intrusion of the human voice, could but have found heart's enjoyment at the Academy of Music last night, upon hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a repetition of its all-Wagner programme presented by Mr. Monteux at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening. There was singing, to be sure, but only two numbers, namely, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," and Brunnhilde's Immolation scene and close from "Gotterdammerung." Mme. Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist, a singer of glorious contralto, but whose forced soprano tones, high and shrill, must prove disconcerting even to most devoted admirers. Mme. Matzenauer last night rose to heights of genuine greatness in the "Gotterdammerung" finale, with Mr. Monteux, co-artist, in as finely adjusted and discreet an orchestra accompaniment that has been heard hereabouts for many a season. In the "Isolde" number honors went to the conductor rather than soloist, for here Mme. Matzenauer was distressingly pressed for breath, with grievous consequences in particular to certain high tones.

But it was in the purely instrumental numbers that Mr. Monteux and his players won the complete rapture of the audience. Silk-like purity of tone in all sections of the orchestra, an exquisite scale of dynamics, marvelous precision of attack and perfect blend of ensemble, were evident in "A Siegfried Idyll," the prelude to "Di Meistersingers," Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried." The famous and thrilling Valkyrian chase through the clouds was taken by Mr. Monteux at a somewhat pedestrian pace, yet withal not without a certain undeniably effective musical dignity that becomes absent when a more furious gait prevails.

It was stated semi-officially that Siegfried Wagner, son of the composer, now sojourning in this country, would possibly be present at last night's concert as guest of Mr. Monteux, provided previous engagements would allow. But he had not arrived by the time the programme's last number was reached, much to the disappointment of at least one reportorial scribe who had had high visions of an interview for the readers of his column. "A Siegfried Idyll," it may be recalled, was written for priavte performance at the first birthday of Siegfried Wagner.

The last of this season's Boston Orchestra concerts, which are given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, will take place on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, famous pianist, as soloist. It will also be Mr. Monteux's farewell appearance in Brooklyn as conductor of the Bostonians, from whom he separates at the close of the season

DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS

MAR 16 1924

WHEN JUNIOR TAKES HIS DAD.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in advertising its young people's concerts, says "No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children." Boston audiences presumably are much the same as those of Detroit, at least in this respect, for here, too, it is a frequent occurrence for adults to mention casually that they are going to attend the young people's concert, and it becomes clear by a cursory examination of the audience at those events that age and childhood are unrelated terms, when it comes to music.

The Boston child doubtless regards this inhibition against adults with a generous mind. He resolves not to be narrow and churlish in the matter. He resolves that, if his mother is good during the week, he will take her to the concert on Saturday, a treat any Boston mother will anticipate with appropriately sober enthusiasm and a quiet determination to let nothing mar the record of conduct.

It is strange to find an affinity between symphony concerts and circuses, but everyone knows how good father is just before a circus comes to town so that Junior will take him to it.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 15 1924

End to Surmise

On Sept. 4, Mr. Kusevitzky Sets Sail for Boston

A SENTENCE may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks, questioning the coming of Mr. Kusevitzky to Boston next autumn as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. On September 4, he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work here.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

16 1924

Boston Symphony.

Last Friday's concert of the Boston Orchestra was the last but one of their Brooklyn series. Mr. Monteux, who this year retires from his conductor's desk with this organization, will appear for the last time at the Academy on April 4, Friday evening, when Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist. Mr. Monteux has done much to restore the Boston band to its place among the leading orchestras of the country, if not of the world. He has shown himself a conductor of rare and sympathetic nature, particularly adapted to the interpretation of French music, of which he has been the apostle.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

MAR 16 1924

The Music Commission has received an order for 100 reserved seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall Wednesday, March 26, from the Edward Little High School Orchestra, Auburn, and an order from the Westbrook High School Orchestra, whose members will attend in a body.

PORTLAND,
ORE.
JOURNAL

MAR 16 1924

By Emilie F

New York, March 15.—The musical pot is now boiling and from operatic stars up to, or down to, as each wishes to think—conductors, there is no point at which changes are not spoken of as imminent. Nothing is perfectly clear, but in connection with the Philharmonic Furtwangler is mentioned, but whether replacing Mengelberg, with Mengelberg, replacing Van Hoogstraten or with Van Hoogstraten none seems to know. For some time it was reported that Stokowski would divide his season between Philadelphia and New York, which seems puerile talk to says the least, for if Stakowski occupies a New York post for half a season what is the use of bringing his Philadelphia organization all that distance to add to his own appearances automatically, that would eliminate Philadelphia from the musical life of New York. It is reported currently that Kousewitsky does not wish to come which has created an extraordinary ripple in favor of Monteux, who seems to be gaining in recognition for the marvelous work he has accomplished in rebuilding the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was completely demolished, this organization being wholly the work of the French conductor. From all sides one hears the remark "Why not retain a man who has accomplished such results?" This should certainly suit Boston, where he is an idol, and only in New York the houses were not those of the old Boston Symphony orchestra. A matter of fact it is that the determination of the Boston orchestra to eliminate soloists is the actual cause of the loss of subscribers and it is that which made the old time Boston Symphony audience turn to the Philadelphia—"An ill-wind which does no one some good." However, it would be joyous news for the following of this splendid orchestra should Monteux be reengaged to carry to a finality that which he has built so marvellously out of nothing, for the original orchestra suffered a debacle in 1917 and the year following under Rabaud, the season ended in much the same way. After Monteux was released from the Metropolitan by request of the Boston Symphony directors, the death of Major Higginson, his non-provision for the continuance of the organization which he had built and the struggle of everything connected with it led to another breaking down of the organization which Monteux built again bringing fifty new men from all parts of Europe and America to rebuild. His [illegible] no less than his [illegible]

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 5 1924

Monteux Not Tyrant With Baton; Cool, But Precise

Pierre Monteux, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Daughter, Denise, Aged 10, And Son, Claude, 2 1-2.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants—of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is appearing in his fifth and final season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26, is not of this type. He is a charming gentleman. Better than that he is a delightful human being. One but needs to see him in his own home to realize this to its fullest extent, for good nature and hospitality run in the family.

He has a dark-eyed daughter, Mlle. Denise, aged 10, a petite French beauty who bears some impress of her father's personality, and an adorable youngster of a son, Claude, aged two and a half, who, like the erring musician in his daddy's orchestra, is sometimes politely but firmly called to task. Then there is Mme. Monteux who also abounds in engaging qualities. It is a matter of regret to their many friends in this country that Mr. Monteaux has already established his family in Paris, where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Monteux's method with his orchestra is that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breath exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear.

Mr. Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He was first prominent in his youthful days in Paris, his native city where he took part in several chamber music ensembles. He soon found his true vocation as a conductor and became famous through his championship of some bold new music which aroused demonstrations and counter demonstrations in the audience. Touring Europe for years as head of the Ballet Russe, he first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subseqently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. From that post he was called to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where his efforts have found their best fruition.

Mr. Monteux was met socially by many Portland people last season as well as on the occasion of his earlier appearances here, and it is anticipated that his farewell engagement will be made the occasion of several brilliant social funcions before and after the local concert.

was the guest of Mrs. Chase A.

LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA
1924

THREE HELD

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

OSTON SYMPHONY To GIVE PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the week at Carnegi Hall, New York, are: Thursday evening, Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative Act 1, Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tanhauser" Bacchanale, Act 1, Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III, "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II, "Forest Murmeurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer; Saturday afternoon, Schumann, Symphony No. 4, D Minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de printemps," "The Rite of Springs," A Picture of Pagan Russia (a) The Adoration of the Earth (b) The Sacrifice, cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived home last week from Europe, being a passenger on the steamer Paris of the French line, docking in New York.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1924

At the Symphony Hall, Boston, Georg Schneevoist, guest conductor, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program which included a symphony by Sibelius, Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 and Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Margaret Matzenauer as the assisting artist, gave a magnificent Wagner program last night at the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux proved himself thoroughly conversant with the varying moods of Wagner, his readings of the selections being sympathetic and impelling.

Mme. Matzenauer was in fine voice, singing the Isolde's narrative from "Tristan and Isolde" and Brunhilde's immolation scene from "Gotterdammerung." The former number made a far better impression than the scene from "Gotterdammerung," as in the latter instance the orchestra was a little too heavy for the voice. But notwithstanding this, Mme. Matzenauer charmed her audience with her handling of the numbers and was recalled several times.

Among the other numbers of the program the "Siegfried Idyll" was probably the best. Monteux's rendition of this was quiet, slow, and poignant, setting forth the nature themes of Wagner so well that one was reminded of a placid brook flowing through a shaded wood, with the summer sun playing now and then in flashing beams over its surface. The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was played with all the abandon and wild tensity with which the composer was imbued. Other numbers completing the program were Waldweben from "Siegfried," the Ride of the Valkyries from "Tannhauser" and the prelude to "Die Meister singer von Nurnberg."

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 15 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Ottawa concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take place in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, is already being keenly anticipated by music lovers in this district. This orchestra is one of the best known, not only on this continent, but also in Europe, so we may expect much and will not be disappointed.

From the statements of the leading American critics, the orchestra is once more at the high standard of artistic efficiency that made it so famous under the great Conductor Muck. The present conductor, Pierre Monteux, has lived up to his high European reputation and brought the organization to the high level it was before the war. The opening concert for the Boston season stressed this desired result.

When Pierre Monteux stepped upon the platform of Symphony Hall in Boston on that occasion, before the great audience and orchestra assembled, a storm of applause greeted the illustrious French conductor, whose present season will culminate his contract. The program included Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Dukas' "The Peri," Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." Hundreds applying for admission had been turned away, since all seats for the series of twenty-four concerts were re-subscribed last spring. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba, and two French horns.

The concert was called the most brilliant the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever given. Philip Hale thus described it in the Boston Herald:

"Mr. Monteux was greeted with heartiest applause that was unusually long-continued. This welcome must have shown him, if proof was needed, how warmly he is regarded and how highly he is respected by the Symphony audience.

"It will not be soon forgotten that the superb orchestra of today is his creation. He formed and moulded it in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage and artistic enthusiasm. To this well-equipped body he gave life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music.

"For years it was customary to write perfunctorily about the first concert of a season; sometimes it was thought necessary to write in a semi-apologetic vein—'the players were scatetred during the summer; they have not yet, of course, wholly found themselves'—and so forth and so on.

"But the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall. No wonder that the performance throughout provoked enthusiastic plaudits. A finer interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony has not been heard in many years."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 15 1924

MUSIC

All-Wagner Programme By Boston Symphony At Academy

Music lovers who prefer (as many do) their Wagner without the intrusion of the human voice, could but have found heart's enjoyment at the Academy of Music last night, upon hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a repetition of its all-Wagner programme presented by Mr. Monteux at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening. There was singing, to be sure, but only two numbers, namely, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," and Brunnhilde's Immolation scene and close from "Gotterdammerung." Mme. Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist, a singer of glorious contralto, but whose forced soprano tones, high and shrill, must prove disconcerting even to most devoted admirers. Mme. Matzenauer last night rose to heights of genuine greatness in the "Gotterdammerung" finale, with Mr. Monteux, co-artist, in as finely adjusted and discreet an orchestra accompaniment that has been heard hereabouts for many a season. In the "Isolde" number honors went to the conductor rather than soloist, for here Mme. Matzenauer was distressingly pressed for breath, with grievous consequences in particular to certain high tones.

But it was in the purely instrumental numbers that Mr. Monteux and his players won the complete rapture of the audience. Silk-like purity of tone in all sections of the orchestra, an exquisite scale of dynamics, marvelous precision of attack and perfect blend of ensemble, were evident in "A Siegfried Idyll," the prelude to "Di Meistersingers," Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried." The famous and thrilling Valkyrian chase through the clouds was taken by Mr. Monteux at a somewhat pedestrian pace, yet withal not without a certain undeniably effective musical dignity that becomes absent when a more furious gait prevails.

It was stated semi-officially that Siegfried Wagner, son of the composer, now sojourning in this country, would possibly be present at last night's concert as guest of Mr. Monteux, provided previous engagements would allow. But he had not arrived by the time the programme's last number was reached, much to the disappointment of at least one reportorial scribe who had had high visions of an interview for the readers of his column. "A Siegfried Idyll," it may be recalled, was written for priavte performance at the first birthday of Siegfried Wagner.

The last of this season's Boston Orchestra concerts, which are given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, will take place on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, famous pianist, as soloist. It will also be Mr. Monteux's farewell appearance in Brooklyn as conductor of the Bostonians, from whom he separates at the close of the season.

DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS
MAR 16 1924

WHEN JUNIOR TAKES HIS DAD.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in advertising its young people's concerts, says "No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children." Boston audiences presumably are much the same as those of Detroit, at least in this respect, for here, too, it is a frequent occurrence for adults to mention casually that they are going to attend the young people's concert, and it becomes clear by a cursory examination of the audience at those events that age and childhood are unrelated terms, when it comes to music.

The Boston child doubtless regards this inhibition against adults with a generous mind. He resolves not to be narrow and churlish in the matter. He resolves that, if his mother is good during the week, he will take her to the concert on Saturday, a treat any Boston mother will anticipate with appropriately sober enthusiasm and a quiet determination to let nothing mar the record of conduct.

It is strange to find an affinity between symphony concerts and circuses, but everyone knows how good father is just before a circus comes to town so that Junior will take him to it.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAR 15 1924

End to Surmise

On Sept. 4, Mr. Kusevitzky Sets Sail for Boston

A SENTENCE may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks, questioning the coming of Mr. Kusevitzky to Boston next autumn as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. On September 4, he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work here.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
1924

Boston Symphony.

Last Friday's concert of the Boston Orchestra was the last but one of their Brooklyn series. Mr. Monteux, who this year retires from his conductor's desk with this organization, will appear for the last time at the Academy on April 4, Friday evening, when Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist. Mr. Monteux has done much to restore the Boston band to its place among the leading orchestras of the country, if not of the world. He has shown himself a conductor of rare and sympathetic nature, particularly adapted to the interpretation of French music, of which he has been the apostle.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 16 1924

The Music Commission has received an order for 100 reserved seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall Wednesday, March 26, from the Edward Little High School Orchestra, Auburn, and an order from the Westbrook High School Orchestra, whose members will attend in a body.

PORTLAND,
ORE.
JOURNAL
MAR 16 1924

By Emilie F

New York, March 15.—The musical pot is now boiling and from operatic stars up to, or down to, as each wishes to think—conductors, there is no point at which changes are not spoken of as imminent. Nothing is perfectly clear, but in connection with the Philharmonic Furtwangler is mentioned, but whether replacing Mengelberg, with Mengelberg, replacing Van Hoogstraten or with Van Hoogstraten none seems to know. For some time it was reported that Stokowski would divide his season between Philadelphia and New York, which seems puerile talk to says the least, for if Stakowski occupies a New York post for half a season what is the use of bringing his Philadelphia organization all that distance to add to his own appearances automatically, that would eliminate Philadelphia from the musical life of New York. It is reported currently that Kousewitsky does not wish to come which has created an extraordinary ripple in favor of Monteux, who seems to be gaining in recognition for the marvelous work he has accomplished in rebuilding the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was completely demolished, this organization being wholly the work of the French conductor. From all sides one hears the remark "Why not retain a man who has accomplished such results?" This should certainly suit Boston, where he is an idol, and only in New York the houses were not those of the old Boston Symphony orchestra. A matter of fact it is that the determination of the Boston orchestra to eliminate soloists is the actual cause of the loss of subscribers and it is that which made the old time Boston Symphony audience turn to the Philadelphia—"An ill-wind which does no one some good." However, it would be joyous news for the following of this splendid orchestra should Monteux be reengaged to carry to a finality that which he has built so marvellously out of nothing, for the original orchestra suffered a debacle in 1917 and the year following under Rabaud, the season ended in much the same way. After Monteux was released from the Metropolitan by request of the Boston Symphony directors, the death of Major Higginson, his non-provision for the continuance of the organization which he had built and the struggle of everything connected with it led to another breaking down of the organization which Monteux built again bringing fifty new men from all parts of Europe and America to rebuild. His courage no less than his strength and musicianship has been astonishing.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Monteux Not Tyrant With Baton; Cool, But Precise

Pierre Monteux, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Daughter, Denise, Aged 10, And Son, Claude, 2 1-2.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants—of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is appearing in his fifth and final season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26, is not of this type. He is a charming gentleman. Better than that he is a delightful human being. One but needs to see him in his own home to realize this to its fullest extent, for good nature and hospitality run in the family.

He has a dark-eyed daughter, Mlle. Denise, aged 10, a petite French beauty who bears some impress of her father's personality, and an adorable youngster of a son, Claude, aged two and a half, who, like the erring musician in his daddy's orchestra, is sometimes politely but firmly called to task. Then there is Mme. Monteux who also abounds in engaging qualities. It is a matter of regret to their many friends in this country that Mr. Monteaux has already established his family in Paris, where he will join them at the end of the present season.

Mr. Monteux's method with his orchestra is that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breath exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear.

Mr. Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He was first prominent in his youthful days in Paris, his native city where he took part in several chamber music ensembles. He soon found his true vocation as a conductor and became famous through his championship of some bold new music which aroused demonstrations and counter demonstrations in the audience. Touring Europe for years as head of the Ballet Russe, he first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subseqently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. From that post he was called to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where his efforts have found their best fruition.

Mr. Monteux was met socially by many Portland people last season as well as on the occasion of his earlier appearances here, and it is anticipated that his farewell engagement will be made the occasion of several brilliant social funcions before and after the local concert.

was the guest of Mrs. Chase A.

LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA

JSTON SYMPHONY To GIVE PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the week at Carnegi Hall, New York, are: Thursday evening, Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative Act 1, Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tanhauser" Bacchanale, Act 1, Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III, "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II, "Forest Murmeurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer; Saturday afternoon, Schumann, Symphony No. 4, D Minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de printemps," "The Rite of Springs," A Picture of Pagan Russia (a) The Adoration of the Earth (b) The Sacrifice, cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

THREE HELD

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived home last week from Europe, being a passenger on the steamer Paris of the French line, docking in New York.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1924

At the Symphony Hall, Boston, Georg Schneevoigt, guest conductor, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program which included a symphony by Sibelius, Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture No. 3 and Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Margaret Matzenauer as the assisting artist, gave a magnificent Wagner program last night at the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux proved himself thoroughly conversant with the varying moods of Wagner, his readings of the selections being sympathetic and impelling.

Mme. Matzenauer was in fine voice, singing the Isolde's narrative from "Tristan and Isolde" and Brunhilde's immolation scene from "Gotterdammerung." The former number made a far better impression than the scene from "Gotterdammerung," as in the latter instance the orchestra was a little too heavy for the voice. But notwithstanding this, Mme. Matzenauer charmed her audience with her handling of the numbers and was recalled several times.

Among the other numbers of the program the "Siegfried Idyll" was probably the best. Monteux's rendition of this was quiet, slow, and poignant, setting forth the nature themes of Wagner so well that one was reminded of a placid brook flowing through a shaded wood, with the summer sun playing now and then in flashing beams over its surface. The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was played with all the abandon and wild tensity with which the composer was imbued. Other numbers completing the program were Waldweben from "Siegfried," the Ride of the Valkyries from "Tannhauser" and the prelude to "Die Meister singer von Nurnberg."

OTTAWA
CANADA
ISSUE OF

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Ottawa concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to take place in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, is already being keenly anticipated by music lovers in this district. This orchestra is one of the best known, not only on this continent, but also in Europe, so we may expect much and will not be disappointed.

From the statements of the leading American critics, the orchestra is once more at the high standard of artistic efficiency that made it so famous under the great Conductor Muck. The present conductor, Pierre Monteux, has lived up to his high European reputation and brought the organization to the high level it was before the war. The opening concert for the Boston season stressed this desired result.

When Pierre Monteux stepped upon the platform of Symphony Hall in Boston on that occasion, before the great audience and orchestra assembled, a storm of applause greeted the illustrious French conductor, whose present season will culminate his contract. The program included Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Dukas' "The Perl," Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." Hundreds applying for admission had been turned away, since all seats for the series of twenty-four concerts were re-subscribed last spring. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba, and two French horns.

The concert was called the most brilliant the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever given. Philip Hale thus described it in the Boston Herald:

"Mr. Monteux was greeted with heartiest applause that was unusually long-continued. This welcome must have shown him, if proof was needed, how warmly he is regarded and how highly he is respected by the Symphony audience.

"It will not be soon forgotten that the superb orchestra of today is his creation. He formed and moulded it in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage and artistic enthusiasm. To this well-equipped body he gave life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music.

"For years it was customary to write perfunctorily about the first concert of a season; sometimes it was thought necessary to write in a semi-apologetic vein—'the players were scatetred during the summer; they have not yet, of course, wholly found themselves'—and so forth and so on.

"But the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall. No wonder that the performance throughout provoked enthusiastic plaudits. A finer interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony has not been heard in many years."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

MUSIC

All-Wagner Programme By Boston Symphony At Academy

Music lovers who prefer (as many do) their Wagner without the intrusion of the human voice, could but have found heart's enjoyment at the Academy of Music last night, upon hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a repetition of its all-Wagner programme presented by Mr. Monteux at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening. There was singing, to be sure, but only two numbers, namely, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," and Brunnhilde's Immolation scene and close from "Gotterdammerung." Mme. Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist, a singer of glorious contralto, but whose forced soprano tones, high and shrill, must prove disconcerting even to most devoted admirers. Mme. Matzenauer last night rose to heights of genuine greatness in the "Gotterdammerung" finale, with Mr. Monteux, co-artist, in as finely adjusted and discreet an orchestra accompaniment that has been heard hereabouts for many a season. In the "Isolde" number honors went to the conductor rather than soloist, for here Mme. Matzenauer was distressingly pressed for breath, with grievous consequences in particular to certain high tones.

But it was in the purely instrumental numbers that Mr. Monteux and his players won the complete rapture of the audience. Silk-like purity of tone in all sections of the orchestra, an exquisite scale of dynamics, marvelous precision of attack and perfect blend of ensemble, were evident in "A Siegfried Idyll," the prelude to "Di Meistersingers," Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried." The famous and thrilling Valkyrian chase through the clouds was taken by Mr. Monteux at a somewhat pedestrian pace, yet without not without a certain undeniable effective musical dignity that becomes absent when a more furious gait prevails.

It was stated semi-officially that Siegfried Wagner, son of the composer, now sojourning in this country, would possibly be present at last night's concert as guest of Mr. Monteux, provided previous engagements would allow. But he had not arrived by the time the programme's last number was reached, much to the disappointment of at least one reportorial scribe who had had high visions of an interview for the readers of his column. "A Siegfried Idyll," it may be recalled, was written for private performance at the first birthday of Siegfried Wagner.

The last of this season's Boston orchestra concerts, which are given under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, will take place on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, famous pianist, as soloist. It will also be Mr. Monteux's farewell appearance in Brooklyn as conductor of the Bostonians, from whom he separates at the close of the season

DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS

WHEN JUNIOR TAKES HIS DAD.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in advertising its young people's concerts, says "No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children." Boston audiences presumably are much the same as those of Detroit, at least in this respect, for here, too, it is a frequent occurrence for adults to mention casually that they are going to attend the young people's concert, and it becomes clear by a cursory examination of the audience at those events that age and childhood are unrelated terms, when it comes to music.

The Boston child doubtless regards this inhibition against adults with a generous mind. He resolves not to be narrow and churlish in the matter. He resolves that, if his mother is good during the week, he will take her to the concert on Saturday, a treat any Boston mother will anticipate with appropriately sober enthusiasm and a quiet determination to let nothing mar the record of conduct.

It is strange to find an affinity between symphony concerts and circuses, but everyone knows how good father is just before a circus comes to town so that Junior will take him to it.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

End to Surmise

On Sept. 4, Mr. Kusevitzky Sets Sail for Boston

A SENTENCE may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks, questioning the coming of Mr. Kusevitzky to Boston next autumn as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. On September 4, he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work here.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

Boston Symphony.

Last Friday's concert of the Boston Orchestra was the last but one of their Brooklyn series. Mr. Monteux, who this year retires from his conductor's desk with this organization, will appear for the last time at the Academy on April 4, Friday evening, when Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist. Mr. Monteux has done much to restore the Boston band to its place among the leading orchestras of the country, if not of the world. He has shown himself a conductor of rare and sympathetic nature, particularly adapted to the interpretation of French music, of which he has been the apostle.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

The Music Commission has received an order for 100 reserved seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall Wednesday, March 26, from the Edward Little High School Orchestra, Auburn, and an order from the Westbrook High School Orchestra, whose members will attend in a body.

PORTLAND,
ORE.
JOURNAL

By Emilie F

New York, March 15.—The musical pot is now boiling and from operatic stars up to, or down to, as each wishes to think—conductors, there is no point at which changes are not spoken of as imminent. Nothing is perfectly clear, but in connection with the Philharmonic Furtwangler is mentioned, but whether replacing Mengelberg, with Mengelberg, replacing Van Hoogstraten or with Van Hoogstraten none seems to know. For some time it was reported that Stokowski would divide his season between Philadelphia and New York, which seems puerile talk to says the least, for if Stakowski occupies a New York post for half a season what is the use of bringing his Philadelphia organization all that distance to add to his own appearances automatically, that would eliminate Philadelphia from the musical life of New York. It is reported currently that Kousewitsky does not wish to come which has created an extraordinary ripple in favor of Monteux, who seems to be gaining in recognition for the marvelous work he has accomplished in rebuilding the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was completely demolished, this organization being wholly the work of the French conductor. From all sides one hears the remark "Why not retain a man who has accomplished such results?" This should certainly suit Boston, where he is an idol, and only in New York the houses were not those of the old Boston Symphony orchestra. A matter of fact it is that the determination of the Boston orchestra to eliminate soloists is the actual cause of the loss of subscribers and it is that which made the old time Boston Symphony audience turn to the Philadelphia—"An ill-wind which does no one some good." However, it would be joyous news for the following of this splendid orchestra should Monteux be reengaged to carry to a finality that which he has built so marvellously out of nothing, for the original orchestra suffered a debacle in 1917 and the year following under Rabaud, the season ended in much the same way. After Monteux was released from the Metropolitan by request of the Boston Symphony directors, the death of Major Higginson, his non-provision for the continuance of the organization which he had built and the struggle of everything connected with it led to another breaking down of the organization which Monteux built again bringing fifty new men from all parts of Europe and America to rebuild. His courage no less than his strength and musicianship has been astonishing.

Players == Music == Musicians == The S

Persuasion and Urbanity

Agide Jacchia

Director, Through Five Hundred "Pop" Concerts, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

LAST WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

HERALD — JUNE 28

Special Programs Planned for Close of Season

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall are entering upon the last week of their 40th season. Agide Jacchia of the "Pops" orchestra will be heard in the following programs of special interest:

MONDAY, JUNE 29, 1925

March, "Boston Commandery".....Carter
Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc".....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood.
(b) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Largo.....Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Martha".....Flotow
Indian Lament.....Dvorak-Kreisler
Orchestrated by Agide Jacchia
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

TUESDAY, JUNE 30, 1925

REQUEST PROGRAM (Repeated)

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty".....Tchaikovsky
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Finale of "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
By the Waters of Minnetonka.Lieurance-Jacchia
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood.
(b) Anitra's Dance.
(c) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelm
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.)
Tandango from "Spanish Caprice."
Rimsky-Korsakov

Encores:
The Flight of the Bumble Bee,
Rimsky-Korsakov
The Volga Bargemen's Song
Moment Musicale.....Schuber
Indian Love-Call, "Rose-Marie,"
Friml-Stothar
Whispering of the Flowers.....Bio

WEDNESDAY, JULY 1, 1925

WAGNER PROGRAM

Military March.....Schuber
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssoh
Scherzo, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Beethove
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlio
Fantasia, "The Valkyrie"
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg "Tannhauser"
Love-Death, "Tristran and Isolde"
Overture to "Rienzi"
Wagner
Dream Pantomime, "Hansel and Gretel"
Humperdinck
Waltz No. 15.....Brahms-Gericke
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 10.....Liszt
Orchestrated by Agide Jacchia

THURSDAY, JULY 2, 1925

RUSSIAN-TCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"....Glinka
Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk"
Moussorgsky
Cavatina from "Snow Maiden"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Ballet Music from "The Demon"....Rubinstein
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"
Andante Cantabile from String Quartet, Op. 11
Third Movement, Fourth Symphony
Allegro, Pizzicato Ostinato
Marche Slave
Tchaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
Fantastic Waltz from "Raymonda".Glazounov
Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitov-Ivanov

FRIDAY, JULY 3, 1925

ITALIAN—VERDI PROGRAM

Overture to "Norma".....Bellini
Prelude to Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana"
Mascagni
Horn solo—Willem Valkenier
Organ solo, "Resignation".....Bossi
Albert W. Snow
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Selection, "Il Trovatore"
Prelude to act III, "La Traviata" Quartet from "Rigoletto"
Fantasia, "Aida"
Giuseppe Verdi, 1813-1901
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Valse Bluette.....Drigo
Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor..Donizetti

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1925

CLOSING NIGHT

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Whispering of the Flowers.....Bion
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
a. The huntresses. b. Procession of Bacchus.
Reve Angeligne.....Rubinstein
Burlesca.....Scarlatti
Orchestrated by Agide Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Star-Spangled Banner
Hungarian March.....Berlioz
Carry Me Back to Old Virginy...Bland-Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Auld Lang Syne

Rasch girls. 1925 JUNE 27

TELEGRAM

"POPS" PROGRAM

"The Tempest," Introduction to "Othello" Verdi; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Prelude Op. 28 No. 6, Chopin-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods," Tchaikovsky; "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," Bland-Jacchia; Czar's Cavatina from "Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakov, solo violin, Julius Theodorowicz; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; "En Sourdine," Tellam; Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais," Waldteufel.

Jacchia Honored at "Pops"

Agide Jacchia was honored by the state, his associates and the public on the occasion of his five hundredth "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall last night. Orchestra and audience rose in greeting when the conductor entered. At the first intermission he received large baskets of flowers amid loud applause. During the intermission F. E. Burgstaller, president, and Harold W. Robinson, secretary of the Boston Music Publishers' Association, called on him in the conductor's room and presented to him a memorial.

When Mr. Jacchia returned to the platform, he was greeted by Wesley E. Monk, state insurance commissioner, who as representative of Governor Fuller, and speaking on behalf of the commonwealth and the musical public, congratulated him on his long service as conductor of the orchestra, the longest in the history of the "Pop" concerts, and presented to him a purse of gold. While Mr. Monk and the audience waited, Mr. Jacchia modestly indicated by gestures his doubts of his ability to make suitable reply in words, and finally persuaded Mr. Monk to express his thanks.

During the second intermission there were more flowers, and Mr. Theodorowicz, the concertm[redacted] behalf o[redacted] presented to the conductor a clock.

The program was made up entirely of compositions or arrangements by Mr. Jacchia. The audience was very large, and warmly expressed its approval of all the proceedings.

MONITOR JUNE 27 1925

Tonight at the "Pops"

"The Tempest," Introduction to "Otello".....Verdi
Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Prelude, Op. 28, No. 6.....Chopin-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods".....Tschaikowsky
"Carry Me Back to Old Virginny".....Bland-Jacchia
Czar's Cavatina from "Snow Maiden".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
"En Sourdine".....Tellam
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais".....Waldteufel

Post 1925 FINAL POPS June 28

With tomorrow's Pop Concert begins the final week of the 40th and, it is said, the most successful season of these festive evenings at Symphony Hall.

For this concert and for that of Saturday, the closing night, Mr. Jacchia has prepared miscellaneous rather than special programmes, although upon each the acknowledged popular favorites predominate.

On Tuesday comes a repetition of last week's unrestricted request programme, in connection with which it is interesting to note that of the 11 regular numbers and 5 "extras" 3 are compositions of Rimsky-Korsakov, while the names of Wagner and of Tchaikovsky appear but once. Thus does popular taste in music vary with the years.

On Wednesday and Thursday respectively, however, the last-named composers have their innings, the one occupying the place of importance in a German programme, the other predominating in a list of Russian pieces.

Finally on Friday the composers of Italy will monopolize the evening, with Verdi as the central figure.

1925 Globe June 28

Music Notes and Comment

This is the last week of the 40th season of Pop concerts. Mr Jacchia has arranged a program of popular favorites for the closing night, Saturday. Other special nights include a repetition Tuesday of the recent request programs, a Wagner program Wednesday, including four numbers by that composer, another Russian Tchaikovsky program Thursday, an Italian-Verdi program Friday. It is a pity that the Pops season cannot be further prolonged. If it were, public support would still be forthcoming. There would almost certainly be audiences all through the Summer. But the players want vacation time, and many of them also have other Summer work, such as playing in hotel orchestras, which is highly remunerative.

Lucille Chalfant, a coloratura soprano, who sang last Fall in [illegible] with the

Globe June 28 1925

Final Pops Programs

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall are entering upon the last week of their 40th season. Agide Jacchia of the "Pops" Orchestra will be heard in the following program of special interest.

Monday, June 29—March, "Boston Commandery," Carter; Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc," Verdi; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Largo, Handel; Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Selection, "Martha," Flotow; "Indian Lament," Dvorak-Kreisler; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

Tuesday, June 30, Request Program (Repeated)—Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty," Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance-Jacchia; Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Ave Marie," Schubert-Wilhelmj; Fandango from "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsakov; Encores, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Rimsky-Korsakov; "The Volga Bargemen's Song," "Moment Musicale," Schubert; Indian Love-Call, "Rose-Marie," Frimil-Stothart; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon.

Wednesday, July 1, Wagner Program—"Military March," Schubert; overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; scherzo, Symphony No 3, "Eroica," Beethoven; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; fantasia, "The Valkyrie," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde," and overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Dream Pantomime, "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; Waltz No. 15, Brahms-Gericke; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 10, Liszt.

Thursday, July 2, Russian-Tschaikowsky Program—Overture to "Russan and Ludmilla,' Glinka; Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; Cavatina from "Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakov; Ballet Music from "The Demon," Rubinstein; Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Andante Cantabile from String, Quartet Op. 11, Third Movement, Fourth Symphony, and Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Fantastic Waltz from "Raymonda," Glazounov; "Procession of the Sardar,' Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Friday, July 3, Italian-Verdi Program—Overture to "Norma," Bellini; prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; organ solo, "Resignation," Bossi; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; selection "Il Trovatore," prelude to act 3, "La Traviata," quartet from "Rigoletto" and fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Valse Bluette," Drigo; sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti.

Saturday, July 4, Closing Night—"Stars and Stripes For Ever," Sousa; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; fantasia, "Madam Butterfly," Puccini; suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; burlesca, Scarlatti; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; "Hungarian March," Berlioz; "Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Auld Lang Syne."

---

makes Dr Davison's work often so difficult.

Those interested in [illegible]

LAST WEEK OF POP CONCERTS June 27 1925 Traveler

But one week remains of the fortieth season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia of the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra will conduct a series of special programs during the final week, including a repetition of the request program on Tuesday, a Wagner program on Wednesday; a Russian-Tchaikovsky program on Thursday, and an Italian-Verdi program on Friday. The closing night, July 4, will contain many of the "Pops" favorites of long standing.

BASS POINT TRIP

With a [illegible]

Jacchia's Baton to Drive Pops on Final Week

1925 American June 27

But one week remains of the fortieth season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia of the "Pop" Symphony Orchestra will be heard in a series of special programs during the final week, including a repetition of the request program on Tuesday, a Wagnerian program on Wednesday; a Russian-Tchaikovsky program on Thursday, and an Italian-Verdi program on Friday. The closing night, July 4th, will contain many of the "Pop" favorites of long standing.

Tonight's program will be as follows:

"The Tempest": Introduction to "Othello" ..... Verdi
Overture to "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Prelude Op. 28 No. 6 ..... Chopin-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods" ..... Tchaikovsky
Introduction, The Fairy of the Lilacs
Puss in Boots and the White Cat
Waltz, Dornroeschen (Briar Rose)
Carry Me Back to Old Virginny ..... Bland-Jacchia
Czar's Cavatina from "Snow Maiden" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Solo Violin—Julius Theodorowicz
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais" ... Waldteufel

Monitor June 29 '25

Tonight at the "Pops"

March, "Boston Commandery" ... Carter
Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" ... Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ... Strauss
Fantasia, "Carmen" ... Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ... Grieg
Largo ... Handel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" ... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Selection, "Martha" ... Flotow
"Indian Lament" ... Dvorak-Kreisler
Orchestrated by Jacchia
"Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

1925 American May 1

25—Phone Liberty 4000

'POPS' PROGRAM TONIGHT IS WELL BALANCED

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra of eighty, under their noted leader, Agide Jacchia, will give the following program at Symphony Hall tonight, the University Club being particularly represented.

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Jubilee Overture ..... Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Selection, "College Life" ..... Hinrichs

Ancient Dances (Arranged by Respighi)
(a) Gagliarda; (b) Villanella; (c) Passo Mezzo e Mascherada.
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsak
Contra Dance No. 1 ..... Beetho
Second Hungarian Rhapsody L

Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldt
Triumphal March from "Aida" ....

Herald June 30 '25

REQUEST NIGHT AT 'POPS'

The request program at the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall will be repeated tonight for the benefit of those who were unable to hear it last week. The numbers follow:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty" ..... Tschaikovsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
(Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.)
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" ..... Offenbach
By the Waters of Minnetonka ..... Lieurance-Jacchia
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
(c) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.)
Fandango from "Spanish Caprice" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

Encores:
The Flight of the Bumble Bee ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
The Volga Bargemen's Song
Moment Musicale ..... Schubert
Indian Love-Call, "Rose-Marie" ..... Friml-Stothart
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon

Post 1925 FINAL POPS June 28

With tomorrow's Pop Concert begins the final week of the 40th and, it is said, the most successful season of these festive evenings at Symphony Hall.

For this concert and for that of Saturday, the closing night, Mr. Jacchia has prepared miscellaneous rather than special programmes, although upon each the acknowledged popular favorites predominate.

On Tuesday comes a repetition of last week's unrestricted request programme, in connection with which it is interesting to note that of the 11 regular numbers and 5 "extras" 3 are compositions of Rimsky-Korsakov, while the names of Wagner and of Tchaikovsky appear but once. Thus does popular taste in music vary with the years.

On Wednesday and Thursday respectively, however, the last-named composers have their innings, the one occupying the place of importance in a German programme, the other predominating in a list of Russian pieces. Finally on Friday the composers of Italy will monopolize the evening, with Verdi as the central figure.

1925 Globe June 28

Music Notes and Comment

This is the last week of the 40th season of Pop concerts. Mr Jacchia has arranged a program of popular favorites for the closing night, Saturday. Other special nights include a repetition Tuesday of the recent request programs, a Wagner program Wednesday, including four numbers by that composer, another Russian Tchaikovsky program Thursday, an Italian-Verdi program Friday. It is a pity that the Pops season cannot be further prolonged. If it were, public support would still be forthcoming. There would almost certainly be audiences all through the Summer. But the players want vacation time, and many of them also have other Summer work, such as playing in hotel orchestras, which is highly remunerative.

Lucille Chalfant, a coloratura soprano, who sang last Fall in Boston with the

Globe June 28 1925

Final Pops Programs

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall are entering upon the last week of their 40th season. Agide Jacchia of the "Pops" Orchestra will be heard in the following program of special interest.

Monday, June 29—March, "Boston Commandery," Carter; Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc," Verdi; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Largo, Handel; Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Selection, "Martha," Flotow; "Indian Lament," Dvorak-Kreisler; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

Tuesday, June 30, Request Program (Repeated)—Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty," Tschaikowsky; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance-Jacchia; Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Ave Marie," Schubert-Wilhelmj; Fandango from "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsakov; Encores, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Rimsky-Korsakov; "The Volga Bargemen's Song," "Moment Musicale," Schubert; Indian Love-Call, "Rose-Marie," Friml-Stothart; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon.

Wednesday, July 1, Wagner Program—"Military March," Schubert; overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; scherzo, Symphony No 3, "Eroica," Beethoven; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; fantasia, "The Valkyrie," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde," and overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Dream Pantomime, "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; Waltz No. 15, Brahms-Gericke; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 10, Liszt.

Thursday, July 2, Russian-Tschaikowsky Program—Overture to "Russan and Ludmilla,' Glinka; Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; Cavatina from "Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakov; Ballet Music from "The Demon," Rubinstein; Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Andante Cantabile from String, Quartet Op. 11, Third Movement, Fourth Symphony, and Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Fantastic Waltz from "Raymonda," Glazounov; "Procession of the Sardar,' Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Friday, July 3, Italian-Verdi Program—Overture to "Norma," Bellini; prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; organ solo, "Resignation," Bossi; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; selection "Il Trovatore," prelude to act 3, "La Traviata," quartet from "Rigoletto" and fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Valse Bluette," Drigo; sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti.

Saturday, July 4, Closing Night—"Stars and Stripes For Ever," Sousa; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; fantasia, "Madam Butterfly," Puccini; suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; burlesca, Scarlatti; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; "Hungarian March," Berlioz; "Carry Me Back to Old Virginy," Bland-Jacchia; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Auld Lang Syne."

---

makes Dr Davison's work often so difficult.

Those interested in ch[illegible] any

1925 American May 1

25—Phone Liberty 4000

'POPS' PROGRAM TONIGHT IS WELL BALANCED

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra of eighty, under their noted leader, Agide Jacchia, will give the following program at Symphony Hall tonight, the University Club being particularly represented.

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Jubilee Overture ..... Weber
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Selection, "College Life" ..... Hinrichs

Ancient Dances (Arranged by Respighi)
(a) Gagliarda; (b) Villanella; (c) Passo Mezzo e Mascherada.
Fandango from the "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsak[ov]
Contra Dance No. 1 ..... Beetho[ven]
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... L[iszt]

Medley of College Songs
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldt[eufel]
Triumphal March from "Aida" ....

LAST WEEK OF 1925 June 27 TRAVELER POP CONCERTS

But one week remains of the fortieth season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia of the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra will conduct a series of special programs during the final week, including a repetition of the request program on Tuesday, a Wagner program on Wednesday; a Russian-Tchaikovsky program on Thursday, an[d] an Italian-Verdi program on Frida[y]. The closing night, July 4, will con[tain] many of the "Pops" favorites of [long] standing.

BASS POINT TRIB[E]

With a [new] lease of li[fe]

Jacchia's Baton to Drive Pops on Final Week

1925 American June 27

But one week remains of the fortieth season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia of the "Pop" Symphony Orchestra will be heard in a series of special programs during the final week, including a repetition of the request program on Tuesday, a Wagnerian program on Wednesday; a Russian-Tchaikovsky program on Thursday, and an Italian-Verdi program on Friday. The closing night, July 4th, will contain many of the "Pop" favorites of long standing.

Tonight's program will be as follows:

"The Tempest": Introduction to "Othello" Verdi
Overture to "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Prelude Op. 28 No. 6 ..... Chopin-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Suite, "Sleeping Beauty of the Woods" Tchaikovsky
Introduction, The Fairy of the Lilacs
Puss in Boots and the White Cat
Waltz, Dornroeschen (Briar Rose)
Carry Me Back to Old Virginny Bland-Jacchia
Czar's Cavatina from "Snow Maiden" Rimsky-Korsakov
Solo Violin—Julius Theodorowicz
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais" ... Waldteufel save the health [illegible] from [illegible]

Monitor June 29 '25

Tonight at the "Pops"

March, "Boston Commandery" ... Carter
Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" .. Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Largo ..... Handel
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" ... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .. Liszt
Selection, "Martha" ..... Flotow
"Indian Lament" ... Dvorak-Kreisler
Orchestrated by Jacchia
"Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar

Herald June 30 '25

REQUEST NIGHT AT 'POPS'

The request program at the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall will be repeated tonight for the benefit of those who were unable to hear it last week. The numbers follow:

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty" ..... Tschaikovsky
Fantasia, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Finale of "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
(Festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.)
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
By the Waters of Minnetonka Lieurance-Jacchia
Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
(c) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.)
Fandango from "Spanish Caprice" Rimsky-Korsakov

Encores:
The Flight of the Bumble Bee Rimsky-Korsakov
The Volga Bargemen's Song
Moment Musicale ..... Schubert
Indian Love-Call, "Rose-Marie" Friml-Stothart
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon

C

DUPLICATE

Advertising Contract

Date Nov 16 1925

The Harvard Dramatic Club
Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs:—

Please insert our advertisement in The Harvard Dramatic Club program to occupy a space of ½ page for a total of one insertions. For this service we agree to pay 18.00 dollars per insertion, less ..... discount, total amount 18.00 dollars.

Bills to be rendered on publication.

First insertion given Dec 1 1925

Remarks Space above explains # of scenes.

Accepted by Name J. H. Quinn
The Harvard Dramatic Club Address .....
..... Treas.
Per George D. Stearns

It is agreed that if number of insertions used is less than called for by this contract, discounts do not apply and space used is to be paid for according to card rate per insertion.

It is agreed that this contract is not affected by any agreement not endorsed hereon.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Stage and Music by Philip Hale

Weekly Comment

Mme. Melba has written her autobiography. It is appearing in serial form, entitled "Melodies and Memories," in the Daily Telegraph of London. She had a beautiful time in New York when she first sang there. She enjoyed the society of John Jacob Astor, though he had a "metallic voice which seemed to snip his sentences rather than to say them." "In spite of his wealth there were moments when one felt that the epithet 'Scotch' would be almost too generous to give him."

She has delightful memories of Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, "although in those days these families were newer than they are today." She also remembers by name Mrs. Ogden Goelet.

"I have always been perfectly happy whether my host is a millionaire or a bootmaker, a sense of humor and a sprinkling of brains."

Mme. Melba just dotes on Boston, though she names no names of our prominent citizenesses.

"I should probably not have visited Boston so early—the spring of 1894—had it not been for the enormous success of the New York season, which prompted Mr. Abbey to arrange this special tour. But I shall never be sufficiently thankful that I did go, for it was to be my introduction to the world's finest body of musicians—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I wonder if the average reader to whom an orchestra is just an orchestra, a collection of instruments and nothing more, can realize the great soul which animated that superb institution? I grew to love that orchestra almost as though it had been a single human being instead of a collection. And from the very first moment I admired and venerated its patron and inspirer, Maj. Higginson.

"Yes, Boston knew the best in music, and it has always had it. Indeed, all American audiences are audiences before which it is a delight to sing. Their praise is worth as much as, if not more, than that of any audience in the world.

"What is there about Boston that makes its society so charming, with the same quiet appeal which one finds among one's friends in England? There is a quality about the social life of Boston totally different from that of most great American cities, a quality which can best be described as one of repose."

Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, who twice visited Boston (1911

"HARD-BOILED" HERMAN IN ACTION

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

UNPRECEDENTED INTEREST IN LOCAL ENGAGEMENT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, MAR. 26

Story of How Great Organization Has Risen to Present World-Wide Distinction Is a Long and Impressive Record of Endeavor and Fruition.

So great is the interest in the Portland engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission Wednesday evening, March 26, that many patrons outside the City in their eagerness are making the mistake of sending directly to Symphony Hall, Boston, for tickets. This is unnecessary, however, and means delay in each case, as all applications must be made through the Music Commission, Room 59, City Hall, Portland, and checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

The fact that the present season will culminate the contract of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, has led to much demand for information regarding the Boston Symphony Orchestra and how the famous organization has attained its present eminence. A detailed account of how the Boston Symphony Orchestra has risen to its present world-wide distinction, and how it has made Boston an important musical center, would constitute a long and impressive record of endeavor and fruition.

How It Was Founded

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undergaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the ensemble.

Early Trials and Successes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only 60 players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programs, even the wisdom of the whole venture were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the Orchestra added growth and success to the last.

List of Great Conductors

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, engaged in 1884, was a thorough and arduous musician, who did much toward training the ensemble to its now traditional state of perfection. In 1889 came Arthur Nikisch, one of the most brilliant conductors of all time, who in turn was succeeded by Emil Pauer in 1893. In 1898 Mr. Gericke returned for a period of eight years, during which time Symphony Hall was built especially for the Orchestra in 1900.

The conductors since then have been: Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fielder, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henry Rabaud, 1918-1919, and since then, Pierre Monteux. The fact is worth remarking that these conductors are all living, with the exception of Arthur Nikisch.

The orchestra had, during these years, risen to pre-eminence. The perfection of the Boston Symphony performances had become the marvel of America, and even of the musical world at large. Nothing comparable was to be heard elsewhere.

What Pierre Monteux Has Done

In the autumn of 1919, Pierre Monteux recognized as one of the greatest living conductors, was offered the post, but could not obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening Boston Symphony Concerts of that season. In the season of 1919-1920 he became the permanent conductor of the Orchestra. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization, and never have the concerts been more highly praised or evidently enjoyed than under his direction.

A Maximum Schedule

During the forty-two years of its history the Boston Symphony has considerably extended the course of its travels, although it has given series of concerts regularly in New York for thirty-five years, and likewise concerts in various cities of the South and West. In 1915, the Orchestra made a memorable trip across the continent to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

Russian Conductor Will Succeed Monteux

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky of Russia as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924 has been announced and he will succeed Pierre Monteux, who, with the completion this winter of his fifth season will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra.

MAINE-IZED TO

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

A large sale of seats is indicated for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall Wednesday evening, March 26. This is the last concert in this season's Municipal course.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The last concert under the auspices of the Providence Music League will take place in the E. F. Albee Theatre next Sunday, March 23, at 3 o'clock. One of the finest concerts of the year is anticipated in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will appear with a soloist added to the program, Jean Bedetti, the noted 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux and the musicians of New England's great orchestra, which exceed 100 in number, will present an especially fine program which has direct appeal and will include works of the great masters in the various styles of the symphonic repertory, Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played. Likewise Mendelssohn's Nocturne and Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The Russian music will be represented by the second and third movements from Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" will close the concert. Jean Bedetti will appear with the orchestra in the fine Concerto for his instrument of Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer.

Jean Bedetti first came to America in 1919 to take his position as leader of the golden tone 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Europe he had been known as the 'cello soloist of the Colonne and Paris Opera orchestras and by virtue of recital tours. In this country he has won a very high reputation by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere and by his recitals in various cities.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

On Monday, March 24, from 4:30 to 6 o'clock, in recital hall of the New England Conservatory of Music, a reception will be given Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "This reception," says the bulletin of the Conservatory, "is intended an expression of the appreciation of the faculty and students of Mr. Monteux's distinguished service to the orchestra and to the city of Boston during the past five years."

A concert by the Conservatory Orchestra, with Wallace Goodrich directing, will be given in Jordan Hall, Boston, on March 28, at 8:15 o'clock.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

MAR 16 1924

Boston Symphony Plays Next Sunday

Jean Bedetti, 'cello virtuoso, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its appearance here next Sunday afternoon. This will be the final concert of the season under the auspices of the Providence Music League and will be given at the Albee Theatre at 3 o'clock with Pierre Monteux conducting.

The programme includes Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Mendelssohn's Nocturne and Scherzo from the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Russian music will be represented by the second and third movements from Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" will conclude the concert.

Among the numbers which Jean Bedetti will play with the orchestra will be the concerto for his instrument of Saint-Saens. Before coming to this country to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919 Bedetti appeared as 'cello soloist of the Colonne and Paris Opera orchestras.

* * *

At the next meeting of the Junior Chopin Club, which will be held on Thursday at the home of Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, the Vining-Ward Trio will be in charge of the programme.

* * *

ESTABLISHED
From
Telegram
New York City

For Monteux's Farewell.

Pierre Monteux, who is leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, will lead his final pair of local concerts Thursday evening, April 3, and Saturday afternoon, April 5, in Carnegie Hall. For the Thursday concert, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, he has chosen as program Cesar Franck's symphony, Chopin's E minor piano concerto, and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

On Saturday there will be no soloist. The program will consist of Scriabin's "Divine Poem," Manuel de Falla's "Gardens of Spain," and two overtures, Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

MAR 24 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR LAST MUSIC LEAGUE CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians, Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Jean Bedetti, the celebrated 'cellist as soloist, will be the attraction at the last concert of the season's series by the Providence Music League to be given in the E. F. Albee Theatre on Sunday afternoon, March 23, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Bedetti, who is considered one of the finest 'cellists of the day will appear with the orchestra in the celebrated concerto, which Saint-Saens wrote for this instrument. Pierre Monteux will likewise conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Mendelssohn's Nocturne and Scherzo from the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," second and third movements from Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Wagner's Overture to 'Rienzi."

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 17 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Concerning the Controversy

SOOTHING music awaits the public of the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday—a gentle Symphony of Haydn, the tame and tedious Concerto that Beethoven wrote for the violin; fanciful "Stevensoniana" from Mr. Hill. Only one number can possibly disturb the pervading peace—the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs, and by this time every hearer takes for granted their clatter and clang. In this calm, the debate over the ineffable or the unspeakable Schnéevoigt may at last be assuaged. For still it stirs tempers and stirs superlatives; while those paltry fellows that try to hold the balance true and fair, have long since been driven to cover of ironic smiles. Visiting conductors many-fold more meritorious than Mr. Schnéevoigt—say Mahler of old, say Toscanini more recently, say even Mr. Walter of last year—did not stir a tithe of such controversy; were not forthwith named as the one and only director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Monteux's virtues, his praiseworthy work as restorer of that band, have been unjustly and grievously over-clouded of late by excess of zeal from a few partisans. In similar fashion, the glories of Mr. Schnéevoigt seem destined to speedy withering. No conductor of the powers that the vehement hourly attribute to him, could possibly have been so far, in fifties, from universal fame. His two c certs in Boston disclosed him as a lea of, by and for effects—a superior Fiedl an inferior Mengelberg. If such condu ing pleases the hearer—until the exc of it begins to stale—by all means let h clamor for it. Yet so doing, it is n necessary to belittle Mr. Monteux, w his signal merits of another sort, or speak of Mr. Kusevitzky, whom not t hundred Bostonians ever heard, as species of "cast-off."

The plain truth is that many a cove motive and desire threads this angry d bating. Incredible as it seems, there a those who resent Mr. Monteux's widenin of the whole horizon of the Symphony Co certs, his open mind to music of eve sort, his zest for the music of our immedi ate day. They have reason to believ that Mr. Kusevitzky is like-spirited. The pine for the old, stolid, comfortable German rut. They read and re-read Mr. Schnéevoigt's programme—Beethoven, Mozart, Strauss, Sibelius, the third Overture of Leonora, "Don Juan," horses of battle regularly ridden the world over by guest-conductors—and forthwith hail him as the savior from those pestilent "modernists" of Russia and France, Italy and England. Once more, the German, the Nordic salvation—as personified in a Finn. Above interest in himself, above interest in the performance, Mr. Monteux has rightly set the interest of the music in hand. There is no other way to keep twenty-four pairs of concerts alight before a recurring public in a single city. Yet there are those for whom a "personality" is the ultimate and everlasting paragon—and behold Mr. Schnéevoigt descending from the twin peaks of Stockholm and Scheveningen.

As ulterior are the motives of some of Mr. Schnéevoigt's loudest detractors. They cannot bear the thought of a conductor of the Boston Orchestra who is not Paris-made. They applauded a Rabaud reducing the Symphony Concerts to the lowest standards they had known in thirty years. They intrigued against the possibility in Boston of a conductor of the first rank like Mr. Toscanini. They have resigned themselves to a cosmopolitan conductor like Mr. Monteux—he at least was originally Parisian—but the prospect of a cosmopolitan Russian, like Mr. Kusevitzky, vexes them; while they break out in goose flesh—and snarls—at the thought of a Northern European, who was schooled and has practised in Germany. Whatever Mr. Schnéevoigt's merits or demerits, whatever Mr. Monteux's or Mr. Kusevitzky's, or Mr. Walter's, his quality as a conductor—and nothing else—fits or unfits him to lead the Symphony Orchestra. Once leave this firm ground for nationality or any other bog of chance and circumstance, and all concerned wallow in a slough of prejudice, back-biting, intrigue. Worse still, the broad and cosmopolitan Symphony Concerts of Boston descend to the narrow and provincial standards in such things of Paris and Berlin. H. T. P.

Continued on Following Page

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

19

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER TO SAIL FOR U. S. SEPT. 4

Word was received here yesterday that Serge Koussevitzky, who has been engaged as conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1924-25, will sail for this country on the Aquitania Sept. 4. This information came from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who is in London. He attended Mr. Kousseyitzky's opening concert with the London Symphony Orchestra this season on March 10.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

2 01924

Second Helping

Stravinsky's "Sacre" at the Symphony Concerts of April 11 and 12.

AS already announced, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will repeat Stravinsky's tone-poem, "Le Sacre de Printemps," at a pair of concerts. They do so in deference to many requests, by the deserts of the music, and in justice to their own labors upon it.

The dates for the repetition have now been set—Friday afternoon, April 11, and Saturday evening, April 12. At either concert "The Rite of Spring" will fill the second part of the programme.

For the afternoon virtually the only places available are the so-called "rush seats" of the second balcony, opened an hour before the concert begins. For the evening, a substantial number of seats may be bought in the usual manner at the usual terms. In New York, at the repetition of "Le Sacre," the audience overflowed Carnegie Hall, Boston, where the piece and performance crowned Mr. Monteux's term as conductor, should not lag behind.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

IN HONOR OF M. MONTEUX

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra to Be Tendered Reception Monday by New England Conservatory of Music

A reception to M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be tendered by the New England Conservatory of Music next Monday afternoon, in Recital Hall, from 4.30 to 6 o'clock. This reception is intended to be an expression of the appreciation of the faculty and students of Mr. Monteux's distinguished service to the orchestra and to American music during the past five years. All students, alumni and other former students of the conservatory are invited to attend this reception, thus showing their appreciation of the generous interest which Mr. Monteux has at all times taken in the conservatory and its pupils.

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

MAR 24

DEATH CALLS MME. MONTEUX TO FRANCE

Mme. Pierre Monteux wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been called suddenly to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme. Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband until the close of the symphony season.

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

May Advance Date For Sale Of Seats

Interest In Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert May Change Plans

Although the regular seat sale of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, it is possible that it will be necessary to open the box office at City Hall on Monday, March 24, on account of the interest which is being manifested in the annual concert in City Hall auditorium Wednesday evening, March 25.

In case it is planned to have a three days' seat sale, instead of the two days already announced, ample notice will be given. Mail orders are now being received at Room 59, City Hall. Orders are also being received by phone, 78072, at City Hall box office, daily from 10.30 to 11.30 a. m. No phone orders will be received after Tuesday, March 25.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAR 17 1924

FOR STRAVINSKY, WAGNER, MONTEUX, LAURELS RENEWED

CONDUCTOR AND ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

The Bostonians Make a Notable Visit—An Evening of Wagner and an Afternoon of Stravinsky—The Great Richard and Our Best Musical People—"The Rite of Spring" as Piece of the Year—Praise for Band and Leader

By agreeing testimony of the New York newspapers, since the days of Dr. Muck, the Boston Orchestra has not so covered itself with glory as at the concerts of Thursday and Saturday last in Carnegie Hall. For the first Mr. Monteux set a programme drawn wholly from the music of Wagner, viz.: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; "Siegfried Idyll"; Isolde's Narrative from the first act of his opera, with Mme. Matzenauer for singer; Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; "Ride of the Valkyrs" from "Die Walküre"; Forest Scene from "Siegfried"; Closing Scene from "Götterdämmerung," again with Mme. Matzenauer for singer. Taking the concert as text for an ironic word about the present status of Wagner among our best musical people, Mr. Gilman is admirably amusing in The Tribune. "There was doubtless a raising of eyebrows among the musical intelligentsia," he begins, "when Mr. Monteux announced that the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York would have an 'All-Wagner' programme. 'All-Wagner' programmes have been hopelessly canaille for some time—meet for the Saturday-night popular concert; for the semi-popular Sunday matinee; but hardly suitable for the better class of orchestral concerts. Mr. Damrosch, to be sure, occasionally stoops to Wagner, and devotes a subscription pair of concerts to excerpts from the once respectable operas and music-dramas. But Mr. Damrosch is a Favorite Son, and may do as he pleases. Mr. Stokowski, too, gives an 'All-Wagner' programme at his subscription concerts in Philadelphia at least once a season; but Mr. Stokowski is a conquering hero, and could get away with a Mendelssohn Cycle, if he chose—the Academy of Music would still be crowded to the chandeliers. The lesser gods and the plain mortals of the orchestral world, however, do not often dare to offer their sophisticated subscribers an entire programme of Wagner. Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. van Hoogstraten or Mr. Walter would scarcely venture upon so degraded an undertaking; and even Mr. Stokowski has never asked his dazzlingly distinguished New York subscribers to defend to an 'All-Wagner' programme. It simply is not done. Wagner is today not merely démodé beyond recovery, but he has sunk to the depths where poor Tchaikovsky dwells, eating out his heart in the sub-cellar of 'The Pathetic.'

"It would be difficult to convey to unsophisticated minds an adequate idea of the degree to which Wagner is despised by the Best People. We were reading the other day an article by a contemporary French critic who thought he had discovered in the music of Monsieur Honegger, one of the forward-looking 'Groupe des Six,' a reminiscence of 'Tristan.' The critic was horrified. No doubt, he observed, Monsieur Honegger was anxious to avoid the ageing impressionism of Debussy; but this should not have driven him to follow so 'insufferable' a model as 'Tristan'; 'that,' he remarked, 'is merely to fall from a delicious Scylla into an abominable Charybdis.'

"'An abominable Charybdis.' Alas, poor Wagner! We knew him well—once. But now, when we meet in the public ways a grotesque apparition out of a repudiated past—the short, bandy-legged figure, shambling along in his threadbare cloak and his queer velvet cap, an old score of 'Tristan' under his arm, we hastily cross the street to turn a corner, muttering 'Stravinsky' as a protective talisman, for it does no one any good to be seen with the poor Wagner boy these days. He belongs among the sins of our yeasty youth; he is Old Hat; the crowd has mauled him, made free with its vulgar own. We, who have discovered that Stravinsky and Schönberg and Bartók and Varèse are the true Wagnermen of our own time, have learned that Wagner, though a master in his way—a technical wizard in the manipulation of musical ideas—wrote what Mr. W. J. Turner, the London critic, so felicitously described as 'tawdry rubbish.' 'I hardly like to want to hear it,' says Mr. Turner: 'when I go unwillingly! I have little innate sympathy with it'—a temperate statement of the typical point of view.

"No doubt, as Maurice Kollinat sang, il est mort. And yet . . . and yet—

> Toujours, tout au fond de mon ame,
> Là, dans le coin des vieux effrois,
> J'entends gémir, comme autrefois,
> Sa cornemuse.

"Some of us cannot forget it, cannot escape it; there, in the deep places of the spirit, we hear it always. For some of us it is still the most beautiful, the most moving, the most nobly passionate of all music—music of an incomparable intensity, an incomparable distinction. . . .

"If Mr. Monteux hoped to lure the Wagnerites from their dugouts, his wish was granted. They were there in battalions—the hall has not been so full, apparently, since Mr. Stravinsky's prehistoric lady-friend was sacrificed to the spring. The Wagnerites were well rewarded. Every number on the programme was first-rate Wagner: the gorgeous, full-blown Wagner who wrote between 1854 and 1874; and Mr. Monteux played the magnificent music as if he believed in its greatness—as if he realized that it is perfectly possible for the Wagnerite and the Stravinskyite to dwell amicably together in the same world. For here, too, there are many mansions. The admirable orchestra displayed again its newly found beauty, its suppleness, its fineness of texture, and won an abundance of well deserved applause."

Regarding the quality of the performance, the reviewers are variously minded. Mr. Chase of The Times found "the splendid orchestra heard to the best advantage in this rich and highly organized music. The balance and technical proficiency of the different choirs, and Mr. Monteux's musicianly fulfillment of his task, made it an evening for Wagnerites to remember." Mr. Taylor in The World makes a reservation, saying: "The brass choir seemed to be suffering a bit from over-confidence. It was mellow and beautiful in the scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' where it was needed, and properly sonorous in the 'Valkyrs' Ride,' but it was entirely too prominent in much of the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger' and quite wrecked the balance of parts in the Bacchanale. Otherwise Mr. Monteux's readings were spirited and warmly colorful, and at times eloquent. He was particularly happy in the Siegfried Idyl, which had beautiful transparency and a quality of tenderness and wistful gayety that carried one irresistibly back to one morning at Wahnfried that saw the first performance." Mr. Henderson, writing in The Herald, seems to have caught an echo of the Monteux-Schnéevoigt controversy still raging in this town; for he judges the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra over-mild. "It was in the idyllic tribute to Frau Cosima and her interesting offspring that Mr. Monteux was happiest. This Wagnerian 'Sinfonia Domestica' touched apparently a tender spot in the interpreter's heart, which vibrated sympathetically with the gentle murmurs of the slumber-motive and the twilight suggestions of the bird-theme. In the Bacchanale there was beauty of tone. The Boston Orchestra made sweet Venusberg sounds and one felt that the dance was picturesque and rhythmic without being too disturbing."

On Saturday Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," repeated by general request, filled half the concert with Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's Concerto for Violoncello—and Mr. Bedetti—as preliminary numbers. A paragraph from The World of yesterday efficiently summarizes the occasion:

> If Pierre Monteux ever had a doubts about the drawing power of "Le Sacre du Printemps" they were dispelled by the mob which stormed the doors of Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The house from orchestra to gallery had been sold out for weeks in advance and a patient and determined throng of standees overflowed from the aisles to the lobby. They had their reward in a performance of the remarkable ballet which was as vigorous and urgent as on the night of its introduction several wee ago. As the season shapes itself, t music and its presentation by t Boston Symphony Orchestra emer as the most significant in all its cha ing weeks and it is happily a sign cance which has not been lost on N York concert-goers. Saturday's cro is revealed as that rarest of rare sp tacles—an overflowing audience tracted not by the reputation of orchestra or the personality of performer but on the sheer merits o single number of the programme.

In The Herald Mr. Henderson write Coda as follows: "To one heare Sacre' came a second time with ju much over-mastering force as it br the first time. Up to this day and Stravinsky's tone-poem is the su achievement of the modern realistic s It beats æsthetic opposition to the g by the sheer power of brutal shrieki elemental things. It was played aga the Bostonians with magnificent virt and Mr. Monteux again proved th this type of music he is a conductor most brilliant skill and authority. It be recorded that his audience endea to show him that it believed thorough his reading of Schumann's symphony The applause after it was long and ous. Mr. Bedetti's playing of Haydn certo was noteworthy for its mellow of tone, its sensitive shading and its of style."

Rig[illegible]USICAL FOLK yes[illegible] attended a luncheon given by Mrs. John A. Drake, of 270 Park Avenue, in honor of the young pianist, Anton Bilotti. In the pictured group are Leopold Godowsky at the piano, Pierre Monteux, Mrs. John Drake, Anton Bilotti, Mrs. Siegfried Wagner, Mr. Siegfried Wagner, Mrs. Leopold Godowsky, Mme. Edouard Bibiliy, Mme. Pierre Monteux and John A. Drake.

Kadel & Herbert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 2 '24

Program Books Will Be Concert Feature

Celebrated Boston Critic, Philip Hale, Analyzes Symphony Orchestra Numbers

A feature of the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium, Wednesday evening, will be the program books.

Now looked upon as inseparable from the Boston Symphony concerts are the program books with full analytical notes by Philip Hale, the celebrated musician, writer, and critic of Boston. It would be hard to find an authority on musical subjects more competent than he in the country. These musical notes furnish complete information regarding the works to be performed, and their composers, at each particular concert. Mr. Hale's "Entr'actes" and "Excursions" make these books as entertaining as they are instructive. At the concert here a copy will be furnished to every one in the audience.

Mail orders for the coming concert continue to pour in at Room 59, City Hall, and many reservations are being received daily, by phone, at the box office between 10.30 and 11.30 a.m. The regular seat sale is scheduled for next Tuesday and Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MME. MONTEUX CALLED TO FRANC

Wife of Conductor of Boston Symph Orchestra Meets with Bereavement Loss of Her Mother

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the ductor of the Boston Symphony Orche has been suddenly called to France, by news of the unexpected death of mother. Mme. Monteux will sail on urday. She came from France only weeks ago, intending to be wit hher band at the close of the Symphony Pierre Monteux is now completing h year term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra and in May w his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 14

MME MONTEUX IS CALLED HOME BY DEATH OF MOTHER

Mme Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the Symphony season.

Pierre Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ONLY APPEARANCE EAST OF HUB WILL BE HERE MARCH 26

Big Demand For Seats, Some in Entire Blocks, Indicates Record Attendance For Pierre Monteux's Last Performance

The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra east of Boston this Winter will be in Portland City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26 at 8, which is to be the tenth and final concert in the present Municipal Music Commission series and the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, conductor. Many people in neighboring cities and towns are planning to attend this concert. School music associations are giving concerts for funds that they may attend en masse and musical societies are negotiating for whole blocks of seats.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has 100 players. It has long ranked ahead of all other organizations of its kind in America, and is by virtue of its supreme qualities, known throughout the world. Its supremacy has been achieved through 43 years of endeavor in which wealth has been extended, high ideals maintained, and the genius of one after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted to the gradual improvement of the ensemble. The most skillful musicians which Europe afforded were induced to join the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is a minimum of change from season to season in its personnel, which enables the orchestra by long association and practice to play with marvelous unanimity.

To hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is a doubly rare experience in that it brings before the auditor the wealth of symphonic music in an ideally perfect presentation. It is now evident in this the fifth and final season that Pierre Monteux has served as conductor, that he is one of the most gifted leaders the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever had. Never have the symphony programs and their performance by the orchestra been more evidently enjoyed and generally praised than under his direction. The year has been for Mr. Monteux a succession of brilliant ovations and farewell appearances in various cities. The present season has proved eminently successful and will go down in musical annals as such. At the opening concerts the ensemble was acclaimed as sounding finer than ever before.

Pierre Monteux has prepared for Portland a program of special interest and the concert promises to be the largest event socially as well as musically which Portland has known thus far this year. Mail orders from many points in Northern New England are being filled. The Music Commission is giving these orders prompt attention and preparations are being made to give local patrons equally good service at the box office City Hall, when the regular seat sale opens next Tuesday morning.

Mail orders should be addressed to Room 59, City Hall. Reservations by phone may be made daily between the hours 10.30-11.30 a. m. No phone orders will be taken after Tuesday.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

4

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
171924

FOR STRAVINSKY, WAGNER, MONTEUX, LAURELS RENEWED

CONDUCTOR AND ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

The Bostonians Make a Notable Visit—An Evening of Wagner and an Afternoon of Stravinsky—The Great Richard and Our Best Musical People—"The Rite of Spring" as Piece of the Year—Praise for Band and Leader

BY agreeing testimony of the New York newspapers, since the days of Dr. Muck, the Boston Orchestra has not so covered itself with glory as at the concerts of Thursday and Saturday last in Carnegie Hall. For the first Mr. Monteux set a programme drawn wholly from the music of Wagner, viz.: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; "Siegfried Idyll"; Isolde's Narrative from the first act of his opera, with Mme. Matzenauer for singer; Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; "Ride of the Valkyrs" from "Die Walküre"; Forest Scene from "Siegfried"; Closing Scene from "Götterdämmerung," again with Mme. Matzenauer for singer. Taking the concert as text for an ironic word about the present status of Wagner among our best musical people, Mr. Gilman is admirably amusing in The Tribune. "There was doubtless a raising of eyebrows among the musical intelligentsia," he begins, "when Mr. Monteux announced that the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York would have an 'All-Wagner' programme. 'All-Wagner' programmes have been hopelessly canaille for some time—meet for the Saturday-night popular concert; for the semi-popular Sunday matinee; but hardly suitable for the better class of orchestral concerts. Mr. Damrosch, to be sure, occasionally stoops to Wagner, and devotes a subscription pair of concerts to excerpts from the once respectable operas and music-dramas. But Mr. Damrosch is a Favorite Son, and may do as he pleases. Mr. Stokowski, too, gives an 'All-Wagner' programme at his subscription concerts in Philadelphia at least once a season; but Mr. Stokowski is a conquering hero, and could get away with a Mendelssohn Cycle, if he chose—the Academy of Music would still be crowded to the chandeliers. The inner gods and the plain mortals of the orchestral world, however, do not often dare to offer their sophisticated subscribers an entire programme of Wagner. Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. van Hoogstraten or Mr. Walter would scarcely venture upon so ungraded an undertaking; and even Mr. Stokowski has never asked his dazzlingly distinguished New York subscribers to defend to an 'All-Wagner' programme. It simply is not done. Wagner is today not merely démodé beyond recovery, but he has sunk to the depths where poor Tschaikovsky dwells, eating out his heart in the sub-cellar of 'The Pathetic.'

"It would be difficult to convey to unsophisticated minds an adequate idea of the degree to which Wagner is despised by the Best People. We were reading the other day an article by a contemporary French critic who thought he had discovered in the music of Monsieur Honegger, one of the forward-looking 'Groupe des Six,' a reminiscence of 'Tristan.' The critic was horrified. No doubt, he observed, Monsieur Honegger was anxious to avoid the ageing impressionism of Debussy; but this should not have driven him to follow so 'insufferable' a model as 'Tristan'; 'that,' he remarked, 'is merely to fall from a delicious Scylla into an abominable Charybdis.'

"'An abominable Charybdis.' Alas, poor Wagner! We knew him well—once. But now, when we meet in the public ways a grotesque apparition out of a repudiated past—the short, bandy-legged figure, shambling along in his threadbare cloak with his queer velvet cap, an old score of 'Tristan' under his arm, we hastily cross the street to turn a corner, muttering 'Stravinsky' as a protective talisman, for it does no one any good to be seen with the poor old boy these days. He belongs among the sins of our yeasty youth; he is Old Hat; the crowd has mauled him, made him its vulgar own. We, who have discovered that Stravinsky and Schönberg and Bartók and Varèse are the true Jacobsmen of our own time, have learned that Wagner, though a master in his way—a technical wizard in the manipulation of musical ideas—wrote what Mr. W. J. Turner, the London critic, so felicitously described as 'tawdry rubbish.' 'I hardly like to want to hear it,' says Mr. Turner; 'and then I go unwillingly! I have little innate sympathy with it'—a temperate statement of a typical point of view.

"No doubt, as Maurice Rollinat sang, il faut mourir. And yet . . . and yet—

Toujours, tout au fond de mon ame,
Là, dans le coin des vieux effrois,
J'entends gémir, comme autrefois,
Sa cornemuse.

"We of us cannot forget it, cannot escape it. There, in the deep places of the spirit, we hear it always. For some of us it is one of the most beautiful, the most moving, the most nobly passionate of all music—music of an incomparable intensity, an incomparable distinction. . . .

"If Mr. Monteux hoped to lure the Wagnites from their dugouts, his wish was granted. They were there in battalions—the hall has not been so full, apparently, since Mr. Stravinsky's prehistoric lady-friend was sacrificed to the spring. The Wagnerites were well rewarded. Every number on the programme was first-rate Wagner: the gorgeous, full-blown Wagner who wrote between 1854 and 1874; and Mr. Monteux played the magnificent music as if he believed in its greatness—as if he realized that it is perfectly possible for the Wagnerite and the Stravinskyite to dwell amicably together in the same world. For here, too, there are many mansions. The admirable orchestra displayed again its newly found beauty, its suppleness, its fineness of texture, and won an abundance of well deserved applause."

Regarding the quality of the performance, the reviewers are variously minded. Mr. Chase of The Times found "the splendid orchestra heard to the best advantage in this rich and highly organized music. The balance and technical proficiency of the different choirs, and Mr. Monteux's musicianly fulfillment of his task, made it an evening for Wagnerites to remember." Mr. Taylor in The World makes a reservation, saying: "The brass choir seemed to be suffering a bit from over-confidence. It was mellow and beautiful in the scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' where it was needed, and properly sonorous in the 'Valkyrs' Ride,' but it was entirely too prominent in much of the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger' and quite wrecked the balance of parts in the Bacchanale. Otherwise Mr. Monteux's readings were spirited and warmly colorful, and at times eloquent. He was particularly happy in the Siegfried Idyl, which had beautiful transparency and a quality of tenderness and wistful gayety that carried one irresistibly back to one morning at Wahnfried that saw the first performance." Mr. Henderson, writing in The Herald, seems to have caught an echo of the Monteux-Schnéevoigt controversy still raging in this town; for he judges the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra over-mild. "It was in the idyllic tribute to Frau Cosima and her interesting offspring that Mr. Monteux was happiest. This Wagnerian 'Sinfonia Domestica' touched apparently a tender spot in the interpreter's heart, which vibrated sympathetically with the gentle murmurs of the slumber-motive and the twilight suggestions of the bird-theme. In the Bacchanale there was beauty of tone. The Boston Orchestra made sweet Venusberg sounds and one felt that the dance was picturesque and rhythmic without being too disturbing."

On Saturday Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," repeated by general request, filled half the concert, with Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's Concerto for Violoncello—and Mr. Bedetti—as preliminary numbers. A paragraph from The World of yesterday efficiently summarizes the occasion:

If Pierre Monteux ever had a doubts about the drawing power of "Le Sacre du Printemps" they were dispelled by the mob which stormed the doors of Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The house from orchestra to gallery had been sold out for weeks in advance and a patient and determined throng of standees overflowed from the aisles to the lobby. They had their reward in a performance of the remarkable ballet which was as vigorous and urgent as on the night of its introduction several weeks ago. As the season shapes itself, the music and its presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra emerge as the most significant in all its changing weeks and it is happily a significance which has not been lost on New York concert-goers. Saturday's crowd is revealed as that rarest of rare spectacles—an overflowing audience attracted not by the reputation of the orchestra or the personality of the performer but on the sheer merits of a single number of the programme.

In The Herald Mr. Henderson writes a Coda as follows: "To one hearing 'Le Sacre' came a second time with just as much over-mastering force as it broke on the first time. Up to this day and hour Stravinsky's tone-poem is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats æsthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity and Mr. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority. It should be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of Schumann's symphony. The applause after it was long and vociferous. Mr. Bedetti's playing of Haydn's Concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive shading and its perfection of style."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Program Books Will Be Concert Feature

Celebrated Boston Critic, Philip Hale, Analyzes Symphony Orchestra Numbers

A feature of the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium, Wednesday evening, will be the program books.

Now looked upon as inseparable from the Boston Symphony concerts are the program books with full analytical notes by Philip Hale, the celebrated musician, writer, and critic of Boston. It would be hard to find an authority on musical subjects more competent than he in the country. These musical notes furnish complete information regarding the works to be performed, and their composers, at each particular concert. Mr. Hale's "Entr'actes" and "Excursions" make these books as entertaining as they are instructive. At the concert here a copy will be furnished to every one in the audience.

Mail orders for the coming concert continue to pour in at Room 59, City Hall, and many reservations are being received daily, by phone, at the box office between 10.30 and 11.30 a.m. The regular seat sale is scheduled for next Tuesday and Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MME. MONTEUX CALLED TO FRANC

Wife of Conductor of Boston Symph Orchestra Meets with Bereavement Loss of Her Mother

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the c ductor of the Boston Symphony Orches has been suddenly called to France, by news of the unexpected death of mother. Mme. Monteux will sail on urday. She came from France only weeks ago, intending to be wit hher band at the close of the Symphony Pierre Monteux is now completing h year term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra and in May w his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

MME MONTEUX IS CALLED HOME BY DEATH OF MOTHER

Mme Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the Symphony season.

Pierre Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ONLY APPEARANCE EAST OF HUB WILL BE HERE MARCH 26

Big Demand For Seats, Some in Entire Blocks, Indicates Record Attendance For Pierre Monteux's Last Performance

The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra east of Boston this Winter will be in Portland City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26 at 8, which is to be the tenth and final concert in the present Municipal Music Commission series and the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, conductor. Many people in neighboring cities and towns are planning to attend this concert. School music associations are giving concerts for funds that they may attend en masse and musical societies are negotiating for whole blocks of seats.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has 100 players. It has long ranked ahead of all other organizations of its kind in America, and is by virtue of its supreme qualities, known throughout the world. Its supremacy has been achieved through 43 years of endeavor in which wealth has been extended, high ideals maintained, and the genius of one after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted to the gradual improvement of the ensemble. The most skillful musicians which Europe afforded were induced to join the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is a minimum of change from season to season in its personnel, which enables the orchestra by long association and practice to play with marvelous unanimity.

To hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is a doubly rare experience in that it brings before the auditor the wealth of symphonic music in an ideally perfect presentation. It is now evident in this the fifth and final season that Pierre Monteux has served as conductor, that he is one of the most gifted leaders the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever had. Never have the symphony programs and their performance by the orchestra been more evidently enjoyed and generally praised than under his direction. The year has been for Mr. Monteux a succession of brilliant ovations and farewell appearances in various cities. The present season has proved eminently successful and will go down in musical annals as such. At the opening concerts the ensemble was acclaimed as sounding finer than ever before.

Pierre Monteux has prepared for Portland a program of special interest and the concert promises to be the largest event socially as well as musically which Portland has known thus far this year. Mail orders from many points in Northern New England are being filled. The Music Commission is giving these orders prompt attention and preparations are being made to give local patrons equally good service at the box office City Hall, when the regular seat sale opens next Tuesday morning.

Mail orders should be addressed to Room 59, City Hall. Reservations by phone may be made daily between the hours 10.30-11.30 a. m. No phone orders will be taken after Tuesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MUSICAL FOLK yesterday attended a luncheon given by Mrs. John A. Drake, of 270 Park Avenue, in honor of the young pianist, Anton Bilotti. In the pictured group are Leopold Godowsky at the piano, Pierre Monteux, Mrs. John Drake, Anton Bilotti, Mrs. Siegfried Wagner, Mr. Siegfried Wagner, Mrs. Leopold Godowsky, Mme. Edouard Bibilly, Mme. Pierre Monteux and John A. Drake.

Kadel & Herbert.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

4 THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

FOR STRAVINSKY, WAGNER, MONTEUX, LAURELS RENEWED

CONDUCTOR AND ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK

The Bostonians Make a Notable Visit—An Evening of Wagner and an Afternoon of Stravinsky—The Great Richard and Our Best Musical People—"The Rite of Spring" as Piece of the Year—Praise for Band and Leader

BY agreeing testimony of the New York newspapers, since the days of Dr. Muck, the Boston Orchestra has not so covered itself with glory as at the concerts of Thursday and Saturday last in Carnegie Hall. For the first Mr. Monteux set a programme drawn wholly from the music of Wagner, viz.: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; "Siegfried Idyll"; Isolde's Narrative from the first act of his opera, with Mme. Matzenauer for singer; Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; "Ride of the Valkyrs" from "Die Walküre"; Forest Scene from "Siegfried"; Closing Scene from "Götterdämmerung," again with Mme. Matzenauer for singer. Taking the concert as text for an ironic word about the present status of Wagner among our best musical people, Mr. Gilman is admirably amusing in The Tribune. "There was doubtless a raising of eyebrows among the musical intelligentsia," he begins, "when Mr. Monteux announced that the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York would have an 'All-Wagner' programme. 'All-Wagner' programmes have been hopelessly canaille for some time—meet for the Saturday-night popular concert; for the semi-popular Sunday matinee; but hardly suitable for the better class of orchestral concerts. Mr. Damrosch, to be sure, occasionally stoops to Wagner, and devotes a subscription pair of concerts to excerpts from the once respectable operas and music-dramas. But Mr. Damrosch is a Favorite Son, and may do as he pleases. Mr. Stokowski, too, gives an 'All-Wagner' programme at his subscription concerts in Philadelphia at least once a season. Mr. Stokowski is a conquering hero, and could get away with a Mendelssohn Cycle, if he chose—the Academy of Music would still be crowded to the chandeliers. The lesser gods and the plain mortals of the orchestral world, however, do not often dare to offer their sophisticated subscribers an entire programme of Wagner. Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. van Hoogstraten or Mr. Walter would scarcely venture upon so degraded an undertaking; and even Mr. Stokowski has never asked his dazzlingly distinguished New York subscribers to defend to an 'All-Wagner' programme. It simply is not done. Wagner is today not merely démodé beyond recovery, but has sunk to the depths where poor Tschaikovsky dwells, eating out his heart in the sub-cellar of 'The Pathetic.'

"It would be difficult to convey to unsophisticated minds an adequate idea of the degree to which Wagner is despised by the Best People. We were reading the other day an article by a contemporary French critic who thought he had discovered in the music of Monsieur Honegger, one of the forward-looking 'Groupe des Six,' a reminiscence of 'Tristan.' The critic was horrified. No doubt, he observed, Monsieur Honegger was anxious to avoid the ageing impressionism of Debussy; but this should not have driven him to follow so 'insufferable' a model as 'Tristan'; 'that,' he remarked, 'is merely to fall from a delicious Scylla into an abominable Charybdis.'

"'An abominable Charybdis.' Alas, poor Wagner! We knew him well—once; but now, when we meet in the public way that grotesque apparition out of a repudiated past—the short, bandy-legged figure, shambling along in his threadbare cloak, his queer velvet cap, an old score of 'Tristan' under his arm, we hastily cross the street to turn a corner, muttering 'Stravinsky' as a protective talisman, for it does no one any good to be seen with the poor old boy these days. He belongs among the sins of our yeasty youth; he is Old Hat; the crowd has mauled him, made him its vulgar own. We, who have discovered that Stravinsky and Schönberg and Bartók and Varèse are the true Tonkesmen of our own time, have learned that Wagner, though a master in his way—a technical wizard in the manipulation of certain ideas—wrote what Mr. W. J. Turner, the London critic, so felicitously described as 'tawdry rubbish.' 'I hardly like to want to hear it,' says Mr. Turner; 'and when I go unwillingly I have little innate sympathy with it'—a temperate statement and a typical point of view.

"No doubt, as Maurice Kollinat sang, il faut mourir. And yet . . . and yet—

> Toujours, tout au fond de mon ame,
> Là, dans le coin des vieux effrois,
> J'entends gémir, comme autrefois,
> Sa cornemuse.

"One of us cannot forget it, cannot escape it; there, in the deep places of the spirit, we hear it always. For some of us it is still the most beautiful, the most moving, the most nobly passionate of all music—music of an incomparable intensity, an incomparable distinction. . . .

"If Mr. Monteux hoped to lure the Wagnerites from their dugouts, his wish was granted. They were there in battalions—the hall has not been so full, apparently, since Mr. Stravinsky's prehistoric lady-friend was sacrificed to the spring. The Wagnerites were well rewarded. Every number on the programme was first-rate Wagner: the gorgeous, full-blown Wagner who wrote between 1854 and 1874; and Mr. Monteux played the magnificent music as if he believed in its greatness—as if he realized that it is perfectly possible for the Wagnerite and the Stravinskyite to dwell amicably together in the same world. For here, too, there are many mansions. The admirable orchestra displayed again its newly found beauty, its suppleness, its fineness of texture, and won an abundance of well deserved applause."

Regarding the quality of the performance, the reviewers are variously minded. Mr. Chase of The Times found "the splendid orchestra heard to the best advantage in this rich and highly organized music. The balance and technical proficiency of the different choirs, and Mr. Monteux's musicianly fulfillment of his task, made it an evening for Wagnerites to remember." Mr. Taylor in The World makes a reservation, saying: "The brass choir seemed to be suffering a bit from over-confidence. It was mellow and beautiful in the scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' where it was needed, and properly sonorous in the 'Valkyrs' Ride,' but it was entirely too prominent in much of the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger' and quite wrecked the balance of parts in the Bacchanale. Otherwise Mr. Monteux's readings were spirited and warmly colorful, and at times eloquent. He was particularly happy in the Siegfried Idyl, which had beautiful transparency and a quality of tenderness and wistful gayety that carried one irresistibly back to one morning at Wahnfried that saw the first performance." Mr. Henderson, writing in The Herald, seems to have caught an echo of the Monteux-Schnéevoigt controversy still raging in this town; for he judges the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra over-mild. "It was in the idyllic tribute to Frau Cosima and her interesting offspring that Mr. Monteux was happiest. This Wagnerian 'Sinfonia Domestica' touched apparently a tender spot in the interpreter's heart, which vibrated sympathetically with the gentle murmurs of the slumber-motive and the twilight suggestions of the bird-theme. In the Bacchanale there was beauty of tone. The Boston Orchestra made sweet Venusberg sounds and one felt that the dance was picturesque and rhythmic without being too disturbing."

On Saturday Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," repeated by general request, filled half the concert with Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's Concerto for Violoncello—and Mr. Bedetti—as preliminary numbers. A paragraph from The World of yesterday efficiently summarizes the occasion:

> If Pierre Monteux ever had any doubts about the drawing power of "Le Sacre du Printemps" they were dispelled by the mob which stormed the doors of Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The house from orchestra to gallery had been sold out for weeks in advance and a patient and determined throng of standees overflowed from the aisles to the lobby. They had their reward in a performance of the remarkable ballet which was as vigorous and urgent as on the night of its introduction several years ago. As the season shapes itself, this music and its presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra emerge as the most significant in all its changing weeks and it is happily a significance which has not been lost on New York concert-goers. Saturday's crowd is revealed as that rarest of rare spectacles—an overflowing audience attracted not by the reputation of the orchestra or the personality of the performer but on the sheer merits of a single number of the programme.

In The Herald Mr. Henderson writes of it as follows: "To one hearer 'Le Sacre' came a second time with just as much over-mastering force as it broke on the first time. Up to this day and hour Stravinsky's tone-poem is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats esthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity, and Mr. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority. It should be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of Schumann's symphony in B flat. The applause after it was long and enthusiastic. Mr. Bedetti's playing of Haydn's violoncello concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive shading and its perfection of style."

Right MUSICAL FOLK yesterday attended a luncheon given by Mrs. John A. Drake, of 270 Park Avenue, in honor of the young pianist, Anton Bilotti. In the pictured group are Leopold Godowsky at the piano, Pierre Monteux, Mrs. John Drake, Anton Bilotti, Mrs. Siegfried Wagner, Mr. Siegfried Wagner, Mrs. Leopold Godowsky, Mme. Edouard Bibilly, Mme. Pierre Monteux and John A. Drake.

Kadel & Herbert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Program Books Will Be Concert Feature

Celebrated Boston Critic, Philip Hale, Analyzes Symphony Orchestra Numbers

A feature of the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium, Wednesday evening, will be the program book.

Now looked upon as inseparable from the Boston Symphony concerts are the program books with full analytical notes by Philip Hale, the celebrated musician, writer, and critic of Boston. It would be hard to find an authority on musical subjects more competent than he in the country. These musical notes furnish complete information regarding the works to be performed, and their composers, at each particular concert. Mr. Hale's "Entr'actes" and "Excursions" make these books as entertaining as they are instructive. At the concert here a copy will be furnished to every one in the audience.

Mail orders for the coming concert continue to pour in at Room 59, City Hall, and many reservations are being received daily by phone, at the box office between 10.30 and 11.30 a. m. The regular seat sale is scheduled for next Tuesday and Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MME. MONTEUX CALLED TO FRANCE

Wife of Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Meets with Bereavement—Loss of Her Mother

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme. Monteux will sail on Saturday. She came from France only two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the Symphony season.

Pierre Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

MME MONTEUX IS CALLED HOME BY DEATH OF MOTHER

Mme Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the Symphony season.

Pierre Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S ONLY APPEARANCE EAST OF HUB WILL BE HERE MARCH 26

Big Demand For Seats, Some in Entire Blocks, Indicates Record Attendance For Pierre Monteux's Last Performance

The only appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra east of Boston this Winter will be in Portland City Hall auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 26 at 8, which is to be the tenth and final concert in the present Municipal Music Commission series and the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, conductor. Many people in neighboring cities and towns are planning to attend this concert. School music associations are giving concerts for funds that they may attend en masse and musical societies are negotiating for whole blocks of seats.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has 100 players. It has long ranked ahead of all other organizations of its kind in America, and is by virtue of its supreme qualities, known throughout the world. Its supremacy has been achieved through 43 years of endeavor in which wealth has been extended, high ideals maintained, and the genius of one after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted to the gradual improvement of the ensemble. The most skillful musicians which Europe afforded were induced to join the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is a minimum of change from season to season in its personnel, which enables the orchestra by long association and practice to play with marvelous unanimity.

To hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is a doubly rare experience in that it brings before the auditor the wealth of symphonic music in an ideally perfect presentation. It is now evident in this the fifth and final season that Pierre Monteux has served as conductor, that he is one of the most gifted leaders the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever had. Never have the symphony programs and their performance by the orchestra been more evidently enjoyed and generally praised than under his direction. The year has been for Mr. Monteux a succession of brilliant ovations and farewell appearances in various cities. The present season has proved eminently successful and will go down in musical annals as such. At the opening concerts the ensemble was acclaimed as sounding finer than ever before.

Pierre Monteux has prepared for Portland a program of special interest and the concert promises to be the largest event socially as well as musically which Portland has known thus far this year. Mail orders from many points in Northern New England are being filled. The Music Commission is giving these orders prompt attention and preparations are being made to give local patrons equally good service at the box office City Hall, when the regular seat sale opens next Tuesday morning.

Mail orders should be addressed to Room 59, City Hall. Reservations by phone may be made daily between the hours 10.30-11.30 a. m. No phone orders will be taken after Tuesday.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 20 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

Called Back to France by Death

(Photo by Bachrach)
MME. PIERRE MONTEUX

MRS. MONTEUX SAILS SATURDAY

Mother's Sudden Death Calls Symphony Director's Wife Home

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme. Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the symphony season. M. Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 21 1924

High School Students To Hear Symphony

Famous Boston Organization Coming Here March 26 Eagerly Awaited

To many music lovers in Portland and surrounding towns, the great annual musical event of the season is the coming to Portland of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is an event looked forward to all Winter—the bright and joyous spot in the dubious month of March, for it is at this time of year that the orchestra always makes its visit.

To this concert the musically inclined students of the high schools are taken by their teachers, orchestra men, music teachers and members of musical organizations order seats singly and in groups for the great educational opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra right at home, or near home, is not to be missed.

Wednesday, March 26, is the date of the concert this year in Portland City Hall auditorium, it being the tenth and final in the municipal course. Advance reservations are already being made for this concert. The regular seat sale will be next Tuesday and Wednesday at City Hall box office.

BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
MAR 21 1924

IME. MONTEUX'S MOTHER IS DEAD

Because of the sudden death of er mother, Mme. Pierre Monteux, fe of the conductor of the Boston ymphony Orchestra, has been called France. Mme. Monteux will sail aturday. She came from France vo weeks ago, intending to be with er husband at the close of the mphony season. M. Monteux is ompleting his five-year term as onductor of the Boston brchestra. May he will join his family in rance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 21

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT'S FAVORITE

A number played in his honor and a wreath placed at the conductor's stand while it was played were the marks of respect paid to Dr Charles W. Eliot at the Boston Symphony concert in Saunders Theatre, Cambridge, last night.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written to Dr Eliot expressing the desire of Mr Monteux to play one of his favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert to be given on his birthday. Dr Eliot replied in part as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony Orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

The number played as one of Dr Eliot's favorites was Wagner's Overture to Tannhaeuser.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

Muical Events

The musical events of the season of 1923-1924 are nearly all completed and this season has been one of great interest in this line. The last regular Municipal Organ Concert will be held at City Hall next Thursday evening when many will avail themselves of the opportunity of seeing Pierre Montieux lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time. Thursday morning the regular meeting of the Rossini Club will be held at Frye Hall and this will be a program presented by the student members. The last program by the Rossini Club will be presented Thursday, April 10 and this will be the annual request program when the numbers which have been so much enjoyed by the regular attendants will be presented again. The final concert in the Steinert course, which has proved most popular, will be presented at City Hall. Friday evening, April 11. There have been many excellent musical attractions this season under the auspices of the local musical organizations and the real music lovers always sense a feeling of disappointment when the musical programs draw to a close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

3 Day Seat Sale For Symphony Concert

Time Extended By Music Commission Because Of Demand For Tickets

It is announced by the Portland Music Commission today that the regular seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall next Wednesday evening, will open Monday morning at 9 o'clock and will continue Tuesday and Wednesday. The demand for seats is so widespread and the number of mail orders is so large that it has been decided to have the seat sale for three days, as it is apparent that the immense volume of patronage cannot be taken care of at the box office in two days, according to the original plan. Reservations may be made by phone today between the huors of 10.30-11.30 a. m., and all day Monday (7807?) but orders by phone cannot be handled Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 21 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING IN SPECIAL CAR NEXT WEDNESDAY

Mme. Delcourt Will Be Heard Here Again

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 performers has one woman member, Mme. Lucille Delcourt, harpist, is a fact little known and will be of interest to many in the large audience now booking for the concert at which this world famous organization will appear in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission next Wednesday evening at 8. Mme. Delcourt has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nearly five seasons. She is the wife of the eminent French conductor, whose name she bears, and has played all over Europe. Although there is nothing unusual in a woman harpist in a symphony orchestra it is somewhat out of the ordinary to be the only woman in a large orchestra such as the Boston Symphony.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Portland in the special car in which they travel and will arrive here Wednesday afternoon. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, and the leaders of the various sections of the orchestra will be at the Lafayette Hotel for dinner and the short time they will remain in the City. The orchestra will return to Boston following the close of the concert.

There is much discussion just now about Sacre du Printemps, a remarkable Russian score, which Pierre Monteux has introduced and has had to repeat recently in Boston and New York. This score, the title of which interpreted means Rite of Spring, is indeed called one of the most remarkable scores of the 20th century. It is by Stravinsky, the Russian composer, and sets a precedent in the development of rhythm, complexity and in harmonic and contrapuntal daring. This difficult score, which few conductors have even attempted, had its first performance under the direction of Pierre Monteux in the season before the war in Paris and London, both in ballet and concert form. The first performance in Paris caused a riot in the audience similar to that of the premiere of Tannhauser in the same city. Since then, the supreme beauty and brilliance of this music has come to be recognized in Europe, and at the present time it is predicted by musical authorities that this may be remembered later as the most conspicuous achievement of Mr. Monteux's term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which terminates at the end of the present season.

In this connection a sentence may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks questioning the coming of Serge Kusevitzky to Boston next Autumn as conductor of the Boston Symphony. On September 15 he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work in Boston, and in all probability he will be heard in Portland a year from now.

Mail orders for seats for the concert next week are being received at room 59, City Hall. The program was never better for a record breaking audience. The regular seat sale will open next Tuesday morning.

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
MAR 22 1924

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation, who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable, although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

S. M.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23

Last reports
the desired $95,0
the deficit for t
Boston Symphony
scribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

With Moritz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, as soloist, Pierre Monteux will conduct the last Boston Symphony concert here, which will also be his last appearance in Brooklyn at the head of the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 4.

At the coming concert, he will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and will close it with Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem." This music of the noted late Russian composer is divided into three sections, entitled, "Struggles," "Sensu... of Beauty" and "Divine Acti...

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 22

JASCHA HEIFETZ ON AMBITION VS. TALENTS.

Jascha Heifetz, the impeccable and brilliant Russian violinist who will play here on Tuesday, April 1st, at the Russell theater, makes the assertion that usually one's ambitions must bow to one's talents.

And when one ponders over the question one must come to the conclusion that Mr. Heifetz is absolutely correct in his assertion; only, perhaps, that Mr. Heifetz is ultra-conservative in using the word "usually."

"Ambition is a queer thing. It's strange how many people always want to be what they could never be," muses Mr. Heifetz. "We always want to be something other than that which our destinies call us."

But the music-loving public should be thankful that people rarely achieve their early ambitions—for Jascha Heifetz would today probably be a poor starving author

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

utterly unknown. Mr. Heifetz himself confesses to an early intense desire and ambition to be a writer.

Mr. Heifetz further explains how, after one has begun exercising one's talents, he can then create a desire and ambition to further himself in his respective talent. And to carry this point Mr. Heifetz says that now his principal desire is to keep developing his art of violin playing.

The perfection of detail so constantly apparent in the playing of Jascha Heifetz is no less everything to which he gives a thought. His dress, his studio appointments, his correspondence, even down to the autographing of a picture, nicety and exactness a certain natural elegance attend each undertaking. The capacity for taking pains to the utmost is Heifetz' most striking characteristic; nothing on earth can induce him to hurry over a detail.

The capacity for taking pains! There is in this trait of Heifetz', which he has in common with all the really great artists, an admirable lesson for the aspiring musician. Many a student with considerable talent and real natural aptitude, fails to attain perfection because he is not willing to take "pains to the utmost." Is it not pitiful to see the possessor of outstanding gifts forever steeped in mediocrity because he has failed to understand that nothing worth while can be got without an infinite amount of painstaking work?

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 23 1924

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall Wednesday evening will be one of the most largely attended, fashionable and important events of the spring months. Incidentally it will mark Monteaux's last appearance as conductor, as his contract with the Boston Symphony closes next June and his successor Serge Koussevitzky, will commence his duties with the orchestra in the autumn.

This will be the last concert of the Municipal Organ Course.

The program will doubtless be exceedingly choice, as Conductor Monteaux has devoted the past Summer to searching through Europe for new scores. The orchestra personnel remains the same.

This is the fifth season that Portland has heard the orchestra conducted by the noted French director.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 20 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

Called Back to France by Death

(Photo by Bachrach)
MME. PIERRE MONTEUX

MRS. MONTEUX SAILS SATURDAY

Mother's Sudden Death Calls Symphony Director's Wife Home

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme. Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the symphony season. M. Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

High School Students To Hear Symphony

Famous Boston Organization Coming Here March 26 Eagerly Awaited

To many music lovers in Portland and surrounding towns, the great ann al musical event of the season is the coming to Portland of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is an event looked forward to all Winter—the bright and jouous spot in the dubious month of March, for it is at this time of year that the orchestra always makes its visit.

To this concert the musically inclined students of the high schools are taken by their teachers, orchestra men, music teachers and members of musical organizations order seats singly and in groups for the great educational opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra right at home, or near home, is not to be missed.

Wednesday, March 26, is the date of the concert this year in Portland City Hall auditorium, it being the tenth and final in the municipal course. Advance reservations are already being made for this concert. The regular seat sale will be next Tuesday and Wednesday at City Hall box office.

BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
MAR 21 1924

IME. MONTEUX'S MOTHER IS DEAD

Because of the sudden death of er mother, Mme. Pierre Monteux, fe of the conductor of the Boston ymphony Orchestra, has been called France. Mme. Monteux will sail turday. She came from France wo weeks ago, intending to be with er husband at the close of the ymphony season. M. Monteux is ompleting his five-year term as onductor of the Boston brchestra. May he will join his family in rance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 21

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT'S FAVORITE

A number played in his honor and a wreath placed at the conductor's stand while it was played were the marks of respect paid to Dr Charles W. Eliot at the Boston Symphony concert in Saunders Theatre, Cambridge, last night.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written to Dr Eliot expressing the desire of Mr Monteux to play one of his favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert to be given on his birthday. Dr Eliot replied in part as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony Orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

The number played as one of Dr Eliot's favorites was Wagner's Overture to Tannhaeuser.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING IN SPECIAL CAR NEXT WEDNESDAY

Mme. Delcourt Will Be Heard Here Again

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 performers has one woman member, Mme. Lucille Delcourt, harpist, is a fact little known and will be of interest to many in the large audience now booking for the concert at which this world famous organization will appear in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission next Wednesday evening at 8. Mme. Delcourt has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nearly five seasons. She is the wife of the eminent French conductor, whose name she bears, and has played all over Europe. Although there is nothing unusual in a woman harpist in a symphony orchestra it is somewhat out of the ordinary to be the only woman in a large orchestra such as the Boston Symphony.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Portland in the special car in which they travel and will arrive here Wednesday afternoon. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, and the leaders of the various sections of the orchestra will be at the Lafayette Hotel for dinner and the short time they will remain in the City. The orchestra will return to Boston following the close of the concert.

There is much discussion just now about Sacre du Printemps, a remarkable Russian score, which Pierre Monteux has introduced and has had to repeat recently in Boston and New York. This score, the title of which interpreted means Rite of Spring, is indeed called one of the most remarkable scores of the 20th century. It is by Stravinsky, the Russian composer, and sets a precedent in the development of rhythmic complexity and in harmonic and contrapuntal daring. This difficult score, which few conductors have even attempted, had its first performance under the direction of Pierre Monteux in the season before the war in Paris and London, both in ballet and concert form. The first performance in Paris caused a riot in the audience similar to that of the premiere of Tannhauser in the same city. Since then, the supreme power and brilliance of this music has come to be recognized in Europe, and at the present time it is predicted by musical authorities that this may be remembered later as the most conspicuous achievement of Mr. Monteux's term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which terminates at the end of the present season.

In this connection a sentence may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks questioning the coming of Serge Kusevitzky to Boston next Autumn as conductor of the Boston Symphony. On September he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work in Boston, and in all probability he will be heard in Portland a year from now.

Mail orders for seats for the concert next week are being received in room 59, City Hall. The program was never better for a record breaking audience. The regular seat sale will open next Tuesday morning.

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
C S Monitor
MAR 22 1924

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation, who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable, although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

S. M.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23

Last reports
the desired $95,0
the deficit for t
Boston Symphon
scribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

With Moritz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, as soloist, Pierre Monteux will conduct the last Boston Symphony concert here, which will also be his last appearance in Brooklyn at the head of the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 4.

At the coming concert, he will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and will close it with Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem." This music of the noted late Russian composer is divided into three sections entitled, "Struggles," "Sensu[ality]" "Beauty" and "Divine Act[ivity]"

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 22

JASCHA HEIFETZ ON AMBITIONS VS. TALENTS.

Jascha Heifetz, the impeccable and brilliant Russian violinist who will play here on Tuesday, April 1st, at the Russell theater, makes the assertion that usually one's ambitions must bow to one's talents.

And when he ponders over the question one must come to the conclusion that Mr. Heifetz is absolutely correct in his assertion; only, perhaps, that Mr. Heifetz is ultra-conservative in using the word "usually."

"Ambition is a queer thing. It's strange how many people always want to be what they could never be," muses Mr. Heifetz. "We always want to be something other than that which our destinies call us."

But the music-loving public should be thankful that people rarely achieve their early ambitions—for Jascha Heifetz would today, probably, be a poor starving author

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

utterly unknown. Mr. Heifetz himself confesses to an early intense desire and ambition to be a writer.

Mr. Heifetz further explains how after one has begun exercising one's talents, he can then create a desire and ambition to further himself in his respective talent. And to carry this point Mr. Heifetz says that now his principal desire is to keep developing his art of violin playing.

The perfection of detail so constantly apparent in the playing of Jascha Heifetz is no less everything to which he gives a thought. His dress, his studio appointments, his correspondence, even down to the autographing of a picture, nicety and exactness a certain natural elegance attend each undertaking. The capacity for taking pains to the utmost is Heifetz' most striking characteristic; nothing on earth can induce him to hurry over a detail.

The capacity for taking pains! There is in this trait of Heifetz', which he has in common with all the really great artists, an admirable lesson for the aspiring musician. Many a student with considerable talent and real natural aptitude, fails to attain perfection because he is not willing to take "pains to the utmost." Is it not pitiful to see the possessor of outstanding gifts forever steeped in mediocrity because he has failed to understand that nothing worth while can be got without an infinite amount of painstaking work?

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 23 1924

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall Wednesday evening will be one of the most largely attended, fashionable and important events of the spring months. Incidentally it will mark Monteaux's last appearance as conductor, as his contract with the Boston Symphony loses next June and his successor Serge Koussevitzky, will commence his duties with the orchestra in the autumn.

This will be the last concert of the Municipal Organ Course.

The program will doubtless be exceedingly choice, as Conductor Monteaux has devoted the past Summer to searching through Europe for new scores. The orchestra personnel remains the same.

This is the fifth season that Portland has heard the orchestra conducted by the noted French director.

Muical Events

The musical events of the season of 1923-1924 are nearly all completed and this season has been one of great interest in this line. The last regular Municipal Organ Concert will be held at City Hall next Thursday evening when many will avail themselves of the opportunity of seeing Pierre Montieux lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time. Thursday morning the regular meeting of the Rossini Club will be held at Frye Hall and this will be a program presented by the student members. The last program by the Rossini Club will be presented Thursday, April 10 and this will be the annual request program when the numbers which have been so much enjoyed by the regular attendants will be presented again. The final concert in the Steinert course, which has proved most popular, will be presented at City Hall. Friday evening, April 11. There have been many excellent musical attractions this season under the auspices of the local musical organizations and the real music lovers always sense a feeling of disappointment when the musical programs draw to a close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

3 Day Seat Sale For Symphony Concert

Time Extended By Music Commission Because Of Demand For Tickets

It is announced by the Portland Music Commission today that the regular seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall next Wednesday evening, will open Monday morning at 9 o'clock and will continue Tuesday and Wednesday. The demand for seats is so widespread and the number of mail orders is so large that it has been decided to have the seat sale for three days, as it is apparent that the immense volume of patronage cannot be taken care of at the box office in two days, according to the original plan. Reservations may be made by phone today between the huors of 10.30-11.30 a. m., and all day Monday (78072) but orders by phone cannot be handled Tuesday and W[ednesday]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 20 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

Called Back to France by Death

(Photo by Bachrach)
MME. PIERRE MONTEUX

MRS. MONTEUX SAILS SATURDAY

Mother's Sudden Death Calls Symphony Director's Wife Home

Mme. Pierre Monteux, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been suddenly called to France by the news of the unexpected death of her mother. Mme. Monteux will sail Saturday. She came from France two weeks ago, intending to be with her husband at the close of the symphony season. M. Monteux is completing his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In May he will join his family in France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

High School Students To Hear Symphony

Famous Boston Organization Coming Here March 26 Eagerly Awaited

To many music lovers in Portland and surrounding towns, the great annual musical event of the season is the coming to Portland of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is an event looked forward to all Winter—the bright and jouous spot in the dubious month of March, for it is at this time of year that the orchestra always makes its visit.

To this concert the musically inclined students of the high schools are taken by their teachers, orchestra men, music teachers and members of musical organizations order seats singly and in groups for the great educational opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra right at home, or near home, is not to be missed.

Wednesday, March 26, is the date of the concert this year in Portland City Hall auditorium, it being the tenth and final in the municipal course. Advance reservations are already being made for this concert. The regular seat sale will be next Tuesday and Wednesday at City Hall box office.

BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
MAR 21

IME. MONTEUX'S MOTHER IS DEAD

Because of the sudden death of er mother, Mme. Pierre Monteux, fe of the conductor of the Boston ymphony Orchestra, has been called France. Mme. Monteux will sail aturday. She came from France wo weeks ago, intending to be with er husband at the close of the ymphony season. M. Monteux is ompleting his five-year term as onductor of the Boston orchestra. May he will join his family in rance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 21

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT'S FAVORITE

A number played in his honor and a wreath placed at the conductor's stand while it was played were the marks of respect paid to Dr Charles W. Eliot at the Boston Symphony concert in Saunders Theatre, Cambridge, last night.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written to Dr Eliot expressing the desire of Mr Monteux to play one of his favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert to be given on his birthday. Dr Eliot replied in part as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony Orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

The number played as one of Dr Eliot's favorites was Wagner's Overture to Tannhaeuser.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

Muical Events

The musical events of the season of 1923-1924 are nearly all completed and this season has been one of great interest in this line. The last regular Municipal Organ Concert will be held at City Hall next Thursday evening when many will avail themselves of the opportunity of seeing Pierre Montieux lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time. Thursday morning the regular meeting of the Rossini Club will be held at Frye Hall and this will be a program presented by the student members. The last program by the Rossini Club will be presented Thursday, April 10 and this will be the annual request program when the numbers which have been so much enjoyed by the regular attendants will be presented again. The final concert in the Steinert course, which has proved most popular, will be presented at City Hall. Friday evening, April 11. There have been many excellent musical attractions this season under the auspices of the local musical organizations and the real music lovers always sense a feeling of disappointment when the musical programs draw to a close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

3 Day Seat Sale For Symphony Concert

Time Extended By Music Commission Because Of Demand For Tickets

It is announced by the Portland Music Commission today that the regular seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall next Wednesday evening, will open Monday morning at 9 o'clock and will continue Tuesday and Wednesday. The demand for seats is so widespread and the number of mail orders is so large that it has been decided to have the seat sale for three days, as it is apparent that the immense volume of patronage cannot be taken care of at the box office in two days, according to the original plan. Reservations may be made by phone today between the huors of 10.30-11.30 a. m., and all day Monday (78072) but orders by phone cannot be handled Tuesday and W[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 21 19

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING IN SPECIAL CAR NEXT WEDNESDAY

Mme. Delcourt Will Be Heard Here Again

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 performers has one woman member, Mme. Lucille Delcourt, harpist, is a fact little known and will be of interest to many in the large audience now booking for the concert at which this world famous organization will appear in City Hall auditorium, under the auspices of the Music Commission next Wednesday evening at 8. Mme. Delcourt has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nearly five seasons. She is the wife of the eminent French conductor, whose name she bears, and has played all over Europe. Although there is nothing unusual in a woman harpist in a symphony orchestra it is somewhat out of the ordinary to be the only woman in a large orchestra such as the Boston Symphony.

The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Portland in the special car in which they travel and will arrive here Wednesday afternoon. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, and the leaders of the various sections of the orchestra will be at the Lafayette Hotel for dinner and the short time they will remain in the City. The orchestra will return to Boston following the close of the concert.

There is much discussion just now about Sacre du Printemps, a remarkable Russian score, which Pierre Monteux has introduced and has had to repeat recently in Boston and New York. This score, the title of which interpreted means Rite of Spring, is indeed called one of the most remarkable scores of the 20th century. It is by Stravinsky, the Russian composer, and sets a precedent in the development of rhythm, complexity and in harmonic and contrapuntal daring. This difficult score, which few conductors have even attempted, had its first performance under the direction of Pierre Monteux in the season before the war in Paris and London, both in ballet and concert form. The first performance in Paris caused a riot in the audience similar to that of the premiere of Tannhauser in the same city. Since then, the supreme fire and brilliance of this music has come to be recognized in Europe, and at the present time it is predicted by musical authorities that this may be remembered later as the most conspicuous achievement of Mr. Monteux's term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which terminates at the end of the present season.

In this connection a sentence may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks questioning the coming of Serge Kusevitzky to Boston next Autumn as conductor of the Boston Symphony. On September he embarks at Cherbourg on Aquitania en route to New York Boston. By the middle of that m he will be at work in Boston, a all probability he will be hea Portland a year from now.

Mail orders for seats for the cert next week are being receiv room 59, City Hall. The pro was never better for a record b ing audience. The regular seat will open next Tuesday mornin

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
C S Monitor
MAR 22 1924

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation, who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable, although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

S. M.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

Last reports
the desired $95,0
the deficit for t
Boston Symphony
scribed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

With Moritz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, as soloist, Pierre Monteux will conduct the last Boston Symphony concert here, which will also be his last appearance in Brooklyn at the head of the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 4.

At the coming concert, he will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and will close it with Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem." This music of the noted late Russian composer is divided into three sections, entitled, "Struggles," "Sensu[illegible] and Beauty" and "Divine Acti[illegible]

CLIPPING FROM
OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 22

JASCHA HEIFETZ ON AMBITIONS VS. TALENTS.

Jascha Heifetz, the impeccable and brilliant Russian violinist who will play here on Tuesday, April 1st, at the Russell theater, makes the assertion that usually one's ambitions must bow to one's talents.

And when he ponders over the question one must come to the conclusion that Mr. Heifetz is absolutely correct in his assertion; only, perhaps, that Mr. Heifetz is ultra-conservative in using the word "usually."

"Ambition is a queer thing. It's strange how many people always want to be what they could never be," muses Mr. Heifetz. "We always want to be something other than that which our destinies call us."

But the music-loving public should be thankful that people rarely achieve their early ambitions—for Jascha Heifetz would today probably, be a poor starving author, utterly unknown. Mr. Heifetz himself confesses to an early intense desire and ambition to be a writer.

Mr. Heifetz further explains how, after one has begun exercising one's talents, he can then create a desire and ambition to further himself in his respective talent. And to carry this point Mr. Heifetz says that now his principal desire is to keep developing his art of violin playing.

The perfection of detail so constantly apparent in the playing of Jascha Heifetz is no less everything to which he gives a thought. His dress, his studio appointments, his correspondence, even down to the autographing of a picture, nicety and exactness a certain natural elegance attend each undertaking. The capacity for taking pains to the utmost is Heifetz' most striking characteristic; nothing on earth can induce him to hurry over a detail.

The capacity for taking pains! There is in this trait of Heifetz', which he has in common with all the really great artists, an admirable lesson for the aspiring musician. Many a student with considerable talent and real natural aptitude, fails to attain perfection because he is not willing to take "pains to the utmost." Is it not pitiful to see the possessor of outstanding gifts forever steeped in mediocrity because he has failed to understand that nothing worth while can be got without an infinite amount of painstaking work?

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
MAR 23

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at City Hall Wednesday evening will be one of the most largely attended, fashionable and important events of the spring months. Incidentally it will mark Monteaux's last appearance as conductor, as his contract with the Boston Symphony closes next June and his successor Serge Koussevitzky, will commence his duties with the orchestra in the Autumn.

This will be the last concert of the Municipal Organ Course.

The program will doubtless be exceedingly choice, as Conductor Monteaux has devoted the past Summer to searching through Europe for new scores. The orchestra personnel remains the same.

This is the fifth season that Portland has heard the orchestra conducted by the noted French director.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
MAR 23 1924

Russian Is Well Represented On Week's Symphony Programs

...ongestion of a Stravinsky festi- ...appears in the orchestral programs the coming week, with four per- ...rmances of "Le Chant du Rossignol" Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Fri- ...; Mr. Damrosch repeating the work request with the New York Sym- ...ony, while Mr. Mengelberg will in- ...oduce it to Philharmonic subscribers. ...o days earlier Mr. Stokowski will ...ay the Russian's "L'Oiseau de Feu" ...its at the eighth concert of the ...hiladelphia Orchestra's subscription ...eries. Meanwhile, the League of Com- ...posers is giving his "L'Historie du ...oldat" to-night.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, back from its two weeks' tour and again under the baton of Walter Damrosch, will give its last Aeolian Hall concert of the season but one this afternoon with two soloists: Marcel Grandjany, the French harpist, who will give Roger-Ducasse's Variations Plaisantes for harp and orchestra, and Nadia Reisenberg, presenting the first New York performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's piano concerto. Two more soloists will be heard in the season's final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond in the Brahms double concerto for violin and cello.

Two new works by Gustav Holst will be produced for the first time in America by Mr. Damrosch at the New York Symphony's last subscription concert of the season at Aeolian Hall next Sunday afternoon. These are a Fugal Concerto for flute and oboe and the ballet music from "The Perfect Fool." The New York Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert for students in high school orchestras Tuesday afternoon at De Witt Clinton High School, when Mr. Damrosch will conduct a program of numbers which the high school orchestras have been studying during the winter.

Mischa Levitzki will be the soloist with the Philharmonic Society both this afternoon at Carnegie Hall and on Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Opera House, playing the Schumann concerto to-day and the fourth piano concerto of Saint-Saens on Tuesday.

Besides the Stravinsky "Le Chant du Rossignol," a feature of the Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Philharmonic concerts will be Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," first performed last season by the Philharmonic under Mr. Stransky. The Beethoven Fourth Symphony will complete Mr. Mengelberg's list. The last of this season's students' concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, April 2, when the Goldmark Rhapsody will be repeated and Samuel Gardner will play the solo part in his own violin concerto. The Philharmonic will conclude its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon with a program including the Goldmark Rhapsody, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

The Philharmonic Orchestra and the Schola Cantorum will give a Bach Cantata and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony under Mr. Mengelberg at the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday afternoon, April 13, and at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, the 17th.

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," will have its second performance here on Tuesday at Carnegie Hall, opening the Philadelphia Orchestra's program. The Stravinsky "Fire Bird" music and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will follow. The Taylor suite will also be played at the next concert of the American National Orchestra, conducted by Howard Barlow, on April 2.

Pierre Monteux will make his farewell appearances in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this season. Moriz Rosenthal will play Chopin's E minor concerto on Thursday evening, April 3, while the purely orchestral numbers will be the Franck symphony and three overtures: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

On Saturday afternoon, April 5, Mr. Monteux's final program will include De Falla's "Gardens of Spain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
MAR 23 1924

DAY

A program replete with variety and interest will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last concert of the Music League Series in the E. F. Albee Theatre this afternoon at three o'clock.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens' concerto for the instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tckaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally, Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23 1924

This afternoon offers two concerts; one by the Boston Symphony at the Albee Theatre under the auspices of the Providence Music League, when the performance is for industrial people only, and the second by the Verdandi chorus at the Strand Theatre, when Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. In addition, to-night a grand opera concert will be heard at Ellis Auditorium.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
ILL.
STATE REGISTER
MAR 21 1924

"MUSICAL AMERICA" IN PRAISE OF LOCAL GIRL

The concert of the Boston Symphony, the fourth of its series, drew a full house to Infantry Hall on Feb. 26. Mozart's Symphony in C, Charpentier's Suite, "Impressions of Italy," and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23, were the features of the fine program, conducted admirably by Pierre Monteux, and warmly applauded. Carol Robinson, of Springfield, Ill., pianist, was the soloist in the concerto, and her fine interpretation of the work created a deep impression. She was recalled again and again.—"Musical America."

HEIFETZ LEAVES FOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

RUSSIAN PROMISES THRILL TO BOSTON MUSIC LOVERS

Modern Music, Heretofore Unheard Here, to Be Introduced Next Season by New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZY, NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

PARIS, March—"You don't know how happy I am to go to America and especially to Boston," said Serge Koussevitzky, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the best in the world and know that the population of Boston is more musically interested than anywhere in the United States. I shall conduct in Boston more than 30 concerts during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the sixteenth century and 1923.

"In fact," he continued, "I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation."

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tvers in the Northern part of Russia in 1874. When he was 12 years old he conducted his own little orchestra in his native town. When he was 18, he went to Moscow to study at the Imperial Musical Conservatory. The famous Russian, Ranbaussek, became his teacher and after four years' study he appeared as a soloist at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, playing the double bass. He is today recognized as the foremost player of double bass in Europe.

Leads Moscow Orchestra

In 1907, Mr Koussevitzky went to Berlin and formed his own orchestra at the Musical High School in the German capital. For more than two years he gave concerts all over Germany, mainly with classical repertoire. In 1910 he went back to Moscow where he formed his own orchestra of 80 to 125 members and a chorus of 250. For nearly 10 years he was the head of this orchestra, giving concerts in Moscow every week and festivals at Petrograd. In between he made trips all over Europe, conducting in Scandinavia, Germany, England, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera house are regarded as the musical event of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last season conducting 10 concerts of the Scottish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

Has New Music

"Isn't it funny"—says Mr Koussevitzky—"I have been on my way to America four times before; for the first time, in 1908, and the last time in 1916, and always there came something in the way. In 1916 I had ticket and everything packed; I was just leaving for the station to go to New York via Japan and San Francisco; when I ger during the Bolshevik regime was a close friend of mine and my orchestra studied the symphony as the commposer wrote it; I was able to give it only a week after the composer had written the last notes and we had a tremendous success with it in Moscow.

"Another very talented Russian composer Myakovski has written wonderful symphonies of which I hope to be able to give at least one in Boston during the coming season.

"During the war we were prevented from giving any German music whatsoever with the exception of Beethoven and consequently we conductors had to find some music as a substitute for the German.

Bolsheviks' Offer

"Is it true that the Bolshevists made you Musical Commissary in 1916?"

"Yes, they wanted me to accept the position, but I did not. When Kerensky became Prime Minister he offered me full powers with regard to all musical questions in Russia; for a while I considered his generous offer, but realized that it would interfere too much with my work as conductor of the Moscow Orchestra. I, therefore, did not accept. Challapin, famous operatic bass, later accepted the post.

"I remained two years in Russia during the Bolshevik regime and gave my concerts just as under the Tzarist regime, only the public had changed. Of course the Russian composers had a very hard time during the two first years under the Soviets and no music of importance was written. Everybody was too much occupied with looking after the daily bread. I made concert tours all over the different provinces in Russia. Of course the people in charge of the official positions were not the same as before and the demands put by them before the conductors were sometimes of a strange nature. I remember once in Nijni-Novgorod the Mayor requested me to place the harpsichord on the conducting platform so that everybody in the concert house could see how it was played, as the public was very much interested in that instrument, which most of them had never seen before.

"Of course strange things would happen under the Tsar regime as well. I remember when giving a concert in the same town before the war, it was on the Tzar's anniversary and the Governor of the State with his whole family were present. The concert was just to start when a special request from the Governor came ordering me to play the National hymn three times before I started the concert. I asked if once would not do and the Governor, after carefully inspecting the audience, answered that as there seemed to be in the audience greater number of cultivated persons than usual once would be sufficient.

"But now don't let us talk about the past any more. Next week I am leaving for London to conduct a series of concerts there and to terminate my negotiations in regard to the opera season under the British Empire exhibition, London this Sum-

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23 1924

...ierre Monteux and the Boston Sym- ...hony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens's concerto for that instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" ...ymphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

* * *

Pierre Monteux

Directs Boston Symphony at Albee This Afternoon

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
MAR 23 1924

Music World Thrilled by Pagan Rites

Tumultuous Russian Music Finds Popularity in East—Philadelphia Not Slow.

By W. J. Henderson.

New York, March 22.—M. Monteux repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie hall.

It was the last number on the program, and was preceded by Schumann's symphony in D minor and a gentle cello concerto of Haydn performed by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra. Without doubt Stravinsky's tumultuous and savage delineation of pagan rites in ancient Russia amazed some of the conservative subscribers to the Boston symphony afternoons. One was heard to remark: "All that, and they killed only one girl!" For the scenes painted by the composer end with a dance of death by a maiden marked for sacrifice.

Supreme Artistry.

Up to this day Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats aesthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of its brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity, and M. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority.

It must be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of the Schumann symphony, also. The applause was long and vigorous. Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Haydn concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive nuancing and its repose of style.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
MAR 23 1924

Russian Is Well Represented On Week's Symphony Programs

...uggestion of a Stravinsky festi- ... appears in the orchestral programs ... the coming week, with four per- ...rmances of "Le Chant du Rossignol" ... Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Fri- ...y, Mr. Damrosch repeating the work ... request with the New York Sym- ...ony, while Mr. Mengelberg will in- ...oduce it to Philharmonic subscribers. ...wo days earlier Mr. Stokowski will ...ay the Russian's "L'Oiseau de Feu" ...ike at the eighth concert of the ...hiladelphia Orchestra's subscription ...eries. Meanwhile, the League of Com- ...osers is giving his "L'Historie du ...oldat" to-night.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, back from its two weeks' tour and again under the baton of Walter Damrosch, will give its last Aeolian Hall concert of the season but one this afternoon with two soloists: Marcel Grandjany, the French harpist, who will give Roger-Ducasse's Variations Plaisantes for harp and orchestra, and Nadia Reisenberg, presenting the first New York performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's piano concerto. Two more soloists will be heard in the season's final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond in the Brahms double concerto for violin and cello.

Two new works by Gustav Holst will be produced for the first time in America by Mr. Damrosch at the New York Symphony's last subscription concert of the season at Aeolian Hall next Sunday afternoon. These are a Fugal Concerto for flute and oboe and the ballet music from "The Perfect Fool." The New York Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert for students in high school orchestras Tuesday afternoon at De Witt Clinton High School, when Mr. Damrosch will conduct a program of numbers which the high school orchestras have been studying during the winter.

Mischa Levitzki will be the soloist with the Philharmonic Society both this afternoon at Carnegie Hall and on Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Opera House, playing the Schumann concerto to-day and the fourth piano concerto of Saint-Saens on Tuesday.

Besides the Stravinsky "Le Chant du Rossignol," a feature of the Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Philharmonic concerts will be Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," first performed last season by the Philharmonic under Mr. Stransky. The Beethoven Fourth Symphony will complete Mr. Mengelberg's list. The last of this season's students' concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, April 2, when the Goldmark Rhapsody will be repeated and Samuel Gardner will play the solo part in his own violin concerto. The Philharmonic will conclude its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon with a program including the Goldmark Rhapsody, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

The Philharmonic Orchestra and the Schola Cantorum will give a Bach Cantata and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony under Mr. Mengelberg at the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday afternoon, April 13, and at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, the 17th.

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," will have its second performance here on Tuesday at Carnegie Hall, opening the Philadelphia Orchestra's program. The Stravinsky "Fire Bird" music and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will follow. The Taylor suite will also be played at the next concert of the American National Orchestra, conducted by Howard Barlow, on April 2.

Pierre Monteux will make his farewell appearances in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this season. Moriz Rosenthal will play Chopin's E minor concerto on Thursday evening, April 3, while the purely orchestral numbers will be the Franck symphony and three overtures: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

On Saturday afternoon, April 5, Mr. Monteux's final program will include De Falla's "Gardens of Spain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

DAY

A program replete with variety and interest will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last concert of the Music League Series in the E. F. Albee Theatre this afternoon at three o'clock.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens' concerto for the instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tckaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally, Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

This afternoon offers two concerts; one by the Boston Symphony at the Albee Theatre under the auspices of the Providence Music League, when the performance is for industrial people only, and the second by the Verdandi chorus at the Strand Theatre, when Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. In addition, to-night a grand opera concert will be heard at Elks Auditorium.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
ILL.
STATE REGISTER
MAR 22 1924

"MUSICAL AMERICA" IN PRAISE OF LOCAL GIRL

The concert of the Boston Symphony, the fourth of its series, drew a full house to Infantry Hall on Feb. 26. Mozart's Symphony in C, Charpentier's Suite, "Impressions of Italy," and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23, were the features of the fine program, conducted admirably by Pierre Monteux, and warmly applauded. Carol Robinson, of Springfield, Ill., pianist, was the soloist in the concerto, and her fine interpretation of the work created a deep impression. She was recalled again and again.—"Musical America."

HEIFETZ LEAVES FOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

RUSSIAN PROMISES THRILL TO BOSTON MUSIC LOVERS

Modern Music, Heretofore Unheard Here, to Be Introduced Next Season by New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZY, NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

PARIS, March — "You don't know how happy I am to go to America and especially to Boston," said Serge Koussevitzky, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the best in the world and know that the population of Boston is more musically interested than anywhere in the United States. I shall conduct in Boston more than 30 concerts during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the sixteenth century and 1923.

"In fact," he continued, "I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation."

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tvers in the Northern part of Russia in 1874. When he was 12 years old he conducted his own little orchestra in his native town. When he was 18, he went to Moscow to study at the Imperial Musical Conservatory. The famous Russian, Ranbaussek, became his teacher and after four years' study he appeared as a soloist at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, playing the double bass. He is today recognized as the foremost player of double bass in Europe.

Leads Moscow Orchestra

In 1907, Mr Koussevitzky went to Berlin and formed his own orchestra at the Musical High School in the German capital. For more than two years he gave concerts all over Germany, mainly with classical repertoire. In 1910 he went back to Moscow where he formed his own orchestra of 80 to 125 members and a chorus of 250. For nearly 10 years he was the head of this orchestra, giving concerts in Moscow every week and festivals at Petrograd. In between he made trips all over Europe, conducting in Scandinavia, Germany, England, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera house are regarded as the musical event of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last season conducting 10 concerts of the Scottish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

Has New Music

"Isn't it funny"—says Mr Koussevitzky—"I have been on my way to America four times before; for the first time, in 1908, and the last time in 1916, and always there came something in the way. In 1916 I had ticket and everything packed; I was just leaving for the station to go to New York via Japan and San Francisco; when I ger during the Bolshevik regime was a close friend of mine and my orchestra studied the symphony as the commposer wrote it; I was able to give it only a week after the composer had written the last notes and we had a tremendous success with it in Moscow.

"Another very talented Russian composer Myakovski has written wonderful symphonies of which I hope to be able to give at least one in Boston during the coming season.

"During the war we were prevented from giving any German music whatsoever with the exception of Beethoven and consequently we conductors had to find some music as a substitute for the German.

Bolsheviks' Offer

"Is it true that the Bolshevists made you Musical Commissary in 1916?"

"Yes, they wanted me to accept the position, but I did not. When Kerensky became Prime Minister he offered me full powers with regard to all musical questions in Russia; for a while I considered his generous offer, but realized that it would interfere too much with my work as conductor of the Moscow Orchestra. I, therefore, did not accept. Chaliapin, famous operatic bass, later accepted the post.

"I remained two years in Russia during the Bolshevik regime and gave my concerts just as under the Tzarist regime, only the public had changed. Of course the Russian composers had a very hard time during the two first years under the Soviets and no music of importance was written. Everybody was too much occupied with looking after the daily bread. I made concert tours all over the different provinces in Russia. Of course the people in charge of the official positions were not the same as before and the demands put by them before the conductors were sometimes of a strange nature. I remember once in Nijni-Novgorod the Mayor requested me to place the harpsichord on the conducting platform so that everybody in the concert house could see how it was played, as the public was very much interested in that instrument, which most of them had never seen before.

"Of course strange things would happen under the Tsar regime as well. I remember when giving a concert in the same town before the war, it was on the Tzar's anniversary and the Governor of the State with his whole family were present. The concert was just to start when a special request from the Governor came ordering me to play the National hymn three times before I started the concert. I asked if once would not do and the Governor, after carefully inspecting the audience, answered that as there seemed to be in the audience greater number of cultivated persons than usual once would be sufficient.

"But now don't let us talk about the past any more. Next week I am leaving for London to conduct a series of concerts there and to terminate my negotiations in regard to the opera season under the British Empire exhibition, London this Sum-

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

...ierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens's concerto for that instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"

Pierre Monteux

Directs Boston Symphony at Albee This Afternoon

...ymphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

Music World Thrilled by Pagan Rites

Tumultuous Russian Music Finds Popularity in East—Philadelphia Not Slow.

By W. J. Henderson.

New York, March 22.—M. Monteux repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie hall.

It was the last number on the program, and was preceded by Schumann's symphony in D minor and a gentle cello concerto of Haydn performed by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra. Without doubt Stravinsky's tumultuous and savage delineation of pagan rites in ancient Russia amazed some of the conservative subscribers to the Boston symphony afternoons. One was heard to remark: "All that, and they killed only one girl!" For the scenes painted by the composer end with a dance of death by a maiden marked for sacrifice.

Supreme Artistry.

Up to this day Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats aesthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of its brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity, and M. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority.

It must be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of the Schumann symphony, also. The applause was long and vigorous. Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Haydn concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive nuancing and its repose of style.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
MAR 23 1924

Russian Is Well Represented On Week's Symphony Programs

Suggestion of a Stravinsky festi- appears in the orchestral programs the coming week, with four per- rmances of "Le Chant du Rossignol" Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Fri- y; Mr. Damrosch repeating the work request with the New York Sym- ony, while Mr. Mengelberg will in- oduce it to Philharmonic subscribers. o days earlier Mr. Stokowski will ay the Russian's "L'Oiseau de Feu" ite at the eighth concert of the hiladelphia Orchestra's subscription eries. Meanwhile, the League of Com- sers is giving his "L'Histoire du oldat" to-night.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, ack from its two weeks' tour and gain under the baton of Walter Dam- osch, will give its last Aeolian Hall oncert of the season but one this fternoon with two soloists: Marcel Grandjany, the French harpist, who ill give Roger-Ducasse's Variations Plaisantes for harp and orchestra, and adia Reisenberg, presenting the first New York performance of Rimsky- Korsakoff's piano concerto. Two more oloists will be heard in the season's inal pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, Paul Kochanski and Felix Sal- mond in the Brahms double concerto for violin and cello.

Two new works by Gustav Holst will be produced for the first time in Amer- a by Mr. Damrosch at the New York Symphony's last subscription concert of the season at Aeolian Hall next Sun- day afternoon. These are a Fugal Con- certo for flute and oboe and the ballet music from "The Perfect Fool." The New York Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert for students in high school orchestras Tuesday afternoon at De Witt Clinton High School, when Mr. Damrosch will con- duct a program of numbers which the high school orchestras have been studying during the winter.

Mischa Levitzki will be the soloist with the Philharmonic Society both this afternoon at Carnegie Hall and on Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Opera House, playing the Schumann concerto to-day and the fourth piano concerto of Saint-Saens on Tuesday.

Besides the Stravinsky "Le Chant du Rossignol," a feature of the Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Philhar- monic concerts will be Rubin Gold- mark's "A Negro Rhapsody," first per- formed last season by the Philhar- monic under Mr. Stransky. The Beet- hoven Fourth Symphony will complete Mr. Mengelberg's list. The last of this season's students' concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, April 2, when the Goldmark Rhapsody will be repeated and Samuel Gardner will play the solo part in his own violin concerto. The Philharmonic will conclude its Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music next Sunday afternoon with a program including the Goldmark Rhapsody, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

The Philharmonic Orchestra and the Schola Cantorum will give a Bach Cantata and the Beethoven Ninth Sym- phony under Mr. Mengelberg at the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday afternoon, April 13, and at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, the 17th.

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," will have its second performance here on Tuesday at Car- negie Hall, opening the Philadelphia Orchestra's program. The Stravinsky "Fire Bird" music and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will follow. The Tay- lor suite will also be played at the next concert of the American National Orchestra, conducted by Howard Bar- low, on April 2.

Pierre Monteux will make his fare- well appearances in New York as con- ductor of the Boston Symphony Or- chestra at its last pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this season. Moriz Rosenthal will play Chopin's E minor concerto on Thursday evening, April 3, while the purely orchestral num- bers will be the Franck symphony and three overtures: Mendelssohn's "Mid- summer Night's Dream," Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Wagner's "Tann- häuser."

On Saturday afternoon, April 5, Mr. Monteux's final program will include De Falla's "Gardens of Spain" and Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Di- vine Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
MAR 23 1924

DAY

A program replete with variety and interest will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last concert of the Music League Series in the E. F. Albee Theatre this afternoon at three o'clock.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Sym- phony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens' concerto for the instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's inci- dental music to Shakespeare's "A Mid- summer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tckaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally, Wag- ner's Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23 1924

This afternoon offers two concerts; one by the Boston Symphony at the Albee Theatre under the auspices of the Provi- dence Music League, when the perform- ance is for industrial people only, and the second by the Verdandi chorus at the Strand Theatre, when Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. In addition, to-night a grand opera concert will be heard at Elks Auditorium.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
ILL.
STATE REGISTER
MAR 21 1924

"MUSICAL AMERICA" IN PRAISE OF LOCAL GIRL

The concert of the Boston Sym- phony, the fourth of its series, drew a full house to Infantry Hall on Feb. 26. Mozart's Symphony in C, Char- pentier's Suite, "Impressions of Italy," and Tchaikovsky's Piano Con- certo, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23, were the features of the fine program, conducted admirably by Pierre Mon- teux, and warmly applauded. Carol Robinson, of Springfield, Ill., pianist, was the soloist in the concerto, and her fine interpretation of the work created a deep impression. She was recalled again and again.—"Musical America."

HEIFETZ LEAVES FOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

RUSSIAN PROMISES THRILL TO BOSTON MUSIC LOVERS

Modern Music, Heretofore Unheard Here, to Be Introduced Next Season by New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZY, NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

PARIS, March — "You don't know how happy I am to go to America and especially to Boston," said Serge Koussevitzky, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next sea- son. "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the best in the world and know that the population of Bos- ton is more musically interested than anywhere in the United States. I shall conduct in Boston more than 30 con- certs during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the sixteenth century and 1923.

"In fact," he continued, "I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation."

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tvers in the Northern part of Russia in 1874. When he was 12 years old he conducted his own little orchestra in his native town. When he was 18, he went to Moscow to study at the Imperial Musi- cal Conservatory. The famous Russian, Ranbaussek, became his teacher and after four years' study he appeared as a soloist at the Imperial Opera in Mos- cow, playing the double bass. He is today recognized as the foremost player of double bass in Europe.

Leads Moscow Orchestra

In 1907, Mr Koussevitzky went to Berlin and formed his own orchestra at the Musical High School in the German capital. For more than two years he gave concerts all over Germany, mainly with classical repertoire. In 1910 he went back to Moscow where he formed his own orchestra of 80 to 125 members and a chorus of 250. For nearly 10 years he was the head of this orchestra, giving concerts in Moscow every week and festivals at Petrograd. In between he made trips all over Europe, con- ducting in Scandinavia, Germany, Eng- land, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera house are re- garded as the musical event of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last sea- son conducting 10 concerts of the Scot- tish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

Has New Music

"Isn't it funny"—says Mr Kousse- vitzky—"I have been on my way to America four times before; for the first time, in 1908, and the last time in 1916, and always there came something in the way. In 1916 I had ticket and everything packed; I was just leav- ing for the station to go to New York via Japan and San Francisco; when I ger during the Bolshevik regime was a close friend of mine and my orchestra studied the symphony as the commposer wrote it; I was able to give it only a week after the composer had written the last notes and we had a tremendous success with it in Moscow.

"Another very talented Russian com- poser Myakovski has written wonderful symphonies of which I hope to be able to give at least one in Boston during the coming season.

"During the war we were prevented from giving any German music what- soever with the exception of Beethoven and consequently we conductors had to find some music as a substitute for the German.

Bolsheviks' Offer

"Is it true that the Bolshevists made you Musical Commissary in 1916?"

"Yes, they wanted me to accept the po- sition, but I did not. When Kerensky be- came Prime Minister he offered me full powers with regard to all musical ques- tions in Russia; for a while I considered his generous offer, but realized that it would interfere too much with my work as conductor of the Moscow Orchestra. I, therefore, did not accept. Chaliapin famous operatic bass, later accepted the post.

"I remained two years in Russia dur- ing the Bolshevik regime and gave my concerts just as under the Tzarist re- gime, only the public had changed. Of course the Russian composers had very hard time during the two first years under the Soviets and no music of im- portance was written. Everybody was too much occupied with looking after the daily bread. I made concert tours all over the different provinces in Russia. Of course the people in charge of the official positions were not the same as before and the demands put by them before the conductors were sometimes of a strange nature. I remember once in Nijni-Novgorod the Mayor requested me to place the harpsichord on the conducting platform so that every- body in the concert house could see how it was played, as the public was very much interested in that instru- ment, which most of them had never seen before.

"Of course strange things would hap- pen under the Tsar regime as well. I remember when giving a concert in the same town before the war, it was on the Tzar's anniversary and the Gover- nor of the State with his whole family were present. The concert was just to start when a special request from the Governor came ordering me to play the National hymn three times before I started the concert. I asked if once would not do and the Governor, after carefully inspecting the audience, an- swered that as there seemed to be in the audience greater number of culti- vated persons than usual once would be sufficient.

"But now don't let us talk about the past any more. Next week I am leav- ing for London to conduct a series of concerts there and to terminate my negotiations in regard to the opera sea- son under the British Empire exhibition, London this Sum-

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 23 1924

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Sym- phony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens's concerto for that instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"

Pierre Monteux

Directs Boston Symphony at Albee This Afternoon

Symphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" move- ment, and finally Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
MAR 24 1924

Music World Thrilled by Pagan Rites

Tumultuous Russian Music Finds Popularity in East—Philadelphia Not Slow.

By W. J. Henderson.

New York, March 22.—M. Mon- teux repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" at the Boston Sym- phony concert in Carnegie hall.

It was the last number on the pro- gram, and was preceded by Schu- mann's symphony in D minor and a gentle cello concerto of Haydn per- formed by Jean Bedetti, the first cel- list of the orchestra. Without doubt Stravinsky's tumultuous and savage delineation of pagan rites in ancient Russia amazed some of the conserva- tive subscribers to the Boston sym- phony afternoons. One was heard to remark: "All that, and they killed only one girl!" For the scenes paint- ed by the composer end with a dance of death by a maiden marked for sacrifice.

Supreme Artistry.

Up to this day Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats aesthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of its brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuos- ity, and M. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority.

It must be recorded that his audi- ence endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of the Schumann symphony, also. The applause was long and vigorous. Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Haydn concerto was noteworthy for its mel- low beauty of tone, its sensitive nu- ancing and its repose of style.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 22 1924

THE CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

When Arthur Nikisch came from Europe to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and found at the first rehearsal the marvelously perfect instrument which Wilhelm Gericke had left him, he exclaimed, "Now all I have to do is to pectize!"

Pierre Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitsky next autumn under much the same conditions, for the illustrious conductor and splendid musician whose term is to expire next spring is particularly noted for the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his fireless hand has wrought in the four years past. At the close of last season he was praised generally for having set and realized ambitions of executive perfection which are in keeping with the supreme name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through many years.

JASCHA HEIFETZ
Famous Violinist.

Pierre Monteux is making a precedent in the Boston Symphony concerts and in the symphony concerts of America which will be remembered long after he returns to his own country at the conclusion of the present season. His programs are probably unexampled in freedom from routine, in keen espousal of every national school, and in discriminate championship of the newer music still to be recognized.

Five years is a long term of service when compared to those of former Boston Symphony conductors—indeed only those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck have been so long. For his culminating year Pierre Monteux has numerous scores of special interest to put upon his programs. And he has an organization of supreme qualities ready to give this music a wondrously eloquent performance.

Pierre Monteux and his famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Auditorium on Monday, April 21st

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MAR 23 1924

An all-Wagner program that includes neither the "Tristan" prelude nor the "Tannhaeuser" overture is almost unthinkable this season, but such a program Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra accomplished.

The brass section seemed to be suffering a bit from over-confidence last night. Otherwise, Monteux's readings were spirited and warmly colorful, and at times eloquent. He was particularly happy in the Siegfried Idyl, which had beautiful transparence and a quality of tenderness and wistful gayety that carried one irresistibly back to the morning at Wahnfried that saw its first performance.

Stokowski's all-Russian program

DALLAS
TEXAS
NEWS
MAR

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall. It was a one-man program—all Wagner. This kind of entertainment comes upon us often in a musical winter, for the scores of the genius of Baireuth afford fine opportunities for wizards of the baton.

M. Monteux presented the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyll," Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the immolation of Bruennhilde from "Goetterdaemmerung." The s

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EAGLE
MAR 23 1924
Brooklyn, New York

Visiting Orchestras.

Strawinsky's suite, "L'Oiseau de feu" will be the feature of the program which the Philadelphia Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, March 25. By popular request, this number has had two performances in Philadelphia this season. Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven make up the remainder of the program.

Pierre Monteux will make his last appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the closing pair of concerts of the season, which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 3 and 5. Numbers of special interest will be Scriabin's "Divine Poem" and de Falla's "Gardens of Spain," which are to be performed at the Saturday concert. As soloist at the Thursday concert Moriz Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor piano concerto. There will also be played Franck's Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. The remaining matinee numbers will be a suite of Handel and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

(Other Concerts May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LINCOLN

NEB.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

General Music Notes.

The celebrated Finnish musician, George Schneevoigt, appeared recently as guest conductor with the Boston symphony orchestra and is said to have exhibited remarkable emotional intesity in his interpretations of orchestral works.

11,000 people listened to re-

220 WEST 15TH ST., N.Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SAN ANTONIO
TEX.
PRESS
MAR 1924

NEW YORK, March 22.—M. Monteux repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall.

It was the last number on the program and was preceded by Schumann's symphony in D minor and a gentle cello concerto of Haydn performed by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra. Without doubt Stravinsky's tumultuous and savage delineation of pagan rites in ancient Russia amazed some of the conservative subscribers to the Boston Symphony afternoons. One was heard to remark, "All that and they killed only one girl!" For the scenes painted by the composer end with a dance of death by a maiden marked for sacrifice.

Up to this day and date Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats aesthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of its brutal shrieking of elemental things. It wasp layed again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity and M. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority.

It must be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of the Schumann symphony also. The applause after it was long and vigorous. Mr Bedetti's playing of the Haydn concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive nuancing and its repose of style.

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Certain rumors to the effect that Serge Koussevitzky might not after all be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next conductor have now been definitely set at naught.

W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who has been in Paris making final arrangements with Mr. Koussevitzky, cables that the eminent Russian conductor will sail for America on the 4th of next September on the Aquitania. By the middle of that month, then, Mr. Koussevitzky will be in Boston, acquainting himself with the orchestra's library and outlining his programmes for the season to come, which promises to be one of unusual brilliance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SAN ANTONIO
TEX.
PRESS
MAR 23 1924

...anged by Sam Franke.

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall. It was a one man program—all Wagner. This kind of entertainment comes upon us often in a musical winter, for the scores of the genius of Baireuth afford fine opportunities for wizards of the baton.

M. Monteux presented the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyll," Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the immolation of Bruennhilde from "Goetterdaemmerung." The singer was Mme. Matzenaeur of the Metropolitan Opra House.

This was a generous f...st ... Wagnerian excerpts, of which certainly two could be properly dissociated from the theater. The intimate tone poem which Wagner composed for his wife's birthday celebration is connected with the theater only by the use of some thematic material from the drama dealing with the youth of the highest hero of worlds," after whom the master's son was named. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is welcome to the concert hall, even though the beautiful comedy in music does not follow it.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
MAR 24 1924

Boston Symphony Gets Popular Welcome

Albee Theatre Crowded for Final Concert of the Music League Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre yesterday afternoon was accorded the largest popular welcome it ever had in this city. The Albee Theatre, with its spacious seating capacity, proved all too small to accommodate the large attendance of men, women and children, who filled every available space, and kept on arriving until the second number of the program had been played. This was the final concert of the Providence Music League series, and surely it must appear worthwhile to the public spirited citizens who make these concerts possible for those who cannot afford to pay the price of fine concerts.

M. Pierre Monteaux conducted the orchestra, and M. Jeam Bedetti, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was well selected and the feature of it was Tschaikowsky's Symphony in B minor. It opened with Beethoven's "Overture to Egmont" and following this, Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," including a nocturne and a scherzo. Then came the Pathetic Symphony in two movements, which was easily the favorite.

The soloist was heard in the solo parts of Saint-Saen's "Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra," in A minor, op. 33. This is arranged in three movements, and Mr. Bedetti brought out all the beauty with the feeling of the artist and the perfection of the trained musician. The concluding number was Wagner's "Overture to Rienzi."

The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well known and its place in the musical world of the country so well assured that one listens to the smooth and beautiful ensemble work with a delight that is hard to analyze. So well trained and so accustomed to playing together, and under the directing baton of an artist, their music of yesterday was felt and appreciated by even the least trained musically of the large audience. Their concert was a fitting close to a delightful series of concerts, enjoyed by large numbers of people who otherwise would not have had the opportunity to spend Sunday afternoons in so delightful and profitable a manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
MAR 24 1924

CAPACITY AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERTS

The final concert in the series under the auspices of the Providence Music League, held yesterday afternoon at the E. F. Albee Theatre, attracted a capacity audience. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, as soloist, presented the programme. Two movements of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was the feature number with Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and overtures by Beethoven and Wagner completing the list of orchestral works. For his solo number Mr. Bedetti played the brilliant Saint Saens concerto in A-minor.

This is a programme that shows M. Monteux's good judgment in the selection of orchestral music which should make appeal to popular taste and at the same time provide opportunity to hear some of the most interesting works by the great composers represented.

The numbers were arranged as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Incidental music to Shakespeare's play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn Nocturne.
Scherzo.
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, in B-minor, op. 74 (two movements).....Tchaikowsky
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A-minor, op. 33..... Saint-Saens
Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto con moto.
Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

In the two movements from the Tchaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony there is a rich fund of melody, and the scoring has all the beauty and color so characteristic of the Russian composer's writings. They form, perhaps, that portion of the symphony which in melody and rhythm might be expected to prove the more enjoyable to those hearing the work for the first time. Outside of Tchaikowsky's definite programme in descriptive writing in both the "Allegro con grazia" and the following movement, they are delightful music. The graceful flow of melody in the former—soaring over the continual drum beat, and to strange rhythm—holds the interest of the hearer. The latter movement marches with strength and rich harmonic effect, but with a note of foreboding, toward the symphony's final lamentation, which was omitted. At the conclusion of the number the big audience showed its pleasure by recalling the conductor.

There are few selections in orchestral literature that equal in spontaneity and beauty the nocturne of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. It was written when the composer was but a mere lad. There is a dreaminess, a sweetness, a note of tenderness in this little piece that never fails to delight the ear and touch the heart. It was in this incidental music to Shakespeare's play that Mendelssohn first reached the imaginative heights and style which brought him fame. The scherzo, bright and gay, is excellent as a contrast to the nocturne. M. Monteux and his players gave the number an admirable reading.

The Beethoven "Egmont" overture is a familiar number to patrons of symphony concerts. It is one of the composer's finest works of its kind. The Wagner "Rienzi" overture is another piece that is always welcome in a symphony programme, and after its rendition yesterday the audience seemed loth to depart. Were encores customary at Boston Symphony concerts an extra undoubtedly would have followed the enthusiastic applause which greeted it.

Mr. Bedetti played the Saint Saens concerto to the evident pleasure of his hearers. He is a 'cellist whose technical facility and style gains him friends. Yesterday his tone was smooth and pure.

Throughout the concerto his performance was brilliant and effective. He was given good support by M. Monteux and his associates in the orchestra.

Yesterday's concert brought to a close a fine series of concerts. High in artistic merit and education to the big audiences that have attended at a nominal cost, they reflect great credit upon the sponsors of the movement, the Providence Music League.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
MAR 25

PIERRE MONTEUX GUEST AT N. E. CONSERVATORY

A reception to Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, was tendered by the New England Conservatory of Music yesterday afternoon, as an expression of the appreciation of the faculty and students of the Conservatory of Mr Monteux's service to the orchestra and to the city of Boston during the past five years.

In the receiving line with Mr Monteux were George W. Brown, president of the board of trustees, George W. Chadwick, director, and Ralph L. Flanders, general manager. A program of French music was played by an orchestra of conservatory teachers and students, directed by Francis M. Findlay of the faculty.

Many alumni of the school, as well as the student body, were present

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
MAR 22 1924

THE CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

When Arthur Nikisch came from Europe to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and found at the first rehearsal the marvelously perfect instrument which Wilhelm Gericke had left him, he exclaimed, "Now all I have to do is to pestize!"

Pierre Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitsky next autumn under much the same conditions, for the illustrious conductor and splendid musician whose term is to expire next spring is particularly noted for the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his fireless hand has wrought in the four years past. At the close of last season he was praised generally for having set and realised ambitions of executive perfection which are in keeping with the supreme name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through many years.

JASCHA HEIFETZ
Famous Violinist.

Pierre Monteux is making a precedent in the Boston Symphony concerts and in the symphony concerts of America which will be remembered long after he returns to his own country at the conclusion of the present season. His programs are probably unexampled in freedom from routine, in keen espousal of every national school, and in discriminate championship of the newer music still to be recognized.

Five years is a long term of service when compared to those of former Boston Symphony conductors—indeed only those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck have been so long. For his culminating year Pierre Monteux has numerous scores of special interest to put upon his programs. And he has an organization of supreme qualities ready to give this music a wondrously eloquent performance.

Pierre Monteux and his famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Auditorium on Monday, April 21st

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MAR 2 1924

An all-Wagner program that includes neither the "Tristan" prelude nor the "Tannhaeuser" overture is almost unthinkable this season, but such a program Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra accomplished.

The brass section seemed to be suffering a bit from over-confidence last night. Otherwise, Monteux's readings were spirited and warmly colorful, and at times eloquent. He was particularly happy in the Siegfried Idyl, which had beautiful transparence and a quality of tenderness and wistful gayety that carried one irresistibly back to the morning at Wahnfried that saw its first performance.

Stokowski's all-Russian program

DALLAS
TEXAS
NEWS
MAR 23 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall. It was a one-man program—all Wagner. This kind of entertainment comes upon us often in a musical winter, for the scores of the genius of Baireuth afford fine opportunities for wizards of the baton.

M. Monteux presented the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyll," Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the immolation of Bruennhilde from "Goetterdaemmerung." The singer was Mme. Matzenaeur of the Metropolitan Opra House.

This was a generous feast of Wagnerian excerpts, of which certainly two could be properly dissociated from the theater. The intimate tone poem which Wagner composed for his wife's birthday celebration is connected with the theater only by the use of some thematic material from the drama dealing with the youth of the highest hero of worlds," after whom the master's son was named. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is welcome to the concert hall, even though the beautiful comedy in music does not follow it.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Visiting Orchestras.

Strawinsky's suite, "L'Oiseau de feu" will be the feature of the program which the Philadelphia Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, March 25. By popular request, this number has had two performances in Philadelphia this season. Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven make up the remainder of the program.

Pierre Monteux will make his last appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the closing pair of concerts of the season, which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 3 and 5. Numbers of special interest will be Scriabin's "Divine Poem" and de Falla's "Gardens of Spain," which are to be performed at the Saturday concert. As soloist at the Thursday concert Moriz Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor piano concerto. There will also be played Franck's Symphony and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. The remaining matinee numbers will be a suite of Handel and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

(Other Concerts May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LINCOLN

NEB.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR

General Music Notes.

The celebrated Finnish musician, George Schneevoigt, appeared recently as guest conductor with the Boston symphony orchestra and is said to have exhibited remarkable emotional intesity in his interpretations of orchestral works.

11,000 people listened to re-
220 WEST 13TH ST., N.Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SAN ANTONIO
TEX.
PRESS
1924

NEW YORK, March 22.—M. Monteux repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall.

It was the last number on the program and was preceded by Schumann's symphony in D minor and a gentle cello concerto of Haydn performed by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra. Without doubt Stravinsky's tumultuous and savage delineation of pagan rites in ancient Russia amazed some of the conservative subscribers to the Boston Symphony afternoons. One was heard to remark, "All that and they killed only one girl!" For the scenes painted by the composer end with a dance of death by a maiden marked for sacrifice.

Up to this day and date Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is the supreme achievement of the modern realistic school. It beats aesthetic opposition to the ground by the sheer power of its brutal shrieking of elemental things. It was played again by the Bostonians with magnificent virtuosity and M. Monteux again proved that in this type of music he is a conductor of the most brilliant skill and authority.

It must be recorded that his audience endeavored to show him that it believed thoroughly in his reading of the Schumann symphony also. The applause after it was long and vigorous. Mr Bedetti's playing of the Haydn concerto was noteworthy for its mellow beauty of tone, its sensitive nuancing and its repose of style.

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 23 1924

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Certain rumors to the effect that Serge Koussevitzky might not after all be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next conductor have now been definitely set at naught.

W. J. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who has been in Paris making final arrangements with Mr. Koussevitzky, cables that the eminent Russian conductor will sail for America on the 4th of next September on the Aquitania. By the middle of that month, then, Mr. Koussevitzky will be in Boston, acquainting himself with the orchestra's library and outlining his programmes for the season to come, which promises to be one of unusual brilliance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SAN ANTONIO
TEX.
PRESS
MAR 23 1924

...anged by Sam Franke.

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall. It was a one man program—all Wagner. This kind of entertainment comes upon us often in a musical winter, for the scores of the genius of Baireuth afford fine opportunities for wizards of the baton.

M. Monteux presented the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyll," Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the immolation of Bruennhilde from "Goetterdaemmerung." The singer was Mme. Matzenaeur of the Metropolitan Opra House.

This was a generous feast of Wagnerian excerpts, of which certainly two could be properly dissociated from the theater. The intimate tone poem which Wagner composed for his wife's birthday celebration is connected with the theater only by the use of some thematic material from the drama dealing with the youth of the highest hero of worlds," after whom the master's son was named. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is welcome to the concert hall, even though the beautiful comedy in music does not follow it.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
4

Boston Symphony Gets Popular Welcome

Albee Theatre Crowded for Final Concert of the Music League Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre yesterday afternoon was accorded the largest popular welcome it ever had in this city. The Albee Theatre, with its spacious seating capacity, proved all too small to accommodate the large attendance of men, women and children, who filled every available space, and kept on arriving until the second number of the program had been played. This was the final concert of the Providence Music League series, and surely it must appear worthwhile to the public spirited citizens who make these concerts possible for those who cannot afford to pay the price of fine concerts.

M. Pierre Monteaux conducted the orchestra, and M. Jeam Bedetti, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was well selected and the feature of it was Tschaikowsky's Symphony in B minor. It opened with Beethoven's "Overture to Egmont" and following this, Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," including a nocturne and a scherzo. Then came the Pathetic Symphony in two movements, which was easily the favorite.

The soloist was heard in the solo parts of Saint-Saen's "Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra," in A minor, op. 33. This is arranged in three movements, and Mr. Bedetti brought out all the beauty with the feeling of the artist and the perfection of the trained musician. The concluding number was Wagner's "Overture to Rienzi."

The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well known and its place in the musical world of the country so well assured that one listens to the smooth and beautiful ensemble work with a delight that is hard to analyze. So well trained and so accustomed to playing together, and under the directing baton of an artist, their music of yesterday was felt and appreciated by even the least trained musically of the large audience. Their concert was a fitting close to a delightful series of concerts, enjoyed by large numbers of people who otherwise would not have had the opportunity to spend Sunday afternoons in so delightful and profitable a manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
MAR 24 1924

CAPACITY AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERTS

The final concert in the series under the auspices of the Providence Music League, held yesterday afternoon at the E. F. Albee Theatre, attracted a capacity audience. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, as soloist, presented the programme. Two movements of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was the feature number with Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and overtures by Beethoven and Wagner completing the list of orchestral works. For his solo number Mr. Bedetti played the brilliant Saint Saens concerto in A-minor.

This is a programme that shows M. Monteux's good judgment in the selection of orchestral music which should make appeal to popular taste and at the same time provide opportunity to hear some of the most interesting works by the great composers represented.

The numbers were arranged as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Incidental music to Shakespeare's play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn Nocturne.
Scherzo.
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, in B-minor, op. 74 (two movements).....Tchaikowsky
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A-minor, op. 33..... Saint-Saens
Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto con moto.
Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

In the two movements from the Tchaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony there is a rich fund of melody, and the scoring has all the beauty and color so characteristic of the Russian composer's writings. They form, perhaps, that portion of the symphony which in melody and rhythm might be expected to prove the more enjoyable to those hearing the work for the first time. Outside of Tchaikowsky's definite programme in descriptive writing in both the "Allegro con grazia" and the following movement, they are delightful music. The graceful flow of melody in the former—soaring over the continual drum beat, and to strange rhythm—holds the interest of the hearer. The latter movement marches with strength and rich harmonic effect, but with a note of foreboding, toward the symphony's final lamentation, which was omitted. At the conclusion of the number the big audience showed its pleasure by recalling the conductor.

There are few selections in orchestral literature that equal in spontaneity and beauty the nocturne of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. It was written when the composer was but a mere lad. There is a dreaminess, a sweetness, a note of tenderness in this little piece that never fails to delight the ear and touch the heart. It was in this incidental music to Shakespeare's play that Mendelssohn first reached the imaginative heights and style which brought him fame. The scherzo, bright and gay, is excellent as a contrast to the nocturne. M. Monteux and his players gave the number an admirable reading.

The Beethoven "Egmont" overture is a familiar number to patrons of symphony concerts. It is one of the composer's finest works of its kind. The Wagner "Rienzi" overture is another piece that is always welcome in a symphony programme, and after its rendition yesterday the audience seemed loth to depart. Were encores customary at Boston Symphony concerts an extra undoubtedly would have followed the enthusiastic applause which greeted it.

Mr. Bedetti played the Saint Saens concerto to the evident pleasure of his hearers. He is a 'cellist whose technical facility and style gains him friends. Yesterday his tone was smooth and pure.

Throughout the concerto his performance was brilliant and effective. He was given good support by M. Monteux and his associates in the orchestra.

Yesterday's concert brought to a close a fine series of concerts. High in artistic merit and education to the big audiences that have attended at a nominal cost, they reflect great credit upon the sponsors of the movement, the Providence Music League.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
MAR 25

PIERRE MONTEUX GUEST AT N. E. CONSERVATORY

A reception to Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, was tendered by the New England Conservatory of Music yesterday afternoon, as an expression of the appreciation of the faculty and students of the Conservatory of Mr Monteux's service to the orchestra and to the city of Boston during the past five years.

In the receiving line with Mr Monteux were George W. Brown, president of the board of trustees, George W. Chadwick, director, and Ralph L. Flanders, general manager. A program of French music was played by an orchestra of conservatory teachers and students, directed by Francis M. Findlay of the faculty.

Many alumni of the school, as well as the student body were present.

MAR2[illegible]

8

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CITY HALL TOMORROW EVENING
PIERRE MONTEUX IN FAREWELL APPEARANCE AS LEADER

THE WOOD WIND CHOIR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to right (seated)—P. Mimart, bass clarinet; C. Lenom, oboe; F. Mueller, English horn; G. Laurent, first flute; G. Longy, first oboe; A. Sand, first clarinet; A. Laus, first bassoon; L. Speyer, English horn.

Left to right (standing): B. Piller, contra-bassoon; E. Arcieri, clarinet; A. Brooke, flute; H. Stanislaus, oboe; E. Mueller, basson; A. Vannini, clarinet; P. Amerena, flute; F. Bettoney, bassoon; A. Battles, piccolo.

Fortunate is Portland in having the opportunity again to hear in City Hall auditorium tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that alert and plastic ensemble balancing and shading its multifold voices, running the gamut of beauty and power and responsive to every turn of the will of its illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteux.

As that many sided instrument, the orchestra, was last year, so now it is, for its perfection scarcely admits of changes. A few new faces only are to be discovered,—among the horns, in the quartet of flutes, above the chair of the tuba player, among the instruments tinkled or smitten at the will of Brahms or Wagner,—for a Siegfried or for the nymphs of Bohemia's valleys, as the conductor releases and reveals the composers on the local program.

For the fifth time, on this occasion, Pierre Monteux will take the conductor's stand on the platform of City Hall auditorium, yet the aspect of the stage will seem little altered since his first appearance.

The circumstances will be different, however, in that Mr. Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitzky next Autumn and it will therefore be the farewell engagement here of the French leader, whose tireless hand has contributed so materially to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the marvel of America and of the musical world at large.

There are many people in thinking of the conductor of a symphony orchestra, who do not realize the importance of the concert master, as it is interesting to recall in this connection. The conductor commands; the concert master sitting at his left at the front desk of the first violins, is the leading actor in the execution of these commands. If the concert master were to falter which of course never happens the nerves of the entire section would probably respond to the alarm, and the grace, ease and assurance of the ensemble, would be for the moment shattered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a splendid concert master in Richard Bourgin who came from Europe in the Fall of 1920 to take this post. In Eastern Europe where he spent the better part of his career, Bourgin held an enviable reputation. With Heifetz as his fellow pupil and friend he studied four years with the famous Auer. Thus prepared for his career he toured Europe and he has acted as concert master and soloist with the greater symphony orchestras of that part of the world. Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season in Boston, New York and other cities, and also in concerts of his own, he was generally acclaimed as one of the finest masters of the violin now living.

The other leaders of the string section are Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, who likewise came from Europe directly to this post and who is undoubtedly one of the very finest in America; Ferdinand Thillois, the the leader of the second violin section, and Max Kunze, leader of the double brasses, both artists of unusual distinction; and Alfred Holy, the first harp, who is considered one of the most splendid harpists living.

The wood wind choir is probably finer than that of any other orchestra in the world. The most famous member is the first oboist, Georges Longcy, who is named again and again as the greatest living player of this exquisite reed instrument. Georges Laurent holds an equally enviable place among flutists; while Albert Sand, the first clarinet, and Albion Laus, the first bassoon, are treasures in the orchestra which could scarcely be replaced. Of the two English horns, Frederick Mueller and Louis Speyer, it would be difficult to say which is the finer artist. The brass choir also contains many celebrities.

The seat sale today for the local concert has been steady, and the amount of patronage gratifyingly large. The prospects are that the demand will be particularly strong tomorrow, the final day. The balconies are practically sold out, but there are still many good seats on the floor. The box office at City Hall will remain open all day. Orders for reservations by telephone will not be received tomorrow.

Patrons are asked to call for their tickets as early as possible, in order to make as little delay as possible at the box office prior to the concert in the evening.

VERSATILE PROGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

BRASS CHOIR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to right, seated—E. Adam, tuba; J. Mann, trumpet; G. Wendler, first horn; G. Mager, first trumpet; G. Hampe, first trombone; L. Kloepfel, trumpet; C. Van Den Berg, horn.

Left to right, standing—W. Gebhardt, H. Lorbeer, M. Hess, F. Hain, horns; L. Kenfield, trombone; A. Mausebach, trombone; G. Perret, trumpet.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT FAVORITE

Wreath Rest son Conductor's Stand During the Number

As a mark of respect to Dr. Eliot, the Boston Symphony orchestra, at its concert last evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, played Wagner's Overture to Tannhauser, while a wreath rested on the conductor's stand during the number.

Previously, Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written Dr. Eliot expressing the desire of Mr. Monteux to play one of the educator's favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert on the evening of his birthday. Dr. Eliot replied, in part, as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

PORTLAND EVENING

8 BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CITY HALL TOMORROW EVENING
PIERRE MONTEUX IN FAREWELL APPEARANCE AS LEADER

THE WOOD WIND CHOIR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to right (seated)—P. Mimart, bass clarinet; C. Lenom, oboe; F. Mueller, English horn; G. Laurent, first flute; G. Longy, first oboe; A. Sand, first clarinet; A. Laus, first bassoon; L. Speyer, English horn.

Left to right (standing): B. Piller, contra-bassoon; E. Arcieri, clarinet; A. Brooke, flute; H. Stanislaus, oboe; E. Muelier, basson; A. Vannini, clarinet; P. Amerena, flute; F. Bettoney, bassoon; A. Battles, piccolo.

Fortunate is Portland in having the opportunity again to hear in City Hall auditorium tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that alert and plastic ensemble balancing and shading its multifold voices, running the gamut of beauty and power and responsive to every turn of the will of its illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteux.

As that many sided instrument, the orchestra, was last year, so now it is, for its perfection scarcely admits of changes. A few new faces only are to be discovered,—among the horns, in the quartet of flutes, above the chair of the tuba player, among the instruments tinkled or smitten at the will of Brahms or Wagner,—for a Siegfried or for the nymphs of Bohemia's valleys, as the conductor releases and reveals the composers on the local program.

For the fifth time, on this occasion, Pierre Monteux will take the conductor's stand on the platform of City Hall auditorium. Yet the aspect of the stage will seem little altered since the first appearance.

[illegible] will be different, however, in that Mr. Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitzky next Autumn and it will therefore be the farewell engagement here of the French leader whose tireless hand has contributed so materially to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the marvel of America and of the musical world at large.

There are many people in thinking of the conductor of a symphony orchestra, who do not realize the importance of the concert master, as it is interesting to recall in this connection. The conductor commands; the concert master sitting at his left at the front desk of the first violins, is the leading actor in the execution of these commands. If the concert master were to falter which of course never happens the nerves of the entire section would probably respond to the alarm, and the grace, ease and assurance of the ensemble, would be for the moment shattered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a splendid concert master in Richard Bourgin who came from Europe in the Fall of 1920 to take this post. In Eastern Europe where he spent the better part of his career, Bourgin held an enviable reputation. With Heifetz as his fellow pupil and friend he studied four years with the famous Auer. Thus prepared for his career he toured Europe and he has acted as concert master and soloist with the greater symphony orchestras of that part of the world. Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season in Boston, New York and other cities, and also in concerts of his own, he was generally acclaimed as one of the finest masters of the violin now living.

The other leaders of the first section are Jean Poletti, the first cellist, who likewise came from Europe directly to this post and who is undoubtedly one of the very finest in America; Ferdinand Tellefs, the leader of the second violin section, and Max Kunze, leader of the double brasses, both artists of unusual distinction; and Alfred Holy, the first harp, who is considered one of the most splendid harpists [illegible].

The wood wind choir is probably finer than that of any other orchestra in the world. The most famous member is the first oboist, Georges Longy, who is named again and again as the greatest living player of this exquisite reed instrument. Georges Laurent holds an equally enviable place among flutists; while Albert Sand, the first clarinet, and Albien Laus, the first bassoon, are treasures in the orchestra which could scarcely be replaced. Of the two English horns, Frederick Mueller and Louis Speyer, it would be difficult to say which is the finer artist. The brass choir also contains many celebrities.

The seat sale today for the local concert has been steady, and the amount of patronage gratifyingly large. The prospects are that the demand will be particularly strong tomorrow, the final day. The balconies are practically sold out, but there are still many good seats on the floor. The box office at City Hall will remain open all day. Orders for reservations by telephone will not be received tomorrow.

Patrons are asked to call for their tickets as early as possible in order to make as little delay as possible at the box office prior to the concert in the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

BRASS CHOIR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Left to right, seated—E. Adam, tuba; J. Mann, trumpet; G. Wendler, first horn; G. Mager, first trumpet; G. Hampe, first trombone; L. Kloepfel, trumpet; C. Van Den Berg, horn.

Left to right, standing—W. Gebhardt, H. Lorbeer, M. Hess, F. Hain, horns; L. Kenfield, trombone; A. Mausebach, trombone; G. Perret, trumpet.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT FAVORITE

Wreath Rest son Conductor's Stand During the Number

As a mark of respect to Dr. Eliot, the Boston Symphony orchestra, at its concert last evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, played Wagner's Overture to Tannhauser, while a wreath rested on the conductor's stand during the number.

Previously, Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written Dr. Eliot expressing the desire of Mr. Monteux to play one of the educator's favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert on the evening of his birthday. Dr. Eliot replied, in part as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
~~TRIBUNE~~
Journal
MAR 24 1924

SYMPHONY DRAWS CAPACITY AUDIENCE

Two Movements of Tchaikowsky Work Feature Final Concert of Series.

JEAN BEDETTI IS SOLOIST

Boston Orchestra Closes Season That Has Reflected Great Credit on Providence Music League, Movement's Sponsor

The final concert in the series under the auspices of the Providence Music League, held yesterday afternoon at the E. F. Albee Theatre, attracted a capacity audience. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, as soloist, presented the programme. Two movements of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was the feature number with Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and overtures by Beethoven and Wagner completing the list of orchestral works. For his solo number Mr. Bedetti played the brilliant Saint Saens concerto in A-minor.

This is a programme that shows M. Monteux's good judgment in the selection of orchestral music which should make appeal to popular taste and at the same time provide opportunity to hear some of the most interesting works by the great composers represented.

The numbers were arranged as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Incidental music to Shakespeare's play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn Nocturne.
Scherzo.
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, in B-minor, op. 74 (two movements).....Tchaikowsky
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A-minor, op. 33..... Saint-Saens
Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto con moto.
Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

In the two movements from the Tchaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony there is a rich fund of melody, and the scoring has all the beauty and color so characteristic of the Russian composer's writings. They form, perhaps, that portion of the symphony which in melody and rhythm might be expected to prove the more enjoyable to those hearing the work for the first time. Outside of Tchaikowsky's definite programme in descriptive writing in both the "Allegro con grazia" and the following movement, they are delightful music. The graceful flow of melody in the former—soaring over the continual drum beat, and to strange rhythm—holds the interest of the hearer. The latter movement marches with strength and rich harmonic effect, but with a note of foreboding, toward the symphony's final lamentation, which was omitted. At the conclusion of the number the big audience showed its pleasure by recalling the conductor.

There are few selections in orchestral literature that equal in spontaneity and beauty the nocturne of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. It was written when the composer was but a mere lad. There is a dreaminess, a sweetness, a note of tenderness in this little piece that never fails to delight the ear and touch the heart. It was in this incidental music to Shakespeare's play that Mendelssohn first reached the imaginative heights and style which brought him fame. The scherzo, bright and gay, is excellent as a contrast to the nocturne. M. Monteux and his players gave the number an admirable reading.

The Beethoven "Egmont" overture is a familiar number to patrons of symphony concerts. It is one of the composer's finest works of its kind. The Wagner "Rienzi" overture is another piece that is always welcome in a symphony programme, and after its rendition yesterday the audience seemed loth to depart. Were encores customary at Boston Symphony concerts an extra undoubtedly would have followed the enthusiastic applause which greeted it.

Mr. Bedetti played the Saint Saens concerto to the evident pleasure of his hearers. He is a 'cellist whose technical facility and style gains him friends. Yesterday his tone was smooth and pure.

Throughout the concerto his performance was brilliant and effective. He was given good support by M. Monteux and his associates in the orchestra.

Yesterday's concert brought to a close a fine series of concerts. High in artistic merit and education to the big audiences that have attended at a nominal cost, they reflect great credit upon the sponsors of. the movement, the Providence Music League. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
MAR 23 1924

Boston Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie hall. It was a one man program—Al Wagner. This kind of entertainment comes upon us often in a musical winter, for the scores of the genius of Baireuth afford fine opportunities for wizards of the baton.

M. Monteux presented the prelude to "Die Meister-singer," the "Siegfried Idyll," Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweber" from "Siegfried" and the immolation of Bruennhilde from "Goetterdaemmerung." The singer was Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House.

This was a generous feast of Wagnerian excerpts, of which certainly two could be properly dissociated from the theater. The intimato tone poem which Wagner composed for his wife's birthday celebration is connected with the theater only by the use of some thematic material from the drama dealing with the youth of the "highest hero of worlds," after whom the master's son was named. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is welcome to the concert hall, even though the beautiful comedy in music does not follow it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
MAR 25

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, delighted a large audience yesterday at the Providence E. F. Albee Theatre in the final concert of the group held under the auspices of the Providence Music League. Jean Bedetti, 'celliet, as soloist, assisted.

Expert rendition of two movements of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," featured the program by the orchestra which, in addition, contained Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and overtures by Beethoven and Wagner. Mr. Bedetti, for his solo number, played the Saint Saens concerto in A-minor.

The arrangements of numbers follows:

Overture to "Egmont"...Beethoven
Incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn Nocturne.
Scherzo.
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, in minor, op. 74 (two movements) .....Tchaikowsky
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A-minor, op. 33 .....Saint-Saens
Allegro non toppo.
Allegretto con moto.
Allegro non troppo.
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From EAGLE MAR 22...
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

With Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, as soloist, Pierre Monteux will conduct the last Boston Symphony concert here—one which will also be his last appearance in Brooklyn at the head of the orchestra. The date is April 4, at the Academy of Music. Rosenthal's return to America and his present season tour after a protracted absence have justified the high reputation which he holds in Europe and which he formerly held in this country. He has often been called the foremost living pupil of Liszt. At the coming concert he will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 and will close it with Scriabin's Symphony, "The Divine Poem. This music of the noted late Russian composer is divided into three sections entitled "Struggles," "Sensuous Beauty" and "Divine Activities."

Next Sunday the Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of William Mengelberg, will bring to a conclusion its series of Sunday matinees at the Academy. The program includes Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

BRASS CHOIR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS MADE UP OF CELEBRITIES

World Famous Organization Has One of Most Distinguished Leaders, Who Makes Farewell Appearance Here

It is announced by the Portland Music Commission that the regular seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in City Hall auditorium next Wednesday evening will open tomorrow morning at 9 and will continue Tuesday and Wednesday. The demand for seats is so widespread and the number of mail orders is so large that it has been decided to have the seat sale for three days, as it is apparent that the immense volume of patronage cannot be taken care of at the box office in two days according to the original plan. Mail orders for reserved seats have come from all parts of Maine and New Hampshire and the indications point to what may be the largest audience which has ever been in attendance at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in this City.

During the 43 years of its history this orchestra has traveled considerably. It has played for 36 consecutive years in New York City. It has also appeared regularly in many Southern and Western cities. In 1915 the Boston Symphony Orchestra crossed the continent to attend the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. One after another of the world's greatest conductors have devoted their best towards the refinement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a whole. Nothring has been spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks. Hence the ensemble, the glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs is the envy of all other musical organizations.

The leaders in the string section, for instance, are undoubtedly the very fineset in America. Jean Bedetti, the first cellist, who came from Europe directly to this post; Ferdinand Thillois, the leader of the second violin section, and Max Kunze, leader of the double basses—are all artists of distinction; and Alfred Holy, the first harp, is considered one of the most splendid harpists living.

The wood wind choir is probably finer than that of any other orchestra in the world. The most famous member is the first oboist, Georges Longy, who is named again and again as the greatest living player of this exquisite reed instrument. Georges Laurent holds an equally enviable place among the flutists. The brass section also contains an impressive group of celebrities. George Wendler as French horn, can elicit a mellow tone from his beautiful instrument which is the envy of all his conferres, while Georges Mager is a first trumpet of amazing brilliance, and Carl Hampe, whose term of service as first trombone is the longest of these virtuosos, is the legitimate pride of the orchestra.

It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance. Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular nor the schedule more crowded. Five years is a long term of service when compared to those of former Boston Symphony leaders—indeed only those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck have been so long.

A program of splendid brilliance and appealing beauty will feature the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Portland, and the warm interest which the local public shows for the superb treat in store speaks well for the state of public taste. Program books with musical notes containing complete information regarding the works to be performed will be furnished to members of the audience.

The following program will be rendered:

Symphony No. 1, C Minor, Op. 68 ..... Brahms
Un poco sustenuto; Allegro
Andante, sostenuto
Ub poco Alleheretto e grazioso
Adagio; Allegro non troppo ma con brio
(Intermission of 10 minutes)
A Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries
Act III, The Valkyrie.....Wagner
Symphonic Poem
Ultara (The Moldau from Ma Vost (My Country) No. 2.....Smetana
Overture to Le Roi d'y's.....Lalo

The head of the engineering forces of the Chilean State Railroads is a woman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
MAR 25 1924

MONTEUX HONORED BY CONSERVATORY

Faculty and Students Give Reception to Conductor

A reception to Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given by the New England Conservatory of Music yesterday afternoon. It was intended as an expression of the appreciation of the faculty and students of the conservatory of Mr. Monteux's distinguished service to the orchestra and to the city of Boston during the last five years.

In the receiving line with Mr. Monteux were George W. Brown, president of the board of trustees, George W. Chadwick, director, and Ralph L. Flanders, general manager. A program of French music was played by an orchestra of conservatory teachers and students, directed by Francis M. Findlay of the faculty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 26

Symphony Players Appear Here Tonigh

Boston Orchestra's Only Main Appearance Will Be Big Event

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players will arrive in Portland in their special car today and will present their only concert in Maine at City Hall auditorium this evening at 8 o'clock. Pierre Monteux, the celebrated leader, will direct this great organization for the fifth and last time before a Portland audience. The program announced will be one of merit and the concert will undoubtedly prove the most noteworthy one ever given here by the world-famous orchestra.

There has been a steady sale of tickets throughout the week and if the sale is as strong today as it is expected, the house will be filled to its entire seating capacity.

All plans have been completed for trolley accomodations after the concert, patrons being assured that cars for all the principal points will be held until after the concert.

The presentation of this supreme attraction as one of the regular features of the Municipal Concert Course is a yearly feature, under the auspices of the Music Commission, and each year there is added interest in the appearance of the orchestra, and its leader.

The box office at City Hall will be open this morning at 9 o'clock and the seat sale will be continued all day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 26 1924

Writing to Albert Edmund Brown on a matter of business, Alice Nielsen recalls with pleasure her appearance in the Memorial Auditorium last year with the Boston Symphony orchestra. "I have never enjoyed anything more than that concert in that wonderful auditorium," she says. She has been making her headquarters in New York between concert engagements during winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 26 1924

for the Senate.

CONCERT TONIGHT WILL START EARLY

Hour Set at 8 Because Of Long Program

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are herewith reminded by the Music Commission that the program will start promptly tonight at 8, and that as the doors will be closed between the performance of numbers, late comers may be obliged to stand outside throughout one-half the entire program.

This will be due to the fact that the first composition is Brahms' First Symphony in four movements which are played without intermission and which will comprise the first part of the concert prior to the regular intermission.

Owing to the length of the program it will be necessary to start at 8, rather than at 8.15, as formerly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 27 1924

Millie Crafft and Mirko Belinski were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Mayberry yesterday. Mr. Crafft is violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mr. Belinski is a cellist in the same orchestra.

Miss Phyllis Black and Miss Doro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

This week in Portland.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Smith and their son, of Waterville, were among those in Portland to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this week.

Mrs. Lewis Emerson, who has been

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS CLOSE MUNICIPAL SERIES

Portland Hears Farewell Concert Under Leadership of Pierre Monteux Who Retires as Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, reputed one of the most distinguished organizations in the world, gave one of its admirable concerts in City Hall last evening. The concert closed the 1923-24 Municipal Organ Course and was a magnificent climax to a remarkable fine list of musical offerings. The event was made particularly significant from the fact that Pierre Monteux, the scholarly and able conductor of the orchestra, terminates his leadership with the Boston players this Spring, to be succeeded in the Autumn by Serge Konssevitsky, the brilliant Russian director. It is Monteux's fifth concert in Portland and the program given embraced classics and interesting modern writings.

The fine points of musicianship of the orchestra, its superb ensemble, its authority, its eloquent artistry, and the unquestioned skill of its technique, place its accomplishments on the highest order and under the expert guidance of the French conductor, freed from the shackles of war difficulties, the organization has advanced to a state of perfection which makes the appearance of the Boston players an event of unrivalled importance in any musical center.

While the work of the orchestra was appreciated last season, the program of last evening, from the very nature of its make-up, perhaps gave more general enjoyment and satisfaction to the very large audience present.

The works given were Brahm's first symphony (C minor), a work of wonderful beauty with a marvelous finale; Wagner's exquisite Siegfried Idyll; Wagner's superb descriptive writing, Ride of the Valkyries, from the music drama Valkyrie; a splendid tone poem, The Moldau, by Smetana, nd finally Lalois Overture to Le d'ys.

Words seem hardly adequate to describe the work of such an orches- in a program of this nature.

The Symphony

The house was a very large and fashionable one, was demonstrative, and appreciative of the merits of the program offering.

The Symphony in C minor—the first written by Brahms—is in four movements. In the opening "introduction", merging into the Allegro, the alluring tone of the violins and wood winds, the alert attack, rythm, poise of the instruments, full, mellow volume and delicacy of nuance, were apparent in delightful measure and music lovers were at once plunged into pure enjoyment.

The lovely legato passages in the Andante (2nd movement); the brilliant and graceful Allegretto, (introduced in place of the usual Scherzo) and the inspired final movement of the Symphony were performed with a display of musicianship that won the admiration and enthusiastic acclaim of the hearers.

The last movement of the symphony is a work of inspiration—the inspiration of nature. For it is believed that Brahms wrote the finale while in the shadow of the Zurich Mountains, in sight of the Alps and the lake. The Alpine horn is heard and a magnificent climax thrills the audience.

The Symphony occupied 45 minutes in the performance.

Wagner Works Given

Anything more wondrously lovely than the orchestral rendition of the "Siegfried Idyll" could hardly be imagined.

The boy Siegfried dreams in the forest while all about him are the rustling leaves, the indistinct sounds of Nature, and bird and insect life. The instruments describe the peace of the woodland and the musing thoughts of the boy.

Wagner dedicated this work to Cosima, his wife, and the writing of the German master was surely given its ideal interpretation last evening.

As was expected, the "Ride of the Valkyries" was the sensation of the evening and this music, descriptive of warrior maidens riding through the sky on winged horses, each bearing the body of a hero slain in battle, was the acme of musical realism, and drew rapturous applause from the audience. Such a masterpiece in the hands of such musicians seems almost beyond description.

The orchestra rose in a body to acknowledge an enthusiastic ovation.

Tone Poem of Rare Fascination

Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau", was of great charm and fascination and had a popular appeal and more melody than is usually introduced into the programs submitted by the Boston Orchestra. This modern work is a tone poem descriptive of a beautiful river flowing through a Bohemian country, sparkling with sunlight, murmuring through the quiet woods at night, past the hunter's horn and the wedding feast, and vanishing in the far distance.

In a broad sweep of the violins the beautiful stream rushes on with swaying rhythm, and here the harp passages are effectively brought in.

The Lalo Overture closed the program. This may not have been found as interesting as the earlier numbers.

The visit of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to any city is a rare privilege. Surely anyone, even though he find no musical enjoyment in a program such as the one given last evening, must at least marvel at the way it was all done,—the superb technique and musicianship of the visiting band of players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Whittlin's

In Which We Become A Music Critic

We know approximately nothing about the mechanics of music—but that's the nice thing about music, you don't have to know how to make it to like it.

Which is to prepare you for the statement that we were among those present at the City Hall auditorium night before last, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert ("gave" doesn't seem exactly the word, but "presented" suggests the same idea; "rendered" always makes us think of lard, and "executed" connotes electric chairs.) That's why we stuck to "gave."

* * *

The printed program didn't mean much to us. We couldn't tell the violincellos from the violas, nor the bassoons from the contra-bassoons; they might have shifted the allegro for the andante and we never would have suspected a thing. But we enjoyed every minute of the music and were swept along in its many melodious moods just as if we knew that Wagner should be pronounced "Vogner," and Chopin called "Chopan," without quite sounding the "n."

* * *

Monsieur Monteux, the conductor, works hard at his art. His hair came down after the first spirited strains of each selection, but he kept right on working the wand with never a thought for his locks.

At the danger of being labeled "low brow," we confess that we don't know whether it was the adagio or the un poco allegretto e grazioso that we liked—but it was sure enough good stuff.

* * *

U. S. T... ...Japan

TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

STRAVINSKY AGAIN

The 21st regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 11 and 12, in Symphony Hall. Features of the program will be the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, and the repetition, in response to a very evident and general desire, of Stravinsky's remarkable score, the "Sacre du Printemps." This number will be at the end of the program, which includes Franck's symphony, Chopin's E minor concerto, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
MAR 29 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Mr. Damrosch Plays Scriabin and Stravinsky, and Brahms Also Runs

Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, the English musicologist and biographer of Scriabin, is careful to tell us that Scriabin's favorite summer costume was "an English-looking lounge suit, a large, flowing art tie, a broad-spreading Panama hat and button shoes" (Dr. Hull does not say whether they were high shoes or oxfords); but he has neither space nor time to tell his readers that one of Scriabin's chief works had its first performance in the United States, a year before it was played in Russia. Probably Dr. Hull remembers only intermittently that there are orchestras in America.

However that may be, it is a fact that Mr. Modest Altschuler, then conductor of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, gave "Le Poème de l'Extase" in New York, for the first time anywhere, on December 10, 1908, less than a year after its completion. The work has since become firmly fixed in the symphonic repertoire, both here and abroad. Mr. Koussevitzky is very fond of the piece, has made it fashionable in Europe and plays it upon the slightest provocation—doubtless we shall hear it under his baton when he visits New York next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night at Carnegie Hall Mr. Damrosch performed it at the last of his season's concerts there; and again we were moved to wonder what it was all about.

* * *

It is not easy to get at the precise significance of the work as program music. Program music it apparently is; for though the score contains no "argument," preface, glossary or annotation of any kind, beyond the phrases of direction scattered throughout the pages for the guidance of the interpreter ("profondement tragique," "de plus de plus triomphant," "elan sublime," etc.), there is in existence a poem written by Scriabin, bearing the same title as the music, and published in the Russian language while Scriabin was at work on the composition of his score. Mr. Montague Nathan tells us that Scriabin "took this as foundation" for the music, and from the poem he extracted a verse which he used as motto for his Fifth Sonata, Op. 53, composed after the completion of the "Poème de l'Extase." Mr. Altschuler furnished a copy of Scriabin's literary effort to Mr. Philip Hale when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played "Le Poème de l'Extase" in 1910, and Mr. Hale displayed an English translation of it by Lydia L. Pimenoff Noble in the Boston Symphony Program Book, where it occupied five pages of closely printed type.

Though we have pondered long and anxiously Scriabin's rhapsodically esoteric deliverances, we should be presumptuous if we said that we comprehend them. But Scriabin was called by those about him "the Muscovite Seer," and Mr. Coates has told us that, with him, "Art and Religion were one": music was, with him, "always the expression of great Inner Truths. . . . the language in which he prophesied." Therefore, it is difficult to feel sure that one understands the music unless one understands the philosophy upon which it is based.

* * *

Yet the conviction has long possessed us that the "philosophy" of Scriabin's works, so far as one can ascertain it, is inconsequential. As expositions of Theosophical doctrine they are spurious; for they show no comprehension of the cardinal distinction made by Theosophy between what St. Paul called the "psychic body" and the "spiritual body." Scriabin's philosophy, as it is projected in his symphonic poems, is a curious blend of exalted emotionalism and voluptuous revery. Of genuine spiritual rapture it has almost nothing. To view Scriabin as a religious mystic is to misjudge his qualities.

What troubles us about this work, however, is our suspicion that its value as music per se is not very great. A good deal of Scriabin's tonal thinking is little better than inflated salon music. His eight horns, triple fortissimo, make a stunning noise at the climax, especially when, as last night, they are invited to stand up and see if they can blow through the roof of the tenth floor studios of Carnegie Hall. But the musical ideas at the center of all this apocalyptic thundering are singularly poor and thin. As for the chromatic caterwauling that fills so much of the score, it is scarcely tolerable to those who cannot forget its model; for we prefer our "Tristan" straight. At its worst, it is sonorous platitude; at its best, when it is least pretentious, it is mere perfumed Wagner. Yet the work is palpably sincere, it is gorgeously orchestrated and it is undeniably effective. So why pull the handsome doll to pieces?

Mr. Damrosch gave a superb performance of the score, and almost convinced one that it was good music.

* * *

There were two soloists on the program—Felix Salmond, the English 'cellist, and Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist. Their contribution to the evening's excitements was the double concerto of Brahms. One does not often hear a more beautiful performance than these two admirable artists accomplished. In feeling, in style, in tonal loveliness, in perfection of team work, it was very nearly ideal; and the stormy applause that rewarded it was richly deserved.

* * *

The remaining number on Mr. Damrosch's program was Stravinsky's symphonic poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol"—its fourth performance in two days, and, as we remarked yesterday, its seventh this season. But neither Mr. Damrosch nor his players betrayed any symptoms of boredom in their playing of the delectable work, for their performance of it was altogether delightful—sensitive, fine-grained, poetic; although we wished for a little more flexibility, a little more of the quality of a musing and hesitant song, in the exquisite close—that unforgettable epilogue which seems to us the most profoundly poetical music that Stravinsky has ever given us, with the meditation of the solo trumpeter, borne to us through a drifting haze of muted strings and harps, that sings of the deathlessness of beauty and the fleetingness of death.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
MAR 29 1924

SYMPHONY HALL SOLD OUT FOR TOMORROW

Two Performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to Be Given

Tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 and tomorrow evening at 8:30 in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give two pension fund concerts, performing Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony, introduced by the same master's overture to "Fidelio."

In the symphony the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the following soloists: Marie Sundelius, soprano; Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

Only standing room is available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 26

Symphony Players Appear Here Tonight

Boston Orchestra's Only Maine Appearance Will Be Big Event

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players will arrive in Portland in their special car today and will present their only concert in Maine at City Hall auditorium this evening at 8 o'clock. Pierre Monteux, the celebrated leader, will direct this great organization for the fifth and last time before a Portland audience. The program announced will be one of merit and the concert will undoubtedly prove the most noteworthy one ever given here by the world-famous orchestra.

There has been a steady sale of tickets throughout the week and if the sale is as strong today as it is expected, the house will be filled to its entire seating capacity.

All plans have been completed for trolley accomodations after the concert, patrons being assured that cars for all the principal points will be held until after the concert.

The presentation of this supreme attraction as one of the regular features of the Municipal Concert Course is a yearly feature, under the auspices of the Music Commission, and each year there is added interest in the appearance of the orchestra, and its leader.

The box office at City Hall will be open this morning at 9 o'clock and the seat sale will be continued all day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 29 1924

Writing to Albert Edmund Brown on a matter of business, Alice Nielsen recalls with pleasure her appearance in the Memorial Auditorium last year with the Boston Symphony orchestra. "I have never enjoyed anything more than that concert in that wonderful auditorium," she says. She has been making her headquarters in New York between concert engagements during winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 29 1924

the Senate.

CONCERT TONIGHT WILL START EARLY

Hour Set at 8 Because Of Long Program

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are herewith reminded by the Music Commission that the program will start promptly tonight at 8, and that as the doors will be closed between the performance of numbers, late comers may be obliged to stand outside throughout one-half the entire program.

This will be due to the fact that the first composition is Brahms' First Symphony in four movements which are played without intermission and which will comprise the first part of the concert prior to the regular intermission.

Owing to the length of the program it will be necessary to start at 8, rather than at 8.15, as formerly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS CLOSE MUNICIPAL SERIES

Portland Hears Farewell Concert Under Leadership of Pierre Monteux Who Retires as Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, reputed one of the most distinguished organizations in the world, gave one of its admirable concerts in City Hall last evening. The concert closed the 1923-24 Municipal Organ Course and was a magnificent climax to a remarkable fine list of musical offerings. The event was made particularly significant from the fact that Pierre Monteux, the scholarly and able conductor of the orchestra, terminates his leadership with the Boston players this Spring, to be succeeded in the Autumn by Serge Konssevitsky, the brilliant Russian director. It is Monteux's fifth concert in Portland and the program given embraced classics and interesting modern writings.

The fine points of musicianship of the orchestra, its superb ensemble, its authority, its eloquent artistry, and the unquestioned skill of its technique, place its accomplishments on the highest order and under the expert guidance of the French conductor, freed from the shackles of war difficulties, the organization has advanced to a state of perfection which makes the appearance of the Boston players an event of unrivalled importance in any musical center.

While the work of the orchestra was appreciated last season, the program of last evening, from the very nature of its make-up, perhaps gave more general enjoyment and satisfaction to the very large audience present.

The works given were Brahm's first symphony (C minor), a work of wonderful beauty with a marvelous finale; Wagner's exquisite Siegfried Idyll; Wagner's superb descriptive writing, Ride of the Valkyries, from the music drama Valkyrie; a splendid tone poem, The Moldau, by Smetana, nd finally Lalois Overture to Le i d'ys.

Words seem hardly adequate to de ibe the work of such an orches a in a program of this nature.

The Symphony

The house was a very large and fashionable one, was demonstrative, and appreciative of the merits of the program offering.

The Symphony in C minor—the first written by Brahms—is in four movements. In the opening "introduction", merging into the Allegro, the alluring tone of the violins and wood winds, the alert attack, rythm, poise of the instruments, full, mellow volume and delicacy of nuance, were apparent in delightful measure and music lovers were at once plunged into pure enjoyment.

The lovely legato passages in the Andante (2nd movement); the brilliant and graceful Allegretto, (introduced in place of the usual Scherzo) and the inspired final movement of the Symphony were performed with a display of musicianship that won the admiration and enthusiastic acclaim of the hearers.

The last movement of the symphony is a work of inspiration—the inspiration of nature. For it is believed that Brahms wrote the finale while in the shadow of the Zurich Mountains, in sight of the Alps and the lake. The Alpine horn is heard and a magnificent climax thrills the audience.

The Symphony occupied 45 minutes in the performance.

Wagner Works Given

Anything more wondrously lovely than the orchestral rendition of the "Siegfried Idyll" could hardly be imagined.

The boy Siegfried dreams in the forest while all about him are the rustling leaves, the indistinct sounds of Nature, and bird and insect life. The instruments describe the peace of the woodland and the musing thoughts of the boy.

Wagner dedicated this work to Cosima, his wife, and the writing of the German master was surely given its ideal interpretation last evening.

As was expected, the "Ride of the Valkyries" was the sensation of the evening and this music, descriptive of warrior maidens riding through the sky on winged horses, each bearing the body of a hero slain in battle, was the acme of musical realism, and drew rapturous applause from the audience. Such a masterpiece in the hands of such musicians seems almost beyond description.

The orchestra rose in a body to acknowledge an enthusiastic ovation.

Tone Poem of Rare Fascination

Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau", was of great charm and fascination and had a popular appeal and more melody than is usually introduced into the programs submitted by the Boston Orchestra. This modern work is a tone poem descriptive of a beautiful river flowing through a Bohemian country, sparkling with sunlight, murmuring through the quiet woods at night, past the hunter's horn and the wedding feast, and vanishing in the far distance.

In a broad sweep of the violins the beautiful stream rushes on with swaying rhythm, and here the harp passages are effectively brought in.

The Lalo Overture closed the program. This may not have been found as interesting as the earlier numbers.

The visit of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to any city is a rare privilege. Surely anyone, even though he find no musical enjoyment in a program such as the one given last evening, must at least marvel at the way it was all done.—the superb technique and musicianship of the visiting band of players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Whittlin's

In Which We Become A Music Critic

We know approximately nothing about the mechanics of music—but that's the nice thing about music, you don't have to know how to make it to like it.

Which is to prepare you for the statement that we were among those present at the City Hall auditorium night before last, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert ("gave' doesn't seem exactly the word, but "presented" suggests the same idea; "rendered" always makes us think of lard, and "executed" connotes electric chairs.) That's why we stuck to "gave."

* * *

The printed program didn't mean much to us. We couldn't tell the violincellos from the violas, nor the bassoons from the contra-bassoons; they might have shifted the allegro for the andante and we never would have suspected a thing. But we enjoyed every minute of the music and were swept along in its many melodious moods just as if we knew that Wagner should be pronounced "Vogner," and Chopin called "Chopan," without quite sounding the "n."

* * *

Monsieur Monteux, the conductor, works hard at his art. His hair came down after the first spirited strains of each selection, but he kept right on working the wand with never a thought for his locks.

At the danger of being labeled "low brow," we confess that we don't know whether it was the adagio or the un poco allegretto e grazioso that we liked—but it was sure enough good stuff.

* * *

U. S. T... ... Japan

TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

STRAVINSKY AGAIN

The 21st regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 11 and 12, in Symphony Hall. Features of the program will be the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, and the repetition, in response to a very evident and general desire, of Stravinsky's remarkable score, the "Sacre du Printemps." This number will be at the end of the program, which includes Franck's symphony, Chopin's E minor concerto, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
MAR 29 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Mr. Damrosch Plays Scriabin and Stravinsky, and Brahms Also Runs

Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, the English musicologist and biographer of Scriabin, is careful to tell us that Scriabin's favorite summer costume was "an English-looking lounge suit, a large, flowing art tie, a broad-spreading Panama hat and button shoes" (Dr. Hull does not say whether they were high shoes or oxfords); but he has neither space nor time to tell his readers that one of Scriabin's chief works had its first performance in the United States, a year before it was played in Russia. Probably Dr. Hull remembers only intermittently that there are orchestras in America.

However that may be, it is a fact that Mr. Modest Altschuler, then conductor of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, gave "Le Poème de l'Extase" in New York, for the first time anywhere, on December 10, 1908, less than a year after its completion. The work has since become firmly fixed in the symphonic repertoire, both here and abroad. Mr. Koussevitzky is very fond of the piece, has made it fashionable in Europe and plays it upon the slightest provocation—doubtless we shall hear it under his baton when he visits New York next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night at Carnegie Hall Mr. Damrosch performed it at the last of his season's concerts there; and again we were moved to wonder what it was all about.

* * *

It is not easy to get at the precise significance of the work as program music. Program music it apparently is; for though the score contains no "argument," preface, glossary or annotation of any kind, beyond the phrases of direction scattered throughout the pages for the guidance of the interpreter ("profondement tragique," "de plus de plus triomphant," "elan sublime," etc.), there is in existence a poem written by Scriabin, bearing the same title as the music, and published in the Russian language while Scriabin was at work on the composition of his score. Mr. Montague Nathan tells us that Scriabin "took this as foundation" for the music, and from the poem he extracted a verse which he used as motto for his Fifth Sonata, Op. 53, composed after the completion of the "Poème de l'Extase." Mr. Altschuler furnished a copy of Scriabin's literary effort to Mr. Philip Hale when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played "Le Poème de l'Extase" in 1910, and Mr. Hale displayed an English translation of it by Lydia L. Pimenoff Noble in the Boston Symphony Program Book, where it occupied five pages of closely printed type.

Though we have pondered long and anxiously Scriabin's rhapsodically esoteric deliverances, we should be presumptuous if we said that we comprehend them. But Scriabin was called by those about him "the Muscovite Seer," and Mr. Coates has told us that, with him, "Art and Religion were one": music was, with him, "always the expression of great Inner Truths. . . . the language in which he prophesied." Therefore, it is difficult to feel sure that one understands the music unless one understands the philosophy upon which it is based.

* * *

Yet the conviction has long possessed us that the "philosophy" of Scriabin's works, so far as one can ascertain it, is inconsequential. As expositions of Theosophical doctrine they are spurious; for they show no comprehension of the cardinal distinction made by Theosophy between what St. Paul called the "psychic body" and the "spiritual body." Scriabin's philosophy, as it is projected in his symphonic poems, is a curious blend of exalted emotionalism and voluptuous revery. Of genuine spiritual rapture it has almost nothing. To view Scriabin as a religious mystic is to misjudge his qualities.

What troubles us about this work, however, is our suspicion that its value as music per se is not very great. A good deal of Scriabin's tonal thinking is little better than inflated salon music. His eight horns, triple fortissimo, make a stunning noise at the climax, especially when, as last night, they are invited to stand up and see if they can blow through the roof of the tenth floor studios of Carnegie Hall. But the musical ideas at the center of all this apocalyptic thundering are singularly poor and thin. As for the chromatic caterwauling that fills so much of the score, it is scarcely tolerable to those who cannot forget its model; for we prefer our "Tristan" straight. At its worst, it is sonorous platitude; at its best, when it is least pretentious, it is mere perfumed Wagner. Yet the work is palpably sincere; it is gorgeously orchestrated and it is undeniably effective. So why pull the handsome doll to pieces?

Mr. Damrosch gave a superb performance of the score, and almost convinced one that it was good music.

* * *

There were two soloists on the program—Felix Salmond, the English 'cellist, and Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist. Their contribution to the evening's excitements was the double concerto of Brahms. One does not often hear a more beautiful performance than these two admirable artists accomplished. In feeling, in style, in tonal loveliness, in perfection of team work, it was very nearly ideal; and the stormy applause that rewarded it was richly deserved.

* * *

The remaining number on Mr. Damrosch's program was Stravinsky's symphonic poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol"—its fourth performance in two days, and, as we remarked yesterday, its seventh this season. But neither Mr. Damrosch nor his players betrayed any symptoms of boredom in their playing of the delectable work, for their performance of it was altogether delightful—sensitive, fine-grained, poetic; although we wished for a little more flexibility, a little more of the quality of a musing and hesitant song, in the exquisite close—that unforgettable epilogue which seems to us the most profoundly poetical music that Stravinsky has ever given us, with the meditation of the solo trumpeter, borne to us through a drifting haze of muted strings and harps, that sings of the deathlessness of beauty and the fleetingness of death.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
MAR 29 1924

SYMPHONY HALL SOLD OUT FOR TOMORROW

Two Performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to Be Given

Tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 and tomorrow evening at 8:30 in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give two pension fund concerts, performing Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony, introduced by the same master's overture to "Fidelio."

In the symphony the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the following soloists: Marie Sundelius, soprano; Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

Only standing room is available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

...his week in Portland.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Smith and their son, of Waterville, were among those in Portland to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this week.

Mrs. Lewis Emerson, who has been

Willie Crafft and Mirko Belinski are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Mayberry yesterday. Mr. Crafft is violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mr. Belinski is a cellist in the same orchestra.

Miss Phylis Black and Miss Doro-

From MAR29 1924
Traveler
Boston, Mass.

Twentieth Program of the Boston Symphony

The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Tschaikowsky—"Pathetic" Symphony.
Schenck—"In a Withered Garden."
De Falla—"Nights in the Gardens of Spain."
Chabrier—Overture to "Gwendoline."

Never before in the last few years has a Friday afternoon audience been so enthusiastic. Now that Mr. Monteux is leaving, after having brought the orchestra to a pitch of perfection never before attained throughout its history, his weekly auditors are perhaps tardily realizing that he is one of the greatest living conductors, a conductor who does not rely on physical contortions and exaggerated gesticulation for his effects. The Boston audiences have been slow to recognize Mr. Monteux's qualities, and even now it is possible that their enthusiasm would still be somewhat restrained were it not for the fact that the New York public is beginning to acknowledge his greatness.

But there were other reasons for New York's slowness than the provincial snobbism which has influenced Boston. We of this city are often thus influenced. Pretentious in our demands that we be recognized as a discriminating musical public we are in reality so uncertain of our judgment that it is only when we are sure of the direction in which the wind is blowing that we dare express it; if indeed we are rarely capable of forming one, which is not an indisputed fact. This may be euphemistically called Bostonian reserve, but in plainer speech it is stupidity.

And so Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically applauded yesterday afternoon, when in the past he has played much greater music than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in a much superior manner. His marvelous interpretations of Beethoven have been passed over with but scant attention, and his remarkable readings of Debussy and still more modern productions and the important aid and encouragement which he has given the American composer have hardly been as yet remarked upon.

Elliott Schenck's "In a Withered Garden" is a case in point. It is most certainly a piece of music deserving of a hearing. Well constructed, imaginative, even truly poetic in many parts, it is above all the work of an American musician. If Americans must wait until they produce works of the very highest type, American music will never occupy an important place on orchestral programs. American composers must be encouraged to write music in the larger forms by the opportunities of having them played. We cannot be expected to produce masterpieces in a bound. Second, third, even tenth rate compositions must first be written and given the practical benefit of a public performance. When the American composer has thus made a gradual progress toward perfection, then and then only can he be expected to equal his foreign brethren. Mr. Monteux seems to be the only one who has had the vision to realize this, and when a summary is made of the compositions by Americans which he has had the broadmindedness to produce his name will be writ large in the history of American music.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is Spanish in coloring with a vengeance. Lalo, Debussy and Chabrier, Frenchmen, have written music in the Spanish vein which is more agreeable. The persistently Spanish character of De Falla's music is tiresome. It insists too much on the Spanish melodic twists, the Spanish rhythms. For all that it is brilliant and, it goes without saying, effective. The performance of it was a marvel of grace and poetic insight, to which Heinrich Gebhardt contributed in no small measure by his playing of the obbligato piano part.

S. M.

From TRAVELER MAR29 1924
Boston, Mass.

EVA GAUTHIER

At the closing concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on April 7, the soloist will be Eva Gauthier, the celebrated French-Canadian mezzo-soprano.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of the Monday evening public with the following numbers: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Scalero's Suit for Solo String Quartet and String Orchestra, and excerpts from Wagner's Ring cycle, including Siegfried's Ascent to Brunnehilde's Rock from "Siegfried," Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "The Dusk of the Gods" and the culmination of this final drama.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR29 1924
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

NOVEL PIECES AT SYMPHONY

Two orchestral pieces new to Boston were played at yesterday's Symphony concert, one American and the other Spanish.

Pierre Monteux

Elliott Schenk, a New Yorker, was present to hear his tone poem, "In a Withered Garden," a vaguely impressionistic work, not so much a picture as a mood—which is the composer's way of describing it. The piece won honorable mention in a Chicago prize competition, being one of five offerings out of 70 deemed worthy of a hearing. It is music in the very modern manner, well designed and scored, for the most part. The applause brought the composer to his feet.

Manuel de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with its vibrant dance rhythms and genuinely colorful tone sketches, proved to be one of the most welcome novelties of the season. The piano part was played brilliantly by Heindich Gebhard.

Most of the enthusiasm of the matinee audience was showered upon the orchestra during and after the performance of Tschaikowsky's weepy B minor symphony, popularly known as the "Pathetic." This melancholy masterpiece was superbly performed. Mr. Monteux wrung every tear from the symphony and his dramatic reading of the martial third movement evoked that very rare occurrence, an ovation in the midst of a performance.

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture is the final number on the program, which will be repeated tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR29 192

NEW SPANISH MUSIC TO BE PLAYED

Montauk to Present de Falla's "Gardens"—Other Concerts and the Opera.

Pierre Monteux, at his last appearance here as conductor of the Boston Orchestra next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will present some new Spanish music that ought to be exceptionally interesting. This is Manuel de Falla's suite, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," certainly a title of perfumed promise if ever there was one. Also on this programme there is a Handel concerto grosso and Scriabin's "Le divin poeme."

For the Thursday evening concert Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist in Chopin's E minor piano concerto. The symphony will be that of Franck. Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture is also programmed.

At the concert of the Philadel- Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on evening Mr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

11

Violin Concertos Rarely Played by Their Composers—Nearing End of Season's Orchestral Concerts—"Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor, Very Popular—Music Notes.

By HENRY T. FINCK

PERHAPS not since Wieniawski's days has a violin concerto been played by its composer at a symphony concert in New York, so it will be something of an occasion when Samuel Gardner is heard in his own concerto at the Philharmonic concert Wednesday evening in Carnegie Hall, and it marks its first performance in its new form.

The concerto was written by Gardner during the summer of 1920, when he was in Colorado in the Rockies, and it was played in December by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a second performance shortly after in St. Louis. He was not at all satisfied with the work, so he withdrew it and in the next three years had nothing to do with it.

"Fortunately I was able to forget the work," he says, "in hectic New York and in concertizing all over the country, so when in the summer of 1923 I was able to get out to my beloved Rockies, there, in the quiet of those wonderful mountains, my concerto was reborn. I shortened it, throwing out many things which at first looked good on paper, but did not sound, and now I hope and believe that it is right."

Deems Taylor's Suite

Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" suite is looking up. Played about a year ago by the New York Chamber Music Society and then by the New York Symphony Society, it rested until this week, when the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a charming performance of the work and it will be heard again on Wednesday evening in Aeolian Hall, when the American National Orchestra plays it, and those who like fun in their music had better hear it. It is really witty.

Chopin's piano, deeply scored with the autograph of George Sand—for many years the inspiration of the great French composer—is coming to this country. It is now the property of Vincent Lopez, the well-known orchestra leader, who is going to set it up in his home and invite the great pianists to play the music of the great master, and perhaps gain inspiration from the strings from which Chopin drew his wonderful melodies.

Serge Koussevitzky, the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is coming to America next autumn to be the society's first Russian director, is now completing his series of concerts with the London Symphony Orchestra. He will then go to Italy, Barcelona, Paris, and then back to London to sail on the Aquitania September 4 to take up his duties.

Koussevitzky is just fifty. Born in Northern Russia, he conducted an orchestra in his native town at the age of twelve. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, was graduated, and for a considerable period was known as a double-bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument. The Moscow Orchestra, which played symphonic music all over Russia was founded and directed by him, until four years ago, when he became a central figure of concerts in London and Paris.

An idea of what Boston is to get in the way of music may be had from his remarks in the Boston Globe, in which he says: "I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia, and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916, when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production."

Closing concerts of the large orchestral societies are underlined for next week. Tomorrow afternoon the New York Symphony Society gives its last subscription concert of the season, when Walter Damrosch will conduct Brahms's Symphony in F, the prelude to Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," two new works by Holst, first time in America, and will be at the piano in Albert Stoessel's "Suite Antique" for two violins, piano and small orchestra.

The Philadelphia Orchestra gives its ninth concert here Tuesday evening, in Carnegie Hall, the program being Brahms's second symphony, an orchestral arrangement of two of Bach's choral preludes; "Aus du Tiefe rufe ich" and "Wie Glauben Alle an einen Gott," and the Beethoven G major piano concerto, Frederic Lamond soloist.

Closing Philharmonic Concerts

The concluding Philharmonic concert for students will be given on Wednesday evening in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be Strauss's "Death and the Transfiguration," Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and Samuel Gardner's violin concerto in E minor (unwritten) with the composer as soloist.

Pierre Monteux makes his last appearance here in the closing concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday evening program will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and Chopin's E minor piano concerto, Moris Rosenthal, soloist. The Saturday afternoon program will be Handel's concerto in G minor, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

In the second of the series of three concerts by the American-National Orchestra under the direction of Howard Barlow, in Aeolian Hall, Wednesday evening, the principal number will be Deems Taylor's delightful suite "Through a Looking Glass." The overture to "Die Meistersinger," will be played and Rafaelo Diaz will sing Chausson's "Poeme de l'amour et de la mer."

Fritz Kreisler will give a most interesting violin recital tomorrow evening in Carnegie Hall, his program including a group of national melodies in dance form, composed of his own arrangement of three Slavonic dances and Heuberger's Viennese melody "Midnight Bells," Hubay's Hungarian fantasy, "Heyre Kati," and Percy Grainger's Irish reel "Molly on the Shore."

FROM REVIEW
MAR29
New York City

KOUSSEVITZKY FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Russian Conductor Engaged to Lead the Organization Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. He is regarded as the foremost Russian musician, having been the leader of the great Moscow Symphony Orchestra for year. Recently he has been guest conductor at the Paris Grand Opera and also of the London Symphony Orchestra.

BOS EVN TRANSCRIPT
MAR29 19

Paving the Way

A Lecture, Free and Informal, on Stravinsky's "Sacre"

AT the Public Library on Saturday evening, April 4, at 8.15, a week before the third and fourth performances of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" by the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Laurence Powell will describe that piece, informally rather than technically, and then run through it all on a piano-player. Mr. Powell is an English musician and writer about music, living and working for the while in Boston. He knows his subject and sets it forth agreeably. This lecture-concert is open to the public without price or tickets.

From Traveler Boston, Mass.

MAR 29 1924

Twentieth Program of the Boston Symphony

The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Tschaikowsky—"Pathetic" Symphony.
Schenck—"In a Withered Garden."
De Falla—"Nights in the Gardens of Spain."
Chabrier—Overture to "Gwendoline."

Never before in the last few years has a Friday afternoon audience been so enthusiastic. Now that Mr. Monteux is leaving, after having brought the orchestra to a pitch of perfection never before attained throughout its history, his weekly auditors are perhaps tardily realizing that he is one of the greatest living conductors, a conductor who does not rely on physical contortions and exaggerated gesticulation for his effects. The Boston audiences have been slow to recognize Mr. Monteux's qualities, and even now it is possible that their enthusiasm would still be somewhat restrained were it not for the fact that the New York public is beginning to acknowledge his greatness.

But there were other reasons for New York's slowness than the provincial snobbism which has influenced Boston. We of this city are often thus influenced. Pretentious in our demands that we be recognized as a discriminating musical public we are in reality so uncertain of our judgment that it is only when we are sure of the direction in which the wind is blowing that we dare express it; if indeed we are rarely capable of forming one, which is not an indisputed fact. This may be euphemistically called Bostonian reserve, but in plainer speech it is stupidity.

And so Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically applauded yesterday afternoon, when in the past he has played much greater music than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in a much superior manner. His marvelous interpretations of Beethoven have been passed over with but scant attention, and his remarkable readings of Debussy and still more modern productions and the important aid and encouragement which he has given the American composer have hardly been as yet remarked upon.

Elliott Schenck's "In a Withered Garden" is a case in point. It is most certainly a piece of music deserving of a hearing. Well constructed, imaginative, even truly poetic in many parts, it is above all the work of an American musician. If Americans must wait until they produce works of the very highest type, American music will never occupy an important place on orchestral programs. American composers must be encouraged to write music in the larger forms by the opportunities of having them played. We cannot be expected to produce masterpieces in a bound. Second, third, even tenth rate compositions must first be written and given the practical benefit of a public performance. When the American composer has thus made a gradual progress toward perfection, then and then only can he be expected to equal his foreign brethren. Mr. Monteux seems to be the only one who has had the vision to realize this, and when a summary is made of the compositions by Americans which he has had the broadmindedness to produce his name will be writ large in the history of American music.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is Spanish in coloring with a vengeance. Lalo, Debussy and Chabrier, Frenchmen, have written music in the Spanish vein which is more agreeable. The persistently Spanish character of De Falla's music is tiresome. It insists too much on the Spanish melodic twists, the Spanish rhythms. For all that it is brilliant and, it goes without saying, effective. The performance of it was a marvel of grace and poetic insight, to which Heinrich Gebhardt contributed in no small measure by his playing of the obbligato piano part.

S. M.

From TRAVELER Boston, Mass.

MAR 29 1924

EVA GAUTHIER

At the closing concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on April 7, the soloist will be Eva Gauthier, the celebrated French-Canadian mezzo-soprano.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of the Monday evening public with the following numbers: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Scalero's Suit for Solo String Quartet and String Orchestra, and excerpts from Wagner's Ring cycle, including Siegfried's Ascent to Brunnehilde's Rock from "Siegfried," Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "The Dusk of the Gods" and the culmination of this final drama.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ADVERTISER, Boston, Mass.

MAR 29 1924

NOVEL PIECES AT SYMPHONY

Two orchestral pieces new to Boston were played at yesterday's Symphony concert, one American and the other Spanish.

Pierre Monteux

Elliott Schenk, a New Yorker, was present to hear his tone poem, "In a Withered Garden," a vaguely impressionistic work, not so much a picture as a mood—which is the composer's way of describing it. The piece won honorable mention in a Chicago prize competition, being one of five offerings out of 70 deemed worthy of a hearing. It is music in the very modern manner, well designed and scored, for the most part. The applause brought the composer to his feet.

Manuel de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with its vibrant dance rhythms and genuinely colorful tone sketches, proved to be one of the most welcome novelties of the season. The piano part was played brilliantly by Heindich Gebhard.

Most of the enthusiasm of the matinee audience was showered upon the orchestra during and after the performance of Tschaikowsky's weepy B minor symphony, popularly known as the "Pathetic." This melancholy masterpiece was superbly performed. Mr. Monteux wrung every tear from the symphony and his dramatic reading of the martial third movement evoked that very rare occurrence, an ovation in the midst of a performance.

Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture is the final number on the program, which will be repeated tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR 29 19

NEW SPANISH MUSIC TO BE PLAYED

Montauk to Present de Falla's "Gardens"—Other Concerts and the Opera.

Pierre Monteux, at his last appearance here as conductor of the Boston Orchestra next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will present some new Spanish music that ought to be exceptionally interesting. This is Manuel de Falla's suite, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," certainly a title of perfumed promise if ever there was one. Also on this programme there is a Handel concerto grosso and Scriabin's "Le divin poeme."

For the Thursday evening concert Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist in Chopin's E minor piano concerto. The symphony will be that of Franck. Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture is also programmed.

At the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on evening Mr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

11

Violin Concertos Rarely Played by Their Composers—Nearing End of Season's Orchestral Concerts—"Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor, Very Popular—Music Notes.

By HENRY T. FINCK

PERHAPS not since Wieniawski's days has a violin concerto been played by its composer at a symphony concert in New York, so it will be something of an occasion when Samuel Gardner is heard in his own concerto at the Philharmonic concert Wednesday evening in Carnegie Hall, and it marks its first performance in its new form.

The concerto was written by Gardner during the summer of 1920, when he was in Colorado in the Rockies, and it was played in December by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a second performance shortly after in St. Louis. He was not at all satisfied with the work, so he withdrew it and in the next three years had nothing to do with it.

"Fortunately I was able to forget the work," he says, "in hectic New York and in concertizing all over the country, so when in the summer of 1923 I was able to get out to my beloved Rockies, there, in the quiet of those wonderful mountains, my concerto was reborn. I shortened it, throwing out many things which at first looked good on paper, but did not sound, and now I hope and believe that it is right."

Deems Taylor's Suite

Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" suite is looking up. Played about a year ago by the New York Chamber Music Society and then by the New York Symphony Society, it rested until this week, when the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a charming performance of the work and it will be heard again on Wednesday evening in Aeolian Hall, when the American National Orchestra plays it, and those who like fun in their music had better hear it. It is really witty.

Chopin's piano, deeply scored with the autograph of George Sand—for many years the inspiration of the great French composer—is coming to this country. It is now the property of Vincent Lopez, the well-known orchestra leader, who is going to set it up in his home and invite the great pianists to play the music of the great master, and perhaps gain inspiration from the strings from which Chopin drew his wonderful melodies.

Serge Koussevitzky, the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is coming to America next autumn to be the society's first Russian director, is now completing his series of concerts with the London Symphony Orchestra. He will then go to Italy, Barcelona, Paris, and then back to London to sail on the Aquitania September 4 to take up his duties.

Koussevitzky is just fifty. Born in Northern Russia, he conducted an orchestra in his native town at the age of twelve. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, was graduated, and for a considerable period was known as a double-bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument. The Moscow Orchestra, which played symphonic music all over Russia was founded and directed by him, until four years ago, when he became a central figure of concerts in London and Paris.

An idea of what Boston is to get in the way of music may be had from his remarks in the Boston Globe, in which he says: "I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia, and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916, when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production."

Closing concerts of the large orchestral societies are underlined for next week. Tomorrow afternoon the New York Symphony Society gives its last subscription concert of the season, when Walter Damrosch will conduct Brahms's Symphony in F, the prelude to Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," two new works by Holst, first time in America, and will be at the piano in Albert Stoessel's "Suite Antique" for two violins, piano and small orchestra.

The Philadelphia Orchestra gives its ninth concert here Tuesday evening, in Carnegie Hall, the program being Brahms's second symphony, an orchestral arrangement of two of Bach's choral preludes; "Aus du Tiefe rufe ich" and "Wie Glauben Alle an einen Gott," and the Beethoven G major piano concerto, Frederic Lamond soloist.

Closing Philharmonic Concerts

The concluding Philharmonic concert for students will be given on Wednesday evening in Carnegie Hall, when the program will be Strauss's "Death and the Transfiguration," Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and Samuel Gardner's violin concerto in E minor (unwritten) with the composer as soloist.

Pierre Monteux makes his last appearance here in the closing concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday evening program will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and Chopin's E minor piano concerto, Moris Rosenthal, soloist. The Saturday afternoon program will be Handel's concerto in G minor, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

In the second of the series of three concerts by the American-National Orchestra under the direction of Howard Barlow, in Aeolian Hall, Wednesday evening, the principal number will be Deems Taylor's delightful suite "Through a Looking Glass." The overture to "Die Meistersinger," will be played and Rafaelo Diaz will sing Chausson's "Poeme de l'amour et de la mer."

Fritz Kreisler will give a most interesting violin recital tomorrow evening in Carnegie Hall, his program including a group of national melodies in dance form, composed of his own arrangement of three Slavonic dances and Heuberger's Viennese melody "Midnight Bells," Hubay's Hungarian fantasy, "Heyre Kati," and Percy Grainger's Irish reel "Molly on the Shore."

FROM REVIEW
New York City

MAR 29

KOUSSEVITZKY FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Russian Conductor Engaged to Lead the Organization Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. He is regarded as the foremost Russian musician, having been the leader of the great Moscow Symphony Orchestra for year. Recently he has been guest conductor at the Paris Grand Opera and also of the London Symphony Orchestra.

POST TRANSCRIPT

MAR 29

Paving the Way

A Lecture, Free and Informal, on Stravinsky's "Sacre"

AT the Public Library on Saturday evening, April 4, at 8.15, a week before the third and fourth performances of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" by the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Laurence Powell will describe that piece, informally rather than technically, and then run through it all on a piano-player. Mr. Powell is an English musician and writer about music, living and working for the while in Boston. He knows his subject and sets it forth agreeably. This lecture-concert is open to the public without price or tickets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TOPEKA

KANSAS.
STATE JOURNAL

Olin Downes takes a vigorous thrust at the numerous orchestra leaders and program makers in and about New York for their use of hackneyed numbers in their symphony programs. A careful inspection brings to light that this season had suffered repeated performances of the "Tannhauser" overture, the prelude and "heibestod" of "Tristam and Isolde," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" and Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the "Leonore" overture, the "Oberon" overture, the "Meistersinger" prelude, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Dovrak's "New World" and Brahm's "Second" Symphony, to say nothing of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and the Mendelssohn "Scotch" and "Italian" Symphonies. These have been given again and again, sometimes on the same dates by different orchestras. It is complained that few novelties are to be heard and that the orchestras rest upon their already won laurels rather than venture further into educational fields.

An interesting side light on this complaint, is a communication to the New York Times from one who on the other hand protests against the very novelties that Olin Downs commends. Anent the playing of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," this writer states that many thought it's performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra was "A fright; some left, others were visibly amused. It is a distorted, false interpretation of life by a primitive, if not a neurotic." The same condemnation is voiced of Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," another of the few novelties of the season.

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS KOUSSEVITZKY

Will Come to America Next Autumn to Be First Russian Conductor of That Organization.

IS DIRECTING IN LONDON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Russian Director Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Next Season.

Serge Koussevitzky, the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will come to America next Autumn to become its first Russian conductor.

Koussevitzky is now completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. At these concerts in March and April he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini and Tchaikovsky.

He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzky Concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his Summer vacation.

He will sail for America September 4 on the steamship Aquitania.

Serge Koussevitzky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At 12 he conducted the orchestra of the town theatre. He graduated from Moscow Conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the orchestra which he organized, subsidized and conducted in Moscow.

With this splendid organization he gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. The "Koussevitzky Concerts" in Paris have in the last four seasons been the most famous in that metropolis. He has appeared each season as guest conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra and likewise in other cities of Europe.

He has also conducted each Russian opera when mounted at the Grand Opera in Paris.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 30 1924

Rosenthal With Boston Orchestra at Academy Friday Night

Pierre Monteux will make his farewell as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last concert of the season series to be given on Friday evening, April 4, in the Academy of Music. Another feature of this concert will be the appearance as soloist with the orchestra of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, whose season's tour of America, after a prolonged absence, has justified his high European and his former reputation here as one of the most brilliant geniuses of the pianoforte. Mr. Rosenthal will be heard in the concerto of Chopin in E minor.

Mr. Monteux will open the programme with Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3 overture, and close it with Scriabin's "The Divine Poem." This music of the noted late Russian composer is divided into three sections entitled "Struggles," "Sensuous Beauty," and "Divine Activities."

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

MAR 30

Farewell of Pierre Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its closing concert and its last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 4. This fine French conductor's fifth and last year at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is proving, in the general estimation, the finest of his term. Features of the spring concerts elsewhere have been Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre du Printemps," performed and repeated in Boston and New York.

The soloist of the Academy concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, the famous European pianist, whose return tour of America after many years absence has proven most successful. Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. The other numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem." This unusual Russian score is divided into three sections, as follows: Struggles, Sensuous Pleasures, Divine Activity.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

MAR 30

Boston Symphony Will Have New Leader

Serge Koussevitzky, will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year, succeeding Pierre Monteux, despite many rumors which have placed other names in the place of Mr. Koussevitzky within the past month or so. The announcement at this time is official.

In an interview in the Boston Globe, Mr. Koussevitzky, says:

"I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the best in the world and know that the population of Boston is more musically interested than anywhere in the United States. I shall conduct in Boston more than 30 concerts during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the 16th century and 1923.

"In fact," he continued, "I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation."

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tvers in the northern part of Russia in 1874. When he was 12 years old he conducted his own little orchestra in his native town. When he was 18, he went to Moscow to study at the Imperial Musical Conservatory. The famous Russian, Ranbaussek, became his teacher and after four years study he appeared as a soloist at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, playing the double bass. He is to-day recognized as the foremost player of double bass in Europe.

In 1907, Mr. Koussevitzky went to Berlin and formed his own orchestra at the Musical high school in the German capital. For more than two years he gave concerts all over Germany, mainly with classical repertoire. In 1910 he went back to Moscow, where he formed his own orchestra of 80 to 125 members and a chorus of 250. For nearly 10 years he was the head of this orchestra, giving concerts in Moscow every week and festivals at Petrograd, in between he made trips all over Europe, conducting in Scandinavia, Germany, England, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera House are regarded as the musical events of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr. Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last season conducting 10 concerts of the Scottish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is "in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 30

MONTEUX'S FAREWELL.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of Brooklyn as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fifth and last concert of the season on Friday evening, April 4, in the Academy of Music.

Moriz Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's concerto in E minor. The number of principal musical interest on the program will be Scriabin's Symphony, "The Divine Poem." Its three sections are called Struggles, Sensuous Pleasures, Divine Activity. This score voices the highest aspirations of the idealistic Russian composer. There will also be played Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3. Monteux, the greatest of French conductors, plans to return to his own country at the conclusion of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

Monteux Takes Farewell.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the closing pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture will open the concert and Franck's Symphony in D minor will close it.

Features of the matinee program will be Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," (which is divided into three sections, as follows: Struggles—Sensuous Pleasures—Divine Activity), and a new score by De Falla, the Spanish composer, called "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," of which the movements are entitled: "At Generalife," "Far-off Dance," "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." The piano part will be played by Heinrich Gebhard. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in G minor and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

A feature of M. Monteux's closing spring concerts in Boston will be two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening. M. Monteux will close his season and his term in Boston on May 3, and shortly thereafter will sail for France to meet various engagements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

Boston Symphony Concert, Farewell of Monteux

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its closing concert, and its last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, April 4, at 8:15 o'clock. The grea French conductor's fifth and last year at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestre is proving, in general estimation, the finest of his term.

The soloist of the pending concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, the famous European pianist. Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's Concerto in E minor. The other numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, ond Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem." This unusual Russian score is divided into three sections, as follows: Struggles, sensuous pleasure, divine activity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 30 1924

MONTEUX'S ADIEU.

Scriabin Symphony in Last Boston Symphony Concert.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the closing pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture will open the concert and Eernack's Symphony in D minor will close it.

Feature of the matinee program will be Scriabin's Symphony "The Divine Poem" (which is divided into three sections, as follows—Struggles, Sensuous Pleasures, Divine Activity), and a new score by De Falla, the Spanish composer, called "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," of which the movements are entitled: "At Generalife," "Far-Off Dance," "In the Gardens of the Siera de Cordoba." The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in F minor and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

A feature of Mr. Monteux's closing Spring concerts in Boston will be two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening. Mr. Monteux will close his season and his term in Boston on May 3 and shortly thereafter will sail for France to meet various engagements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK AMERICAN

MORIZ ROSENTHAL will present the solo piano part in Chopin's E minor sonata with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening. Franck's symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture complete the programme. The orchestra will present De Falla's "Gardens of Spain"; Scriabin's "Divine Poem"; suite by Handel, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture at the Saturday afternoon concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

With Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final program at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, a farewell in that borough for Conductor Monteux.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 20 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Monteux. Soloist, Moriz Rosenthal.

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano concerto No. 1, E minor.....Chopin
Symphony, D minor.....Cesar Franck

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall. Farewell of Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Concerto Grosso, G minor.....Handel
The Divine Poem.....Scriabin
Gardens of Spain.....De Falla
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 30 1924

Gliere's "The Sirens" Heard Here.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In yesterday's TIMES you mentioned that the first performance of Gliere's "The Sirens" was given in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux.

This statement is incorrect, as I heard this composition at Carnegie Hall on April 5, 1918, conducted by Ossip Gabrilowitsch with a special orchestra which he had assembled.

FREDERICK A. BURTON.

New York, March 24, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

P. L. Journal
MAR 30

Pierre Monteux will make his farewell appearances in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Moriz Rosenthal will play Chopin's E minor piano concerto at the Thursday concert and Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," and a new score by Manuel de Falla, entitled "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," will be the features Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux, who is conducting performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Boston in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening, will end his term there on May 3

In spite of rumors to the contrary which have developed during the past few months, it is definitely established that Serge Koussevitzky will come to America next fall to lead the Boston Symphony—the first Russian to serve as conductor of that organization. At present, he is making guest appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra, to be followed by concerts in Milan, Rome and Barcelona. In May, he will complete his Paris series and direct "Boris Godunoff" at the Opéra, with, probably, a short opera season in London and a vacation intervening before he sails for America on the Aquitania, September 4. In an interview in "The Boston Globe," Mr. Koussevitzky expresses his happiness at the prospect of coming to this country, and promises new music especially from Spain, Russia and France, including modern Russian works. He hopes to give a symphony by Miacowsky, who was represented on the last program of the League of Composers. Another feature is to be some old classic works which have not been played before.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS. HERALD

MAR 30 1924

The other day I had a very welcome visit from Mr. W. H. Brennan, the manager of Symphony Hall and of the world-famed Symphony concert in Boston. Mr. Brennan, who was here to interview Kusovitsky, the successor of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the aforesaid concerts, told me, among much else, that in the U. S. A. the tax gatherer demands no entertainment tax for such orchestral concerts as those of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the educational value of which is recognized, even officialy, as well "worth the money." For myself, I confess I have never had the point put clearly and convincingly before me that the entertainment tax is really the bugbear it is said by entertainers to be. After all, it is the public that pay the tax, is it not? However, I am all in favor of the American view as illustrated above.—Robin H. Legge in the London Daily Telegraph.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. UNION

MAR 31 1924

Serge Koussevitsky.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to assume the leadership of the Boston most famous in that metropolis. He has appeared each season as guest conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra and likewise in other cities of Europe. He has also conducted each Russian opera when mounted at the Grand Opera in Paris.

"Gallia" to Be Sung.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MAR 1924

Serge Koussevitsky, who will succeed Pierre Monteaux as conductor of the Boston Symphony, will sail from Cherbourg, France, on Sept. 4, en route for New York and Boston, according to press reports.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND, ME. TELEGRAM

MAR 30 1924

There is, of course, a good deal of curiosity regarding Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Monteux has perfected the ensemble and refined artistry of the organization. It is said that Koussevitsky, the Russian, will be more a conductor of the modern, with due attention paid to the classic.

Koussevitsky is now completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. At these concerts in March and April he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini and Tschaikowsky. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitsky concerts" and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the Grand Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for America Sept. 4 on the S. S. Aquitania.

Serge Koussevitsky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At 12 he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He graduated from Moscow Conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitsky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the orchestra which he organized, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestra concerts in Paris and London.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS. TRANSCRIPT

1924

BEETHOVEN AND BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on the centenary of its first performance are connoted in an exhibition in the Music Room of the Public Library of the city of Boston.

The story of the commission given to Beethoven a little over a hundred years ago to write an oratorio for the Handel and Haydn Society may be read in Elson's "History of American Music" or in Thayer's "Life of Beethoven." Although the commission was never carried out, the interest in the great composer at that time led a Harvard man to devote practically all his life to writing the life of the composer, which is incidentally one of the great biographies of the world.

On the twenty-fourth of this month, one hundred years ago, Beethoven's great Mass in D received its initial performance in Russia, and on May 7 of the same year Vienna heard the first performance of the Choral Symphony. The Harmonicon for August of that year contains a translation of a Vienna journal's account of its first performance, and a letter received in England at that time may be seen in the Musical World of April, 1837.

An analysis in the Quarterly Magazine and Review for 1825 says "all the known acoustical missile instruments were employed and they made even the very ground shake under us, and would, with their fearful uproar, have been sufficiently penetrating to call from their peaceful graves . . . the revered shades of Tallis, Purcell and Gibbons, and even Handel and Mozart, to witness and deplore the obstreperous roarings of modern frenzy in their art."

Of special interest is the account of the first performance in Boston in Dwight's Journal of Music for February, 1853. A translation of a German analysis was made and Richard Wagner's "Programme to the Ninth Symphony" was specially translated for the Journal. The editor felt it necessary to issue an appeal to "withhold all encouragement from the whispering and bustle." In the ten days of the performance of the Symphony there were also given Beethoven's oratorio, "The Mount of Olives," from which the Harvard Glee Club is to sing a selection next week, a Mendelsshon Festival, a Chamber Concert, and three or four nights of Alboni's Operas.

Included in the exhibition are fac simile manuscripts of the first page of the Symphony and the sketch for the "Ode to Joy," a picture of the house in which Schiller wrote his Ode, detailed studies of the music and the instrumentation, and pictures of Max Klinger's celebrated and much discussed statue of the composer.

One of the most touching of all criticisms or tributes is that of Helen Keller, who "listened in" to a performance of this Symphony in New York recently. She said, "As I listened, with darkness and melody, shadow and sound filling all the room, I could not help remembering that the great composer who poured forth such a flood of sweetness into the world was deaf like myself. I marvelled at the power of his quenchless spirit by which out of his pain he wrought such joy for others—and, there I sat feeling with my hand the magnificent symphony which broke like a sea upon the silent shores of his soul and mine."

From Traveler Ed May 1902
Boston, Mass.

The Ninth Symphony in Boston

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the overture to "Fidelio," was presented at a Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Marie Sundelius, soprano, Marjorie Squires, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. As all seats for the concert had been sold soon after it was announced, it was repeated in the evening before another crowded house.

Although the performance yesterday was not interrupted by applause, as at the first presentation 100 years ago in Vienna, it was received with rapt attention, and was greeted at every interval with warm and prolonged clapping, to which at the end cheers were added—a rare event indeed at Symphony Hall.

No one could deny that the tribute was deserved. The orchestra was at the top of its bent, which in these days of its restored excellence is saying a great deal. Not only were the first violins stirring in tone and eloquent in phrase and dynamics, but the other strings, the wind and the percussion admirably balanced them under Mr. Monteux's baton. Exquisite in particular were the dialogues of solo flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon.

But, after all, these delights of the first three movements were as a tale that is told; we had heard them within two years from the same musicians. What the audiences came to hear was the choral movement, given for the first time in Boston for seven years, and for the first time anywhere with the assistance of the young collegians trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, who has raised the Harvard Glee Club (and, incidentally, the Choral Society of Radcliffe College, the women's department of Harvard University) from the status of performers of "college songs" to that of students and interpreters of the finest choral music. Their performance quite sustained their reputation. Indeed, it is possible that this last symphonic message of Beethoven never had a more splendid interpretation. Perhaps it requires such youth not only to sustain those high passages which look impossible of execution, but to feel and convey in tones the joy and love of which Schiller sang. L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

AUSTIN, TEXAS STATESMAN

MAR 15

Margaret Matzenaur was the soloist on Thursday evening last at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an all-Wagner program, Pierre Monteux conducted.

Mr. Sanborn felt that in the immolation music "Mme. Matzenaur seemed fully aware of her opportunity and the result was the delivery of Brunhilde's music that I have never heard equaled. Every note was audible and nearly every note was beautiful. She sang with searching expressiveness and with the requisite breadth and elevation of style." According to the Times, "Mme. Matzenaur feels intensely the dramatic spirit of this music and she makes her audience understand it. She was in unusually good voice." Mr. Henderson's comment was that "Mme. Matzenaur sang in her familiar manner, with vehemence and vocal variety."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

MERIDEN CONN. RECORD

MAR 31 1924

a bo...

Miss Marguerite Erickson of Yalesville, a graduate of the local high school, now a student of Radcliffe college, is among those who have been selected from Harvard university to sing with the Boston symphony at their spring concert.

There will be a business meeting

THIS CLIPPING FROM

2nd Sig
Mus 16

MUSIC NOTES

The last but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season will be given at Carnegie Hall this evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct in a Chopin-Beethoven-Franck program. Moriz Rosenthal, pianist, will be the soloist on this occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

MAR 30 1924

MONTEUX'S ADIEU.

Scriabin Symphony in Last Boston Symphony Concert.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the closing pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture will open the concert and Eernack's Symphony in D minor will close it.

Feature of the matinee program will be Scriabin's Symphony "The Divine Poem" (which is divided into three sections, as follows—Struggles, Sensuous Pleasures, Divine Activity), and a new score by De Falla, the Spanish composer, called "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," of which the movements are entitled: "At Generalife," "Far-Off Dance," "In the Gardens of the Siera de Cordoba." The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in F minor and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

A feature of Mr. Monteux's closing Spring concerts in Boston will be two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening. Mr. Monteux will close his season and his term in Boston on May 3 and shortly thereafter will sail for France to meet various engagements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK AMERICAN

MORIZ ROSENTHAL will present the solo piano part in Chopin's E minor sonata with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening. Franck's symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture complete the programme. The orchestra will present De Falla's "Gardens of Spain"; Scriabin's "Divine Poem"; suite by Handel, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture at the Saturday afternoon concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

With Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final program at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, a farewell in that borough for Conductor Monteux.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Monteux. Soloist, Moriz Rosenthal.

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano concerto No. 1, E minor.....Chopin
Symphony, D minor.....Cesar Franck

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall. Farewell of Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Concerto Grosso, G minor.....Handel
The Divine Poem.....Scriabin
Gardens of Spain.....De Falla
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 30

Gliere's "The Sirens" Heard Here.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In yesterday's TIMES you mentioned that the first performance of Gliere's "The Sirens" was given in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux.

This statement is incorrect, as I heard this composition at Carnegie Hall on April 5, 1918, conducted by Ossip Gabrilowitsch with a special orchestra which he had assembled.

FREDERICK A. BURTON.

New York, March 24, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS. HERALD

MAR 30 1924

Pierre Monteux will make his farewell appearances in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Moriz Rosenthal will play Chopin's E minor piano concerto at the Thursday concert and Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," and a new score by Manuel de Falla, entitled "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," will be the features Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux, who is conducting performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Boston in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening, will end his term there on May 3

In spite of rumors to the contrary which have developed during the past few months, it is definitely established that Serge Koussevitzky will come to America next fall to lead the Boston Symphony—the first Russian to serve as conductor of that organization. At present, he is making guest appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra, to be followed by concerts in Milan, Rome and Barcelona. In May, he will complete his Paris series and direct "Boris Godunoff" at the Opéra, with, probably, a short opera season in London and a vacation intervening before he sails for America on the Aquitania, September 4. In an interview in "The Boston Globe," Mr. Koussevitzky expresses his happiness at the prospect of coming to this country, and promises new music especially from Spain, Russia and France, including modern Russian works. He hopes to give a symphony by Miacowsky, who was represented on the last program of the League of Composers. Another feature is to be some old classic works which have not been played before

The other day I had a very welcome visit from Mr. W. H. Brennan, the manager of Symphony Hall and of the world-famed Symphony concert in Boston. Mr. Brennan, who was here to interview Kusovitsky, the successor of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the aforesaid concerts, told me, among much else, that in the U. S. A. the tax gatherer demands no entertainment tax for such orchestral concerts as those of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the educational value of which is recognized, even officialy, as well "worth the money." For myself, I confess I have never had the point put clearly and convincingly before me that the entertainment tax is really the bugbear it is said by entertainers to be. After all, it is the public that pay the tax, is it not? However, I am all in favor of the American view as illustrated above.—Robin H. Legge in the London Daily Telegraph.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. UNION

Serge Koussevitsky.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to assume the leadership of the Boston most famous in that metropolis. He has appeared each season as guest conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra and likewise in other cities of Europe. He has also conducted each Russian opera when mounted at the Grand Opera in Paris.

"Gallia" to Be Sung.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MAR 1924

Serge Koussevitsky, who will succeed Pierre Monteaux as conductor of the Boston Symphony, will sail from Cherbourg, France, on Sept. 4, en route for New York and Boston, according to press reports.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND, ME. TELEGRAM

MAR 30 1924

There is, of course, a good deal of curiosity regarding Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Monteux has perfected the ensemble and refined artistry of the organization. It is said that Koussevitsky, the Russian, will be more a conductor of the modern, with due attention paid to the classic.

Koussevitsky is now completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. At these concerts in March and April he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini and Tschaikowsky. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitsky concerts" and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the Grand Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for America Sept. 4 on the S. S. Aquitania.

Serge Koussevitsky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At 12 he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He graduated from Moscow Conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitsky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the orchestra which he organized, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orches- concerts in Paris and London.

BOSTON, MASS. TRANSCRIPT

L1924

BEETHOVEN AND BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on the centenary of its first performance are connoted in an exhibition in the Music Room of the Public Library of the city of Boston.

The story of the commission given to Beethoven a little over a hundred years ago to write an oratorio for the Handel and Haydn Society may be read in Elson's "History of American Music" or in Thayer's "Life of Beethoven." Although the commission was never carried out, the interest in the great composer at that time led a Harvard man to devote practically all his life to writing the life of the composer, which is incidentally one of the great biographies of the world.

On the twenty-fourth of this month, one hundred years ago, Beethoven's great Mass in D received its initial performance in Russia, and on May 7 of the same year Vienna heard the first performance of the Choral Symphony. The Harmonicon for August of that year contains a translation of a Vienna journal's account of its first performance, and a letter received in England at that time may be seen in the Musical World of April, 1837.

An analysis in the Quarterly Magazine and Review for 1825 says "all the known acoustical missile instruments were employed and they made even the very ground shake under us, and would, with their fearful uproar, have been sufficiently penetrating to call from their peaceful graves . . . the revered shades of Tallis, Purcell and Gibbons, and even Handel and Mozart, to witness and deplore the obstreperous roarings of modern frenzy in their art."

Of special interest is the account of the first performance in Boston in Dwight's Journal of Music for February. 1853. A translation of a German analysis was made and Richard Wagner's "Programme to the Ninth Symphony" was specially translated for the Journal. The editor felt it necessary to issue an appeal to "withhold all encouragement from the whispering and bustle." In the ten days of the performance of the Symphony there were also given Beethoven's oratorio, "The Mount of Olives," from which the Harvard Glee Club is to sing a selection next week, a Mendelsshon Festival, a Chamber Concert, and three or four nights of Alboni's Operas.

Included in the exhibition are fac simile manuscripts of the first page of the Symphony and the sketch for the "Ode to Joy," a picture of the house in which Schiller wrote his Ode, detailed studies of the music and the instrumentation, and pictures of Max Klinger's celebrated and much discussed statue of the composer.

One of the most touching of all criticisms or tributes is that of Helen Keller, who "listened in" to a performance of this Symphony in New York recently. She said, "As I listened, with darkness and melody, shadow and sound filling all the room, I could not help remembering that the great composer who poured forth such a flood of sweetness into the world was deaf like myself. I marvelled at the power of his quenchless spirit by which out of his pain he wrought such joy for others—and, there I sat feeling with my hand the magnificent symphony which broke like a sea upon the silent shores of his soul and mine."

From Traveler Oct May 1902 Boston, Mass.

The Ninth Symphony in Boston

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the overture to "Fidelio," was presented at a Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Marie Sundelius, soprano, Marjorie Squires, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. As all seats for the concert had been sold soon after it was announced, it was repeated in the evening before another crowded house.

Although the performance yesterday was not interrupted by applause, as at the first presentation 100 years ago in Vienna, it was received with rapt attention, and was greeted at every interval with warm and prolonged clapping, to which at the end cheers were added—a rare event indeed at Symphony Hall.

No one could deny that the tribute was deserved. The orchestra was at the top of its bent, which in these days of its restored excellence is saying a great deal. Not only were the first violins stirring in tone and eloquent in phrase and dynamics, but the other strings, the wind and the percussion admirably balanced them under Mr. Monteux's baton. Exquisite in particular were the dialogues of solo flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon.

But, after all, these delights of the first three movements were as a tale that is told; we had heard them within two years from the same musicians. What the audiences came to hear was the choral movement, given for the first time in Boston for seven years, and for the first time anywhere with the assistance of the young collegians trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, who has raised the Harvard Glee Club (and, incidentally, the Choral Society of Radcliffe College, the women's department of Harvard University) from the status of performers of "college songs" to that of students and interpreters of the finest choral music. Their performance quite sustained their reputation. Indeed, it is possible that this last symphonic message of Beethoven never had a more splendid interpretation. Perhaps it requires such youth not only to sustain those high passages which look impossible of execution, but to feel and convey in tones the joy and love of which Schiller sang. L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

AUSTIN, TEXAS STATESMAN

MAR

Margaret Matzenaur was the soloist on Thursday evening last at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an all-Wagner program, Pierre Monteux conducted.

Mr. Sanborn felt that in the immolation music "Mme. Matzenaur seemed fully aware of her opportunity and the result was the delivery of Brunhilde's music that I have never heard equaled. Every note was audible and nearly every note was beautiful. She sang with searching expressiveness and with the requisite breadth and elevation of style." According to the Times, "Mme. Matzenaur feels intensely the dramatic spirit of this music and she makes her audience understand it. She was in unusually good voice." Mr. Henderson's comment was that "Mme. Matzenaur sang in her familiar manner, with vehemence and vocal variety."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

MERIDEN CONN. RECORD

MAR 1924

a bo

Miss Marguerite Erickson of Yalesville, a graduate of the local high school, now a student of Radcliffe college, is among those who have been selected from Harvard university to sing with the Boston symphony at their spring concert.

There will be a business meeting

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MUSIC NOTES

The last but one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of the season will be given at Carnegie Hall this evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct in a Chopin-Beethoven-Franck program. Moriz Rosenthal, pianist, will be the soloist on this occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE 14 ANACONDA
MONT.
STANDARD
MAR 3 1924

WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY—George Schneevoight of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city. He is one of the best of continental leaders, having received engagements all over Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOHNSTOWN
PA.
LEDGER
APR

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 4 1924

At Carnegie Hall Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra gave the last Thursday evening concert of the season. Moriz Rosenthal was soloist. Mr. Monteux and his band appear this evening at the Academy and further comment may be reserved for that occasion.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

With the concerts of the present week, Pierre Monteux ends his term as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He came to his task when the orchestra was disorganized by the war and by the strike of some of the members for unionism. How he helped to restore its former prestige is well known. Nothing demonstrates the extent of his success more than the changed attitude of the New York critics during the last two years. Inclined at first to regard Mr. Monteux as a conductor of mediocre attainments, now they are united in his praise. Fortunately Boston early discovered his merits. To American composers he has given opportunities more generously than any of his predecessors in Symphony hall, and as a program-maker he has preserved just balance betwen the ancient and modern. He leaves a well-nigh perfect instrument for his successor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y.
TIMES
APR 4 1924

MUSIC

As It Was Composed.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, which even Mr. Monteux had to play this season in New York; Chopin's E minor concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as pianist, and the one and incomparable D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck made the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall.

The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensitive interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck. The Beethoven overture, overplayed as it has been this season, remains the most dramatic, the most thrilling of all works its form. Generations will come and , and those who listen will be stirred the mysterious introduction, the usic of preparation and suspense, the umpet call of deliverance and the rantic rejoicings that bring the conlusion.

As for Franck's symphony, it becomes reater with familiarity. It, too, is ramatic—not in the spirit of the heatre, like Beethoven's overture, but as the consummate enactment in tones of that inner drama which absorbed Franck to the exclusion of every baser thing—the drama of doubt and at last of triumphant faith, of the one who said "Lord, I believe. Help Thou mine unbelief," and who clearly perceived that the meek shall inherit the earth. In the performance of this symphony there was that tenderness and agitation of the spirit which are Franck's, and at the climaxes the stormy splendor of an orchestration which has few if any parallels in point of noble and majestic sonority. Mr. Monteux reaped a deserved reward in the enthusiasm shown by the audience.

Mr. Rosenthal has been more famous with the great public as a performer of the Liszt E flat concerto and other similar compositions than as the interpreter of the concertos of Chopin. Last night he played with the utmost refinement of style, and lyrical warmth, and romantic emotion. In the final measures a storm of Rosenthal octaves broke loose—a wholly legitimate effect, always—there was profound respect for the original proportions of the work, and the exquisite interpretation of the romanza was in itself worth a journey. Mr. Rosenthal was repeatedly recalled. A brilliant concert of familiar master-

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Pierre Monteux bade a last farewell to his Thursday evening audiences last night in Carnegie Hall. Judging from the storm of applause that greeted him upon his first appearance on the platform, after every pause in the playing, and after the concert, New York has—a little late—learned to appreciate his very real excellence and is sorry to see him go.

Mr. Monteux's penultimate program was well chosen and met with emphatic approval from his hearers, although upon an occasion less charged with goodwill it might not have caused so much excitement. Its most completely satisfactory portion was possibly the performance of the third "Leonore" overture that began it, a vivid one, full of beautiful color and dramatic breadth.

One should perhaps be grateful to Moritz Rosenthal, who was the soloist of the evening, for playing a concerto that had not been worn out with incessant repetitions. He chose Chopin's second, in E minor, which sounded almost like a novelty. Unfortunately, however, the neglect of this particular concerto is not so inexplicable after one has heard it.

Chopin was emphatically not a composer for the orchestra, and the E minor concerto sometimes sounds as if the composer had first conceived it as a sonata and later, discovering that the piece was supposed to be played with orchestra, had written in just enough instrumental accompaniment to prevent the band's going out to have a smoke. The net result is a long piano solo, generally played against a perfunctory background of sustained string harmony, with occasional interruptions, "tutti," restating what the piano has just said or predicting what he is about to say.

Nor is the music itself very good Chopin. The slow movement has moments of great beauty, although much of it is sentimental, and there is a stirring march passage in the first that is effective. But the closing rondo, concerning which Chopin himself wrote, "The Rondo for my concerto is not yet finished, because the right inspired mood has always been wanting," was apparently finished without bothering to wait for the right inspired mood.

Mr. Rosenthal played the concerto with authority and dazzling brilliance, and was mightily applauded for it. The concert closed with Franck's D minor symphony, which managed to sound disturbingly threadbare in places, despite the heartening combination of metriculous detail and feeling for structure that Mr. Monteux brought to it.

OTHER MUSIC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
APR 5 1924

"SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" SUBJECT OF LECTURE

Radical Musical Score to Be Explained at Library Tonight

Stravinsky's "Sacre du rintemps," one of the most daring and remarkable of modern musical scores, will be explained tonight in a free lecture in the Boston Public Library by Laurence V. Powell. Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced this music to New York and Boston this season. In each city it made such a vivid impression that it had to be repeated. The Boston repetition will take place at the symphony concerts next week, when the "Sacre du Printemps" or "Rite or Spring," will be added as an extra number at the end of the program, so that any who may be unwilling will not be obliged to listen to this ultra-radical score.

Tonight Mr. Powell will elucidate its rhythmic and other complexities, finally performing the entire composition on a player-piano.

The lecture will be given in the lecture hall of the library, Boylston street entrance. No tickets are required.

From
Evening Sun APR 4 1924
New York City

Boston Symphony's Concert

Pierre Monteux Makes Final Evening Appearance as Conductor of Famous Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening had a significance not to be found in either the music or its performance. It brought with it the final evening appearance of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the famous old organization which he had done much to restore to its former level.

After the war and the expulsion of the German members the Boston orchestra was badly disorganized and its playing sank to a level of indifference which drove away many of the old subscribers.

The ensemble has not yet risen again quite to the degree of excellence it formerly had, but it has greatly improved and undoubtedly M. Monteux is entitled to no small share of the credit. He is now about to take his departure and his post is to be occupied by a Russian as yet unknown to this country. There has been ground for regret about some of M. Monteux's programs and some of his interpretations, but there has also been reason to congratulate him upon some very admirable achievements such as his production of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

He has been most at home in music of the Stravinsky type and next to that in the compositions of his countrymen. His direction of Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" was most delightful. He will leave no sensational record behind him, but friends of the Boston organization will await with some anxiety the advent of his successor. Last evening's audience gave him a long and very hearty reception when he appeared on the stage. The program presented comprised Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3, Chopin's E minor piano concerto and the Cesar Franck symphony. The pianist was Moriz Rosenthal, who has been playing Chopin's first concerto for more years than the new generation of music lovers has lived.

The passing of the seasons and the grandiose utterances of modern piano music have not bettered the state of the concerto. It is not in the repertory of the greater Chopin. Its melodic thread is stretched too far, its harmonic texture lacks the true Chopin gold. Mr. Rosenthal played the music with much discretion. He had his own ideas about some of the rhythms and substituted original accentuation for that of the score in some places.

But it was a genuine virtuoso performance, and the last movement in particular was played with brilliancy and a rich variety of color. And in many pages Mr. Rosenthal demonstrated that as a pianissimist he was quite the rival of Pachmann. The erudite program notes of Philip Hale did not reveal whose orchestration was used. It sounded like Richard Burmeister, but it is not a matter of importance. Of course Mr. Rosenthal played the Tausig octaves in the coda of the third movement. They would have astonished Chopin.

The Cesar Franck symphony may possibly be allowed to rest a bit now. It has had seven or eight performances since the season began. Of course M. Monteux and his men dispensed its beauties generously. The audience was responsive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TODAY'S BIRTHDAYS

Earl of Derby, British statesman and former cabinet minister, born in London, 59 years ago today.

Sir William Soulsby, for fifty years private secretary to the Lord Mayors of London, born 73 years ago today.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

Guy U. Hardy, representative in Congress of the Third Colorado district, born at Abingdon, Ill., 52 years ago today.

Tris Speaker, for many years a conspicuous figure in professional baseball, born at Hubbard City, Texas, 36 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FM THE
NEW YOK
N. Y.
TELEGRM

There was applause long continued when Pierre Monteux walked to the conductor's desk on the Carnegie Hall stage yesterday evening. Mr. Monteux was about to lead his last local evening concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His final farewell to New York in that capacity takes place in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. To the professional concert-goer the choice was unfortunate. The third "Leonore" has been all but played into the ground here this season. On the other hand there are three Beethoven overtures almost, if not quite, as great, none of which, to the best of my belief, has been played here at all this season outside of Walter Damrosch's Beethoven cycle. I mean the second "Leonore," the "Coriolan," and the "Egmont."

Still it is a fact that the Boston Symphony subscribers had not previously been treated to the third "Leonore," and, furthermore, a departing conductor has certainly a right to his own programs. Mr. Monteux's reading was marked by the vivid contrasts now in favor with conductors of this overture. But at least he obtained an amply dramatic performance, marred at a crucial point, it is true, by a difference as to pitch between the orchestra on the stage and the solo trumpet off.

There followed Chopin's E minor piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as the pianist. Mr. Rosenthal has played this work so often in the course of a long career that supposedly he might be able to ripple it off backwards in his sleep. Be that as it may, he played it forwards last evening with the utmost fluency, neatness and skill in phrasing. Mr. Monteux led the orchestra in a sympathetically responsive accompaniment.

The rest of the concert was devoted to the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck. If a conductor who distributes his favors with such an equal-handed justice as Pierre Monteux can be said to indulge in battle horses, this symphony is among those steeds. He led it here at the beginning of his career as leader of the Boston band, and last night he obtained for it again a fine and eloquent performance.

The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic throughout the evening. It recalled Mr. Rosenthal many times and at the very end it made Mr. Monteux return to bow repeatedly. After both the overture and the symphony the conductor summoned his men to rise and share with him in the acknowledgment of the applause.

A sound concert greeted heartily.

PITTS SANBORN.

From APR 5 19
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

ROSENTHAL SOLOIST

Moritz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, will be the soloist at the 21st regular pair of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 11 and 12. He will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Another feature of this concert will be the repetition of Stravinsky's remarkable score "La Sacre du Printemps." This will be added as an extra number at the end of the program, which otherwise includes Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
14 ANACONDA
MONT.
STANDARD

MAR 3 1924

WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY—George Schneevoight of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city. He is one of the best of continental leaders, having received engagements all over Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOHNSTOWN
PA.
LEDGER

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 4

At Carnegie Hall Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra gave the last Thursday evening concert of the season. Moriz Rosenthal was soloist. Mr. Monteux and his band appear this evening at the Academy and further comment may be reserved for that occasion.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

With the concerts of the present week, Pierre Monteux ends his term as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He came to his task when the orchestra was disorganized by the war and by the strike of some of the members for unionism. How he helped to restore its former prestige is well known. Nothing demonstrates the extent of his success more than the changed attitude of the New York critics during the last two years. Inclined at first to regard Mr. Monteux as a conductor of mediocre attainments, now they are united in his praise. Fortunately Boston early discovered his merits. To American composers he has given opportunities more generously than any of his predecessors in Symphony hall, and as a program-maker he has preserved just balance betwen the ancient and modern. He leaves a well-nigh perfect instrument for his successor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y.
TIMES

APR 4 1924

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Pierre Monteux bade a last farewell to his Thursday evening audiences last night in Carnegie Hall. Judging from the storm of applause that greeted him upon his first appearance on the platform, after every pause in the playing, and after the concert, New York has—a little late—learned to appreciate his very real excellence and is sorry to see him go.

Mr. Monteux's penultimate program was well chosen and met with emphatic approval from his hearers, although upon an occasion less charged with goodwill it might not have caused so much excitement. Its most completely satisfactory portion was possibly the performance of the third "Leonore" overture that began it, a vivid one, full of beautiful color and dramatic breadth.

One should perhaps be grateful to Moritz Rosenthal, who was the soloist of the evening, for playing a concerto that had not been worn out with incessant repetitions. He chose Chopin's second, in E minor, which sounded almost like a novelty. Unfortunately, however, the neglect of this particular concerto is not so inexplicable after one has heard it.

Chopin was emphatically not a composer for the orchestra, and the E minor concerto sometimes sounds as if the composer had first conceived it as a sonata and later, discovering that the piece was supposed to be played with orchestra, had written in just enough instrumental accompaniment to prevent the band's going out to have a smoke. The net result is a long piano solo, generally played against a perfunctory background of sustained string harmony, with occasional interruptions, "tutti," restating what the piano has just said or predicting what he is about to say.

Nor is the music itself very good Chopin. The slow movement has moments of great beauty, although much of it is sentimental, and there is a stirring march passage in the first that is effective. But the closing rondo, concerning which Chopin himself wrote, "The Rondo for my concerto is not yet finished, because the right inspired mood has always been wanting," was apparently finished without bothering to wait for the right inspired mood.

Mr. Rosenthal played the concerto with authority and dazzling brilliance, and was mightily applauded for it. The concert closed with Franck's D minor symphony, which managed to sound disturbingly threadbare in places, despite the heartening combination of metriculous detail and feeling for structure that Mr. Monteux brought to it.

OTHER MUSIC.

...ing ... some-

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

APR 5 192

MUSIC

As It Was Composed.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, which even Mr. Monteux had to play this season in New York; Chopin's E minor concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as pianist, and the one and incomparable D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck made the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall.

The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensitive interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck. The Beethoven overture, overplayed as it has been this season, remains the most ...ramatic, the most thrilling of all works ... its form. Generations will come and ..., and those who listen will be stirred ... the mysterious introduction, the ...usic of preparation and suspense, the ...rumpet call of deliverance and the ...rantic rejoicings that bring the con...lusion.

As for Franck's symphony, it becomes ...reater with familiarity. It, too, is ...ramatic—not in the spirit of the ...heatre, like Beethoven's overture, but ...as the consummate enactment in tones ...of that inner drama which absorbed ...Franck to the exclusion of every base... thing—the drama of doubt and at last of triumphant faith, of the one who said, "Lord, I believe. Help Thou mine unbelief," and who clearly perceived that the meek shall inherit the earth. In the performance of this symphony there was that tenderness and agitation of the spirit which are Franck's, and at the climaxes the stormy splendor of an orchestration which has few if any parallels in point of noble and majestic sonority. Mr. Monteux reaped a deserved reward in the enthusiasm shown by the audience.

Mr. Rosenthal has been more famous with the great public as a performer of the Liszt E flat concerto and other similar compositions than as the interpreter of the concertos of Chopin. Last night he played with the utmost refinement of style, and lyrical warmth, and romantic emotion. In the final measures a storm of Rosenthal octaves broke loose—a wholly legitimate effect, always—there was profound respect for the original proportions of the work, and the exquisite interpretation of the romanza was in itself worth a journey. Mr. Rosenthal was repeatedly recalled. A brilliant concert of familiar master-pieces.

"SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" SUBJECT OF LECTURE

Radical Musical Score to Be Explained at Library Tonight

Stravinsky's "Sacre du rintemps," one of the most daring and remarkable of modern musical scores, will be explained tonight in a free lecture in the Boston Public Library by Laurence V. Powell. Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced this music to New York and Boston this season. In each city it made such a vivid impression that it had to be repeated. The Boston repetition will take place at the symphony concerts next week, when the "Sacre du Printemps" or "Rite or Spring," will be added as an extra number at the end of the program, so that any who may be unwilling will not be obliged to listen to this ultra-radical score.

Tonight Mr. Powell will elucidate its rhythmic and other complexities, finally performing the entire composition on a player-piano.

The lecture will be given in the lecture hall of the library, Boylston street entrance. No tickets are required.

Boston Symphony's Concert

Pierre Monteux Makes Final Evening Appearance as Conductor of Famous Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening had a significance not to be found in either the music or its performance. It brought with it the final evening appearance of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the famous old organization which he had done much to restore to its former level.

After the war and the expulsion of the German members the Boston orchestra was badly disorganized and its playing sank to a level of indifference which drove away many of the old subscribers.

The ensemble has not yet risen again quite to the degree of excellence it formerly had, but it has greatly improved and undoubtedly M. Monteux is entitled to no small share of the credit. He is now about to take his departure and his post is to be occupied by a Russian as yet unknown to this country. There has been ground for regret about some of M. Monteux's programs and some of his interpretations, but there has also been reason to congratulate him upon some very admirable achievements such as his production of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

He has been most at home in music of the Stravinsky type and next to that in the compositions of his countrymen. His direction of Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" was most delightful. He will leave no sensational record behind him, but friends of the Boston organization will await with some anxiety the advent of his successor. Last evening's audience gave him a long and very hearty reception when he appeared on the stage. The program presented comprised Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3, Chopin's E minor piano concerto and the Cesar Franck symphony. The pianist was Moriz Rosenthal, who has been playing Chopin's first concerto for more years than the new generation of music lovers has lived.

The passing of the seasons and the grandiose utterances of modern piano music have not bettered the state of the concerto. It is not in the repertory of the greater Chopin. Its melodic thread is stretched too far, its harmonic texture lacks the true Chopin gold. Mr. Rosenthal played the music with much discretion. He had his own ideas about some of the rhythms and substituted original accentuation for that of the score in some places.

But it was a genuine virtuoso performance, and the last movement in particular was played with brilliancy and a rich variety of color. And in many pages Mr. Rosenthal demonstrated that as a pianissimist he was quite the rival of Pachmann. The erudite program notes of Philip Hale did not reveal whose orchestration was used. It sounded like Richard Burmeister, but it is not a matter of importance. Of course Mr. Rosenthal played the Tausig octaves in the coda of the third movement. They would have astonished Chopin.

The Cesar Franck symphony may possibly be allowed to rest a bit now. It has had seven or eight performances since the season began. Of course M. Monteux and his men dispensed its beauties generously. The audience was responsive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TODAY'S BIRTHDAYS

Earl of Derby, British statesman and former cabinet minister, born in London, 59 years ago today.

Sir William Soulsby, for fifty years private secretary to the Lord Mayors of London, born 73 years ago today.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

Guy U. Hardy, representative in Congress of the Third Colorado district, born at Abingdon, Ill., 52 years ago today.

Tris Speaker, for many years a conspicuous figure in professional baseball, born at Hubbard City, Texas, 36 years ago today.

TODAY'S EVENTS

THIS CLIPPING FM THE
NEW YOK
N. Y.
TELEGRM

There was applause long continued when Pierre Monteux walked to the conductor's desk on the Carnegie Hall stage yesterday evening. Mr. Monteux was about to lead his last local evening concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His final farewell to New York in that capacity takes place in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. To the professional concert-goer the choice was unfortunate. The third "Leonore" has been all but played into the ground here this season. On the other hand there are three Beethoven overtures almost, if not quite, as great, none of which, to the best of my belief, has been played here at all this season outside of Walter Damrosch's Beethoven cycle. I mean the second "Leonore," the "Coriolan," and the "Egmont."

Still it is a fact that the Boston Symphony subscribers had not previously been treated to the third "Leonore," and, furthermore, a departing conductor has certainly a right to his own programs. Mr. Monteux's reading was marked by the vivid contrasts now in favor with conductors of this overture. But at least he obtained an ample dramatic performance, marred at a crucial point, it is true, by a difference as to pitch between the orchestra on the stage and the solo trumpet off.

There followed Chopin's E minor piano concerto, with Moriz Rosenthal as the pianist. Mr. Rosenthal has played this work so often in the course of a long career that supposedly he might be able to ripple it off backwards in his sleep. Be that as it may, he played it forwards last evening with the utmost fluency, neatness and skill in phrasing. Mr. Monteux led the orchestra in a sympathetically responsive accompaniment.

The rest of the concert was devoted to the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck. If a conductor who distributes his favors with such an equal-handed justice as Pierre Monteux can be said to indulge in battle horses, this symphony is among those steeds. He led it here at the beginning of his career as leader of the Boston band, and last night he obtained for it again a fine and eloquent performance.

The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic throughout the evening. It recalled Mr. Rosenthal many times and at the very end it made Mr. Monteux return to bow repeatedly. After both the overture and the symphony the conductor summoned his men to rise and share with him in the acknowledgment of the applause.

A sound concert greeted heartily.

PITTS SANBORN

From APR 5 19
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

ROSENTHAL SOLOIST

Moritz Rosenthal, the famous pianist, will be the soloist at the 21st regular pair of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 11 and 12. He will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Another feature of this concert will be the repetition of Stravinsky's remarkable score "La Sacre du Printemps." This will be added as an extra number at the end of the program, which otherwise includes Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

APR 4 - 1924

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concerts—Rosenthal Plays Chopin

FORTY YEARS AGO Moritz Rosenthal enchanted the Viennese public with his piano playing, just as he did a New York audience last night in Carnegie Hall, when he performed Chopin's E minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was playing in which technical display was subordinated to style, taste, and the purely musical aspects of the case. Possibly the fact that Rosenthal (who is a native of Poland) studied the piano at the Lemberg Conservatory with Mikuli, who was a pupil of Chopin, gave his reading of the concerto a special touch of authority. But that was not needed; Mr. Rosenthal is a musician, who is pretty sure to do the right thing always. It was not always so; I remember the time when he would take the bit between his teeth and run away with the music. Tempi passati. Needless to add that the audience showed its appreciation last night of his spirited playing to the full.

M. Monteux and his players sailed in the safe waters of Beethoven's third "Lenora" and the classical Cesar Frank symphony. And thus ended the forty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, so far as the Thursday nights are concerned. Tomorrow afternoon Pierre Monteux will appear here for the last time as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, which he has once more brought to a state approaching perfection. His place will be taken, as is now known for certain, by the Russian double-bass virtuoso and virtuoso conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will preside over the New York concerts of this orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on November 27, 29; January 1, 3, 29, 31; March 12, 14, and April 9, 11—ten in all, five on Thursday nights, the others on Saturday afternoons.

Following is a list of the works performed in its afternoon concerts in New York by the Boston Orchestra during the season just ending: Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral"; Bliss, a color symphony; Brahms, tragic overture; Debussy, symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian"; Dukas, "La Peri: Poeme Danse"; De Falla, noches en los jardines de Sspana, piano solo, Heinrich Gebhardt; Handel, concerto grosso No. 6, in G minor; Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello, soloist, Jean Bedetti; Liszt, "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Alexander Siloti; Mahler, symphony in D major, No. 1; Mozart, violin concerto in E flat (K 268), soloist, Jacques Thibaud; Ravel, Daphnis and Chloe (suite No. 1); Respighi, old dances and airs for the lue (freely arranged); Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120; Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," op. 43; Smetana, overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Sold Bride"); Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), a picture of Pagan Russia; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

The Thursday evening programs included the following:

Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Chopin, concerto in E minor for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Moriz Rosenthal; Franck, symphony in D minor; Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem, op. 33; Liszt, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo"; Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute," symphony in C major; Schubert, songs with orchestra, soloist, Sigrid Onegin; Sibelius, symphony in E minor, concerto in D minor for violin and orchestra, soloist, Richard Bourgin; Strauss, Dance of Salome, Symphonia Domestica; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps"; Wagner, scene, "Just God!" from "Rienzi," soloist, Sigrid Onegin; prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a Siegfried Idyl, Isolde's Narrative (Act I), "Tristan and Isolde," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer; Bacchanale, "Tannhauser," Ride of the Valkyries (Act III), "Die Walkure"; Waloweben (Act II), "Siegfried"; Brunnhilde's Immolation Scene and Close, "Gotterdammerung," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

HENRY T. FINCK.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

APR 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL COME HERE WITH RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will come to America next fall to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, and who is scheduled to appear in Hartford with that orchestra twice next winter, is at present completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. At these concerts, given in March and April, he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini, and Tchaikovsky. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous Koussevitzky concerts, and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the grand opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for America September 4 on the S. S. Aquitania.

Serge Koussevitzky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At twelve he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and was said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the orchestra which he organized, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Parisand London. The "Koussevitzky Concerts" in Paris have in the last four seasons l... the most famous in that metrop... He has appeared each season as g... conductor with the London symp... orchestra and likewise in other cit... Europe. He has also conducted ... Russian opera when mounted ... grand opera in Paris.

In a recent interview given by ... Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky said:

"You don't know how happy I ... go to America. I consider the ... symphany orchestra one of the bes... the world. I shall conduct in Boston more than thirty concerts during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the sixteenth century and 1923.

"In fact, I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation.

"Isn't it funny, I have been on my way to America four times before; for the first time, in 1908, and the last time in 1916, and always there came something in the way. In 1916 I had ticket and everything packed, I was just leaving for the station to go to New York via Japan and San Francisco, when I was called under arms. This time nothing shall prevent me from going.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EASTON,
PA.
EXPRESS

APR 4 1924

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Sun

15

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Cesar Franck at Carnegie Hall

"I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said Cesar Franck on his deathbed, thinking of the uncompleted "Magnificat" versicles—"or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Cesar Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew Franck well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith: a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. Yet M. Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of his heart than the valiant serenity of Franck's exterior would have led one to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the D minor Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression of a devout and rapturous exaltation.

* * *

It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue, than because of that which the music conveys to us, that one returns to Franck's symphony without satiety. We heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and again we were impressed by the discrepancy between the elevation and fineness of its emotional substance and the more than occasional triteness and inferiority of its musical expression. The meditations of Franck, the mystical rhapsodist, touch us again and again by their sincerity and their exaltation; and at certain happily inspired moments his tonal embodiment of them achieves a noble distinction of contour and gesture—as in the concluding nine measures of the first movement, where the ancient device of imitation lifts the music to a magnificent peroration.

* * *

But Franck does not seem to have realized when he was speaking like a seer and a poet and when he was repeating glib banalities. He did not always know whether the garment he had donned and was wearing with such innocent unconsciousness was a singing robe or a second-hand overcoat. His singing robes were woven of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls—how gorgeous the texture of his music is at its best, as in a few rare pages of the Symphony! And how shabby and thin and lusterless it is in many and many another page, when Père Franck is seen praying fervently in a threadbare ulster—a hand-me-down from the wardrobe of the Wagner-Liszt household. And sometimes the music is not even warmed-over Wagner or Liszt; sometimes it is poor Franck in his most anaemic condition, shivering forlornly in a bathrobe—as in that incredibly trivial third theme of the first movement, uttered fortissimo by the violins and woodwind in F major, with pathetic confidence and satisfaction, as if the composer were convinced beyond argument that he had come upon a very jewel of inspiration!

* * *

Mr. Monteux's performance of the work last night was rather a merciless one; for it lingered with misguided affection over some of Franck's most sugary sentimentalities—as in the plaintive song of the violins in the slow introduction—and passed too lightly and casually over those great moments in which Franck stopped weeping maudlin chromatic tears like an impotent Tristan, straightened his shoulders, drew himself up to his full height, faced the morning sun, and realized that he himself, as Omar so hearteningly remarked, was Heaven and Hell. The sun is reflected in his face, in the splendid beauty that irradiates the final measures of the Symphony's first movement, and we could not help wishing that Mr. Monteux had encouraged his brilliant orchestra to blaze forth there in all its potential magnificance.

* * *

Between the Symphony, which ended Mr. Monteux's program, and the third "Leonore" Overture, which began it, came Mr. Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, with Chopin's E minor piano concerto for his vehicle. The long opening tutti was benignly curtailed; yet this concerto is still too long, and the first movement especially is an almost unmitigated bore. Nor are the other two movements first-rate or even second-rate Chopin. Mr. Rosenthal played them as well, doubtless, as any one could—he played, indeed, quite marvelously at times, and was fervently applauded and frequently recalled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

MINNEAPOLIS
MINN.
STAR

APR 4 1924

The Slav Impress On Music.

A cursory glance at the accomplishments of the Slav in music forces one to the conclusion that the proud position held by Germany for over a century in the realm of creative and interpretative musical art is being seriously threatened. Aside from the questionable distinction accorded to a man like Stravinsky, the list of men and women of unquestioned genius among the Slavic peoples is imposing in its magnitude.

While the names of several great leaders of German musical thought are found less and less on concert programs, there is an increasingly large number of compositions written by men of Slavic origin. We are just beginning to realize the existence of men like Rimsky-Korsakov, Glavounow, Scriabene and the members of the school to which they belong. Their potency lies, not so much in depth of thought, as it does in the realization of new types of thought, pictorial, aggressive, colorful, with an exotic element that, once its strangeness is mastered, appeals to music lovers everywhere.

The news that the great Russian, Koussevitzky, will conduct the famous Boston symphony orchestra is in line with the activities of the Slav in another direction. This man threatens Boston with a perfect inundation of Slavic music, written by men who are not even known by name to the average American. A Russian, Rabinoff, has just opened an "American Institute of Opera" at Stony Point, N. Y. Paderewski is still the premier of the piano no matter if he lost his political position.

We are singularly fortunate that another great Russian has chosen to display the glories of his vocal art in this city. Chaliapin is a name to conjure with; he is the acknowledged peer of any singer now before the public, a giant in stature, magnificent in opera, still more striking on the concert platform. He is without a rival in any country. His coming represents the climax of one of the finest music seasons in the history of Minneapolis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 4 - 1924

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concerts—Rosenthal Plays Chopin

FORTY YEARS AGO Moritz Rosenthal enchanted the Viennese public with his piano playing, just as he did a New York audience last night in Carnegie Hall, when he performed Chopin's E minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was playing in which technical display was subordinated to style, taste, and the purely musical aspects of the case. Possibly the fact that Rosenthal (who is a native of Poland) studied the piano at the Lemberg Conservatory with Mikuli, who was a pupil of Chopin, gave his reading of the concerto a special touch of authority. But that was not needed; Mr. Rosenthal is a musician, who is pretty sure to do the right thing always. It was not always so; I remember the time when he would take the bit between his teeth and run away with the music. Tempi passati. Needless to add that the audience showed its appreciation last night of his spirited playing to the full.

M. Monteux and his players sailed in the safe waters of Beethoven's third "Lenora" and the classical Cesar Frank symphony. And thus ended the forty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, so far as the Thursday nights are concerned. Tomorrow afternoon Pierre Monteux will appear here for the last time as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, which he has once more brought to a state approaching perfection. His place will be taken, as is now known for certain, by the Russian double-bass virtuoso and virtuoso conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will preside over the New York concerts of this orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on November 27, 29; January 1, 3, 29, 31; March 12, 14, and April 9, 11—ten in all, five on Thursday nights, the others on Saturday afternoons.

Following is a list of the works performed in its afternoon concerts in New York by the Boston Orchestra during the season just ending: Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral"; Bliss, a color symphony; Brahms, tragic overture; Debussy, symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian"; Dukas, "La Peri: Poeme Danse"; De Falla, noches en los jardines de Sspana, piano solo, Heinrich Gebhardt; Handel, concerto grosso No. 6, in G minor; Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello, soloist, Jean Bedetti; Liszt, "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Alexander Siloti; Mahler, symphony in D major, No. 1; Mozart, violin concerto in E flat (K 268), soloist, Jacques Thibaud; Ravel, Daphnis and Chloe (suite No. 1); Respighi, old dances and airs for the lue (freely arranged); Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120; Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," op. 43; Smetana, overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Sold Bride"); Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), a picture of Pagan Russia; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

The Thursday evening programs included the following:

Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Chopin, concerto in E minor for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Moriz Rosenthal; Franck, symphony in D minor; Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem, op. 33; Liszt, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo"; Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute," symphony in C major; Schubert, songs with orchestra, soloist, Sigrid Onegin; Sibelius, symphony in E minor, concerto in D minor for violin and orchestra, soloist, Richard Bourgin; Strauss, Dance of Salome, Symphonia Domestica; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps"; Wagner, scene, "Just God!" from "Rienzi," soloist, Sigrid Onegin; prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a Siegfried Idyl, Isolde's Narrative (Act I), "Tristan and Isolde," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer; Bacchanale, "Tannhauser," Ride of the Valkyries (Act III), "Die Walkure"; Waldweben (Act II), "Siegfried"; Brunnhilde's Immolation Scene and Close, "Gotterdammerung," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

HENRY T. FINCK.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES
APR 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL COME HERE WITH RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will come to America next fall to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, and who is scheduled to appear in Hartford with that orchestra twice next winter, is at present completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. At these concerts, given in March and April, he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini, and Tchaikovsky. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous Koussevitzky concerts, and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the grand opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for America September 4 on the S. S. Aquitania.

Serge Koussevitzky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At twelve he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and was said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the orchestra which he organized, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Parisand London. The "Koussevitzky Concerts" in Paris have in the last four seasons been the most famous in that metropolis. He has appeared each season as guest conductor with the London symphony orchestra and likewise in other cities of Europe. He has also conducted each Russian opera when mounted at the grand opera in Paris.

In a recent interview given by him in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky said:

"You don't know how happy I am to go to America. I consider the Boston symphany orchestra one of the best in the world. I shall conduct in Boston more than thirty concerts during the coming season and my repertoire will include the best of all music written between the sixteenth century and 1923.

"In fact, I have a real novelty for Boston as I have found some old classic works which never have been given before, not even in Europe. These works shall have their world premiers in Boston next season. Of course I am not going to tell you now what works they are. This shall remain a secret till I am over there; otherwise other people might spoil my sensation.

"Isn't it funny, I have been on my way to America four times before; for the first time, in 1908, and the last time in 1916, and always there came something in the way. In 1916 I had ticket and everything packed, I was just leaving for the station to go to New York via Japan and San Francisco, when I was called under arms. This time nothing shall prevent me from going.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France."

THIS CLIPPING FROM EASTON,
PA.
EXPRESS
APR 4 1924

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Paris, 49 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Sun
APR 5 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Cesar Franck at Carnegie Hall

"I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said Cesar Franck on his deathbed, thinking of the uncompleted "Magnificat" versicles—"or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Cesar Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew Franck well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith: a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. Yet M. Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of his heart than the valiant serenity of Franck's exterior would have led one to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the D minor Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression of a devout and rapturous exaltation.

* * *

It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue, than because of that which the music conveys to us, that one returns to Franck's symphony without satiety. We heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and again we were impressed by the discrepancy between the elevation and fineness of its emotional substance and the more than occasional triteness and inferiority of its musical expression. [illegible] meditations of Franck, the mystical rhapsodist, touch us again and [illegible] by their sincerity and their exaltation; and at certain happily inspiring moments his tonal embodiment [illegible] achieves a noble distinction [illegible] and gesture—as in the [illegible] nine measures of the first [illegible] where the ancient device of [illegible] has its the music to a magnificent [illegible]

[illegible] every [illegible] the ap[illegible] does not seem to have [illegible] was speaking like a [illegible] and when he was re[illegible]alities. He did not [illegible] whether the garment he had donned and was wearing with such innocent unconsciousness was a singing robe or a second-hand overcoat. His singing robes were woven of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls—how gorgeous the texture of his music is at its best, as in a few rare pages of the Symphony! And how shabby and thin and lusterless it is in many and many another page, when Père Franck is seen praying fervently in a threadbare ulster—a hand-me-down from the wardrobe of the Wagner-Liszt household. And sometimes the music is not even warmed-over Wagner or Liszt; sometimes it is poor Franck in his most anaemic condition, shivering forlornly in a bathrobe—as in that incredibly trivial third theme of the first movement, uttered fortissimo by the violins and woodwind in F major, with pathetic confidence and satisfaction, as if the composer were convinced beyond argument that he had come upon a very jewel of inspiration!

* * *

Mr. Monteux's performance of the work last night was rather a merciless one; for it lingered with misguided affection over some of Franck's most sugary sentimentalities—as in the plaintive song of the violins in the slow introduction—and passed too lightly and casually over those great moments in which Franck stopped weeping maudlin chromatic tears like an impotent Tristan, straightened his shoulders, drew himself up to his full height, faced the morning sun, and realized that he himself, as Omar so hearteningly remarked, was Heaven and Hell. The sun is reflected in his face, in the splendid beauty that irradiates the final measures of the Symphony's first movement, and we could not help wishing that Mr. Monteux had encouraged his brilliant orchestra to blaze forth there in all its potential magnificance.

* * *

Between the Symphony, which ended Mr. Monteux's program, and the third "Leonore" Overture, which began it, came Mr. Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, with Chopin's E minor piano concerto for his vehicle. The long opening tutti was benignly curtailed; yet this concerto is still too long, and the first movement especially is an almost unmitigated bore. Nor are the other two movements first-rate or even second-rate Chopin. Mr. Rosenthal played them as well, doubtless, as any one could—he played, indeed, quite marvelously at times, and was fervently applauded and frequently recalled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS
MINN.
STAR
APR 4 1924

The Slav Impress On Music.

A cursory glance at the accomplishments of the Slav in music forces one to the conclusion that the proud position held by Germany for over a century in the realm of creative and interpretative musical art is being seriously threatened. Aside from the questionable distinction accorded to a man like Stravinsky, the list of men and women of unquestioned genius among the Slavic peoples is imposing in its magnitude.

While the names of several great leaders of German musical thought are found less and less on concert programs, there is an increasingly large number of compositions written by men of Slavic origin. We are just beginning to realize the existence of men like Rimsky-Korsakov, Glavounow, Scriabene and the members of the school to which they belong. Their potency lies, not so much in depth of thought, as it does in the realization of new types of thought, pictorial, aggressive, colorful, with an exotic element that, once its strangeness is mastered, appeals to music lovers everywhere.

The news that the great Russian, Koussevitzky, will conduct the famous Boston symphony orchestra is in line with the activities of the Slav in another direction. This man threatens Boston with a perfect inundation of Slavic music, written by men who are not even known by name to the average American. A Russian, Rabinoff, has just opened an "American Institute of Opera" at Stony Point, N. Y. Paderewski is still the premier of the piano no matter if he lost his political position.

We are singularly fortunate that another great Russian has chosen to display the glories of his vocal art in this city. Chaliapin is a name to conjure with; he is the acknowledged peer of any singer now before the public, a giant in stature, magnificent in opera, still more striking on the concert platform. He is without a rival in any country. His coming represents the climax of one of the finest music seasons in the history of Minneapolis.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~STAR~~ Bulletin
APR 2 1924

Men and Things

THAT was a curious manifestation of the weather yesterday, with the snow falling in a driving cloud and the lightning flashing through the white opaqueness. The thunder which accompanied the lightning seemed to be smothered by the snow and to make its voice heard as if afar off.

It was quite a phenomenal storm, however explainable to meteorologists, and it had in it something weird. The lightning had an unnatural appearance as it struck through the snow curtain. It was as if some spirit of the air was hovering above the city and proclaiming a defiant presence at a time when it had no right to show itself. But the lightning seemed held in leash by the snow and able to vent itself only in impotent flashes and harmless growling. It was a freak of the weather not often seen and one worth witnessing. Some future "oldest inhabitants" may have it as a story to tell wondering or incredulous hearers of what the weather did on April one, 1924.

Mother Nature certainly played a rare April Fool joke and, if it had not been for the annual shift of the Easter date which brings that festival later than usual this year, it might have been a winter's day on Easter. Last year, it will be recalled, Easter was observed on April First.

What a spoil-sport Dame Nature would have been then, by calling for umbrellas, rain-coats and arctics instead of smart frocks and silken hose. The early April Easter of 1915 was greeted by one of the biggest snow-storms the city has ever known, covering the streets with nineteen inches of snow by Easter morn.

That same month marked another record, when on the twenty-seventh, only a week later than Easter comes this year, the thermometer registered 93 degrees officially, and, came closer to 100 degrees unofficially. So, by the same token, it is well to look over the old electric fan and see about laying in an extra supply of ice. You never can tell. One April the thermometer ...low, or close to the freezing point ... greater part of the month and ... 12th reached 85 degrees. That ...ack in 1874, and April has not ...ed as badly since, although the ... day of April last year a minimum ...rk of 14 was recorded.

* * * *

APRIL FIRST, 1834, the first train for Bala left Broad Street Station, beginning service over the line of the Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley Railroad Company. That company had been formed by a merger of the Philadelphia, Norristown and Phoenixville; the Phoenixville, Pottstown and Reading; the Phoenixville and West Chester; the Reading and Pottsville, and the Pottsville and Mahanoy and Girardville lines. Most of the old lines were merely on paper and the new company taking hold, at once, of the building of the track that had been begun between Frazer and Phoenixville completed that road as its initial undertaking. The line from Philadelphia to Reading had been started in 1833, but it was not until three weeks after the first trip to Bala that the Manayunk bridge, across the Schuylkill, was ready for trains. On the 12th of May, 1834, the first "Pennsy" train reached Manayunk. On June 23d trains were run to Norristown and in the following September to Pottstown and Reading. In 1885 the road was opened to Hamburg and late in 1886, when service was established between Philadelphia and Pottsville, a connection was made with the Lehigh Valley, at New Boston, and the way open for running freights direct from the anthracite region of the Lehigh, over "a Pennsy route," to this port. The first train to Bala began a continuously growing suburban traffic, but it was of greater import as heralding the opening of a line which now sends its limited trains through to Wilkes-Barre and, with its cross-connections, furnishes many routes for coal shipments.

* * * *

To the Editor of the Bulletin.

SIR: THE following extract from "Market Street, the Most Historic Highway In America," By Joseph Jackson, Phila., 1918, page 107, proves conclusively that John MacPherson published the first city directory. "Franklin was elected President of Pennsylvania in October, 1785, and as he had his own residence in Franklin's court he did not occupy the executive mansion. It remained at home. The difference in the two directories of Philadelphia, which were printed within a short time of each other in the fall of 1785, in their designation of the President of Pennsylvania, shows conclusively which of the directories was first issued. Collectors and others have claimed precedence for each of these books. But the fact, if nothing else was known, of MacPherson's (sic) directory giving John Dickinson's name as President, shows that it must have been published before the election of October 19 of that year. White's directory gives Franklin's name as the head of the Supreme Executive Council, and consequently could not have been published until after the election, and, of course, subsequent to the directory of MacPherson."

For further proof, on page 109 of the same work, in locating the residence of Robert Edge Pine, the English painter, who painted the picture of "The Congress Voting Independence," Mr. Jackson states that the residence of Pine is shown by the same evidence that proves the anterior date of MacPherson's directory."

Very truly yours
Wm. Macpherson Hornor.

* * * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for the past five years has been under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the Frenchman, is to present a new director next September in the person of Sergei Kussewitsky, as his name implies, a native of Russia, but a cosmopolitan in music. The Boston organization had several years of misadventure, during which its very existence was threatened, but Pierre Monteux, during the past five years, has carried it safely through stormy water into the port of renewed efficiency and restored popularity.

For many years the Boston Symphony surpassed all other organizations of its kind in this country, in public esteem as well as in the distinction of its personnel and the quality of its performances. In this city its annual series of concerts were assured the sort of patronage that is now given Philadelphia's own orchestra, the Academy of Music invariably being sold out, mostly by advance subscription, upon each visit a long line of eager patrons waiting to obtain admission to the amphitheatre. But as the Philadelphia Orchestra increased in scope, in quality and in importance, with a phenomenally rapid growth of public esteem and patronage, the visiting organization gradually lost ground and finally was compelled to accept second place and suffer loss of financial support, until several years ago its concerts here were abandoned altogether.

Through the exigencies of the World War the orchestra lost some of its best men, disaster following the disloyal attitude and much criticised actions of Karl Muck, its conductor, who for a time refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at the orchestra's concerts, as was the custom, and, when compelled by the management to open his programs with the anthem, presented a garbled version which caused further criticism. Then came Muck's retirement and internment, and more trials for the organization. A strike for unionization further disrupted its membership and the struggle for existence for a time was hard.

The engagement of Pierre Monteux brought a happy turn in the state of affairs. In five years Mr. Monteux has built the orchestra well up to its original high standard and brought back its prestige and favor. Its concerts in New York this season have furnished evidence of this, a prominent musical critic remarking recently that "the orchestra has shown this season and last the tonal beauty and brilliancy that bring back the days of its glory and its rank among the greatest organizations of its kind in the world."

Mr. Kussewitsky, who is to become the leader of the Boston musicians next fall, while but little known in this country is one of the outstanding figures among European conductors. He is said warmly to advocate modern music of a certain type and expects to bring before American audiences new works of several Russian composers. Germany is out of the musical running, at present, he says, but Spain and France, as well as Russia, have much that is interesting to offer.

Born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874, Kussewitsky developed remarkable musical talent so early that he was conducting a little orchestra in the town theatre at the age of twelve. When twenty-two he was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory and not long after made his appearance at the Imperial Opera in that city as a soloist on the double-bass, winning fame as one of the greatest players of that instrument in Europe. Among his activities was the conducting of his own orchestra on annual tours along the Volga river for several years, the musicians being stationed on a stage erected on a ship which he chartered, giving concerts in many ports. When the World War drove him from Russia, Kussewitsky went to Paris, where his concerts at the Opera were events of importance, and he has frequently appeared as guest conductor in England and Spain. He will conduct symphony concerts in England, Italy and Spain this spring, and the first of May will direct a performance of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" at the Paris Opera, this performance and a series of concerts in Paris ending his activities abroad before sailing for America to begin his new duties as leader of the Boston Orchestra.

* * * *

ORTHODOX Quakerism, the most conservative of the Christian sects, bows to the modern spirit, not in any matter of faith, but in abandoning one of its oldest principles of ecclesiastical polity. The Yearly Meeting of Friends, in deciding to abrogate the rule for separation of the sexes in business meetings, reversed the vote of two years ago against allowing representatives of men and women to assemble together. Business expediency has broken down the barriers of tradition, because the co-ordination of effort by the two sexes is held necessary in solving the problems presented by growing numbers of adherents to the faith.

Disappearance of the Quaker garb from the city streets and rarity of the "plain speech" even among the elders, might lead to a hasty assumption that the Friends have been coalescing with other denominations. Arguments for the change, however, included the need of co-operation in a building program that is required by growing membership. The Society of Friends will profit from the greater efficiency of combined effort and the new energy that will be brought to the work by this important step. It completes "enfranchisement" of women within the organization, whose great history of universal benevolence has reached its grand climax the past five years.

Our Hundred Years Ago

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 3 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

In His Own Image

A REVIEW, written by Mr. Ernest Newman for The Sunday Times of London, gives a clearer notion of Mr. Kusevitzky's independence and freshness as conductor than any comment about him lately printed in Europe. It concerns the recent concert in which he lead the London Symphony Orchestra through Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, and other pieces. Mr. Newman has indeed long admired Mr. Kusevitzky. Even so, his article is one to whet anticipation next autumn in Boston. It runs:

> Kusevitzky's tempi in "Don Juan" struck everyone as much slower than the normal. The explanation probably is that Kusevitzky, consciously or unconsciously, dramatizes the women in the symphonic poem; that is to say, instead of showing us the Countess and Donna Anna in Strauss's description of them, he makes them speak in their own persons. They become stage-charcaters, and employ, in order to reveal their emotions fully to the audience, all the conscious art of the singer, drawing the last ounce of expressiveness out of their phrases. This concentration on themselves, as it were, necessarily makes them adopt a slower pace than a conductor who is only concerned with an external description of them would allow them. It is true, then, that these sections were taken so slowly as to put the piece as a whole a little out of shape, but we were compensated by the exceptional beauty and poignancy of the music for the Countess and Donna Anna—a beauty and a poignancy that managed to make themselves felt even through the poor playing of the orchestra. Equally remarkable, in another way, was the fire of the characteristic music of the Don.
>
> It was probably the orchestra's difficulty in adapting its pre-established notions to the novel tempi of Kusevitzky that made it play so badly. It might have been a completely different orchestra that, later in the evening, gave us so magnificent a performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony. Kusevitzky achieved the miracle of proving that Brahms's melodic line can be inflected with the utmost delicacy without losing any forthright strength. The blend of power and tenderness in the slow movement was particularly moving; while in the third movement the slight ungainliness of gait that is the very essence of the music here was preserved in spite of the unusual vivacity of the phrasing. And in the finale Kusevitzky, without doing any damage to the grand structural lines of the movement, gave each of the variations an unusually well-defined physiognomy of its own. Altogether, the performance, though departing in many points from what the true-blue Brahmin would regard as "the Brahms tradition," was as remarkable a one as I have ever heard of the music.

First and Last

A varied programme and therewith varying impression Florence Levy conveyed to a rather large audience at Jordan Hall last evening. Her programme ranged from Scarlatti through Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Debussy to the contemporary Grainger, glimpsing schools and styles of other days, and of our own, always satisfactory of choice and sequence, although not always so happy of performance.

Scarlatti's Sonata in C charmed with its simplicity of treatment and genuineness of utterance. Miss Levy played it well, preserving intact the ingenuousness of feeling, the delicate contrasts of the bright technicalities of this period of composition. Following, she chose from Bach's Fifth French Suite the Gavotte and the Gigue. In the performance of these bits a more mundane feeling obtruded. Somehow a listlessness pervaded the short works, and not alone marred the performance of these but trailed into the pieces from Debussy. "Reflets dans l'Eau," the mercilessly hackneyed "Clair de Lune" and "Jardins sous la Pluie" Miss Levy played now delicately, now obviously. Her rendition of Chopin, on the contrary, exhibited a thoroughly musical personality. Here the bounding rhythms, the perhaps over-sweet melodies, the large depiction of a mélange of harmonies, the light ripplings of the upper range of the pianoforte against the more solid tunefulness of the bass, all these effects beloved of Chopin, which reveal themselves only at the hands of a sympathetic performer, took proper place, and combined to complete a most satisfactory result. The Nocturne, Opus 62, No. 2, and Mazurka, Opus 24, No. 2, led to three Etudes. In the playing of the latter Miss Levy displayed the poetic insight, emotional understanding and excellent technique which she has at her command. The phrasing and expressiveness she imparted distinguished her interpretation. She forgot herself in the music, absorbed entirely in her playing. At the end of the Chopin group the audience recalled her for an encore. She played that light bit, "Allegro," by Balfour Gardiner.

Two pieces from the pen of Percy Grainger—one familiar, one new—Miss Levy reserved for the close of her programme. The new work, "Pastoral" exhibits Grainger's latest tendency, a laxness of rhythm judged by conventional standards, a laxness that yet retains a natural, seemingly innate rhythmic feeling that binds the work and wards off amorphousness. The folk song element which has helped to build the astonishing and immediate success of his other works shows in the Pastoral markedly and unmistakably. The opening phrase conventionally calls to mind a shepherd's pipe, with its slightly mournful tune. The development and climax show an instinctive grasp of form and structure which has replaced the customary instruction. Grainger is held to be unique in his development as a composer because of his professed self-instruction, yet others have accomplished this same feat.

Continued on Following Page

His "Pastoral" met with sympathetic treatment at Miss Levy's hands. Her interpretation of the work on a fairly large scale rather than by means of the segmentary reproduction often given to works of this dimension—for the new work is fairly large—helped to make it interesting and worth-while. With the now popular arrangement by Grainger of the English Morris Dance, Florence Levy closed a programme which, opening inauspiciously, had developed to a praiseworthy close, displaying her many abilities to advantage.

C. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

For the few Symphony Concerts remaining to him, Mr. Monteux has at least two novel pieces in hand. One is Mr. Schelings's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," now going the round of orchestras in America. The other is sea-music, lately written by Mr. Converse.

When Mme. Gauthier sings for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in Symphony Hall, she will be heard in widely different numbers—Ravel's settings of two Jewish Poems and the ornate and sportive air of Rosina, "Una Voce Poco Fa," in Rossini's "Barber of Seville."

It is pleasure to report that the profits of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra from the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony last Sunday are, in round figures, nearly $7000. It is long since it has had such a gain for its beneficent treasury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS
MINN.
STAR
1924

The Slav Impress On Music.

A cursory glance at the accomplishments of the Slav in music forces one to the conclusion that the proud position held by Germany for over a century in the realm of creative and interpretative musical art is being seriously threatened. Aside from the questionable distinction accorded to a man like Stravinsky, the list of men and women of unquestioned genius among the Slavic peoples is imposing in its magnitude.

While the names of several great leaders of German musical thought are found less and less on concert programs, there is an increasingly large number of compositions written by men of Slavic origin. We are just beginning to realize the existence of men like Rimsky-Korsakov, Glavounow, Scriabene and the members of the school to which they belong. Their potency lies, not so much in depth of thought, as it does in the realization of new types of thought, pictorial, aggressive, colorful, with an exotic element that, once its strangeness is mastered, appeals to music lovers everywhere.

The news that the great Russian, Koussevitzky, will conduct the famous Boston symphony orchestra is in line with the activities of the Slav in another direction. This man threatens Boston with a perfect inundation of Slavic music, written by men who are not even known by name to the average American. A Russian, Rabinoff, has just opened an "American Institute of Opera" at Stony Point, N. Y. Paderewski is still the premier of the piano no matter if he lost his political position.

We are singularly fortunate that another great Russian has chosen to display the glories of his vocal art in this city. Chaliapin is a name to conjure with; he is the acknowledged peer of any singer now before the public, a giant in stature, magnificent in opera, still more striking on the concert platform. He is without a rival in any country. His coming represents the climax of one of the finest music seasons in the history of Minneapolis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SYRACUSE,
N. Y.
JOURNAL
APR 5

Serge Koussevitzky New Boston Symphony Director.

Serge Koussevitzky, the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will come to America next autumn to become its first Russian conductor.

Koussevitzky is now completing his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. At these concerts he is conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini and Tchaikovsky.

He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzky Concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation.

He will sail for America September 4 on the steamship Aquitania.

NASHVILLE,
TENN.
BANNER

"When Propagandist Meets Propagandist" might have been the superscription over the photo that appeared in two of America's important musical journals recently; but it wasn't. The picture showed a little party of big musicians in a home in New York City. Among those big musicians were Herr Siegfried Wagner, propagandist in America for German music; and M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and propagandist for French music in America. Frau Wagner and Mme. Monteux were in the party and apparently "a good time was being had by all."

We recommend this spirit of friendship and conviviality to those who are propagandizing along other lines; for instance, to the Steuben Society and the Alliance Francaise, also to Messrs. Stresemann and Poincare.

Speaking of Herr Siegfried, we hear he is very charitably disposed toward jazz. He looks upon it, the way so many others from Europe have done, as the genuine beginning of a real American contribution to the musical art of the world, a beginning that shows all the charactertistics of the nation: youth, gaiety, optimism, self-confidence and zeal. Mr. Wagner may be spoofing us, but we must admit that the opinions of the son of the world's greatest musical pathfinder ... some weight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 5 1924

Pierre Monteux Bids Farewell to Brooklyn

Brooklyn took both Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and Moritz Rosenthal, the soloist, to its heart last night at the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. Not in a long time has an audience applauded so long and vigorously, the performance of conductor or pianist.

The program, peculiarly enough, was one not calculated to evoke extraordinary enthusiasm on the part of the run of music lovers. The first number, the "Leonore" overture by Beethoven, was played in the most poetic fashion, with enough thrill and fanfare to give it a new value. But after the familiar notes were over the expressions or appreciation on the faces of the general assemblage were lost never to return except on fleeting moments.

The second number was the Concerto in E minor by Chopin, played by Rosenthal and the orchestra. The technique of the Austrian pianist was miraculous, his touch was now as light as a breeze, and again masculine enough.

The third piece was the "Divine Poem" symphony by Scriabin. Monteux has given to the Brooklyn public, in the past season, practically every contemporary Russian composer of merit. But where Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Rachmaninoff have depth of feeling and a great gift of melody, Scriabin attempts to carry the symphony a step further, and encompass the entire field of human experience in a single work. The result was striking enough, but a little too unmusical for some of the audience.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ESTABLISHED 188
From APR 5 192
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

LAST OF EXTRA SYMPHONY SERIES

Eva Gauthier Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux will take leave of the public of the Monday evening Boston symphony concerts at the last concert of this series which is to take place in Symphony hall next Monday, April 7, at 8:15. The soloist of the occasion will be Madame Eva Gauthier, the celebrated mezzo-soprano, who will appear in Ravel's Two Hebrew Poems and the principal aria from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a suite for string quartet and string orchestra by Rosario Scalero, the Italian composer, and excerpts from Richard Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

SINGS MONDAY

EVA GAUTHIER
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Last Concert of the Extra Series, at Symphony Hall, Monday Evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ASHVILLE
NORTH CAROLINA
CITIZEN

IS SIEGFRIED SPOOFING US? DOES WAGNER'S SON MEAN IT

When He Calls Jazz "Musical Achievement?"—Radio Profit Five Millions—Atlanta Opera—Jerusalem Opera.

By George Pullen Jackson

"When Propagandist Meets propagandist" might have been the superscription over the photo that appeared in two of America's important musical journals recently but it wasn't. The picture showed a little party of big musicians in a home in New York City. Among those big musicians were Herr Siegfried Wagner, propagandist in America for German music; and M Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and propagandist for French music in America. Frau Wagner and Mme. Monteux were in the party and apparently "a good time was being had by all."

We recommend this spirit of friendship and conviviality to those who are propagandizing along other lines; for instance, to the Steuben Society and the Alliance Francaisse, also to Messrs Stresemann and Poincare.

CHATTANOOGA
TENN.
APR 6 1924

"When Propagandist Meets Propagandist" might have been the superscription over the photo that appeared in two of America's important musical journals recently; but it wasn't. The picture showed a little party of big musicians in a home in New York City. Among those big musicians were Herr Siegfried Wagner, propagandist in America for German music; and M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and propagandist for French music in America. Frau Wagner and Mme. Monteux were in the party and apparently "a good time was being had by all."

We recommend this spirit of friendship and conviviality to those who are propagandizing along other lines; for instance, to the Steuben society and the Alliance Francaise, also to Messrs Stresemann and Poincare.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 4 1924

MONTEUX BIDS FAREWELL AT CONCERT

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Heard for Last Time by Thursday Subscribers.

Pierre Monteux, who is now approaching the end of his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took leave of the Thursday evening subscribers at Carnegie Hall last night. This last programme was a simple one and scarcely characteristic of Mr. Monteux, who, whatever else may or may not be said for him, has been a stimulating impresario for the modernists since he has been at the head of the Boston band. Last evening he built his programme of the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven and Franck's symphony, with the Chopin E minor concerto between them. Moriz Rosenthal was the soloist in the concerto.

The art of Mr. Rosenthal as a piano virtuoso was probably as well displayed in this Chopin confectionery as in anything he could have chosen to play. It exactly suits him, for it gives him all the opportunities even a prima donna virtuoso can want in order to let his hearers glut themselves on his finger accomplishments, and it puts no excessive strain on his emotion.

The concerto is Chopin not quite at his worst, because he could not souse the form in all the sentimentality he was capable of in, for instance, some of the nocturnes. He came as near to this as he could in the romanza, but even so, this is not quite the Chopin who weeps for himself in the moonlight. Paradoxically enough, however, it is perhaps just on that account trivial Chopin. And the orchestral part is, of course, pitiful.

Mr. Resenthal played the music with an infinitely neat variation in dynamics, and he very tenderly under-sentimentalized the larghetto. Altogether, it was a strikingly wise piece of pianism, and it was immensely liked by the audience.

There is nothing new or old to be said any more about the "Leonore" overture. Some conductors play it with enormous dramatic contrasts, some play it as a piece of music, and some just play it. Mr. Monteux runs a little to all three styles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 4 1924

ROSENTHAL WINS IN A CHAPIN CONCERTO

Heard as Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Devora Nadworney Is Gifted Vocalist as Shown in Debut

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ARISTOCRATIC, romantic, brilliant, the Chopin E minor piano concerto represents a true musical echo of the period in which it was written.

LEONARD LIEBLING

However, there also is a deeper note of tenderness in the work, a more spiritual message of beauty, and that is the true reason why this old-fashioned music with its frankly decorative passage-writing and its attenuated orchestration has survived. Other crinolined concertos of the time, by Henselt, Litolff, Raff were romanticists, have disappeared long ago into the limbo of forgotten things.

Old fashioned the Chopin E minor concerto may be but its abiding loveliness never fails to stir a responsive chord in the heart of anyone with a poetic sense.

And many such listeners seemed to be at the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Moriz Rosenthal played the Chopin masterpiece, and did it with reverent, tender, caressing hands. The proud spirit, the rich imaginativeness, the haunting sweetness, and the sudden wild gusts of passion, all so typical of Chopin, were reflected faithfully in the Rosenthal rendering. He used velvet tipped fingers to sound the filigree passages. His tone was of melting softness and soulfulness in the Romanza. The final Rondo glinted, and fluttered, and sparkled.

Only at the very end did Rosenthal unloose the heavy ordinance of his technique, when he thundered the interlocked octaves which Carl Tausig put in his elaborated version of the somewhat tame finish of the Chopin original.

Applause rolled forth for five minutes after Rosenthal had ended, and he bowed his thanks repeatedly.

Aside from furnishing a particularly delicate, precise and finely-felt accompaniment for the Chopin concerto, Pierre Monteux and his players also gave pleasure with their performances of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 5 1924

Boston Symphony Conductors

Pierre Monteux, Musician, Yields the Baton to Sergei Kussevitzky, Able Histrion.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Pierre Monteux is now on his last visit to New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sergei Kussevitzky will succeed him in that position next autumn. The orchestra that the Russian will inherit is today as much Pierre Monteux's orchestra as the old Boston Symphony before the wartime disruption was Wilhelm Gericke's and Karl Muck's. With fostering care Mr. Monteux has refashioned the band, and his intelligent and unremitting discipline have developed its playing to a point of virtuosity worthy of its days of greatest previous renown.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux has carried on worthily the high tradition of musicianship that has long been a treasured possession of the Boston band. He is not a sensationalist, not a conductor for the eye, the antipodes of the "prima donna of the baton." The three conductors who have presided longest over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. Gericke, Muck and Monteux, have been primarily musicians, and their reigns have been marked by an absorption in the musical provision of their audience to the exclusion of personal display and aggrandizement.

Mr. Monteux is especially distinguished for the variety, the catholicity, the artistic arrangement of his programs. No other orchestral conductor in American today shows equal flair, courage, tact and breadth of view in his selection of the music that his band shall play. Mr. Monteux has led a great deal of modern music here, especially of the French and the Russian schools. Indeed, he is the authoritative interpreter of Debussy and of Stravinsky, and perhaps his apotheosis as an orchestra leader was reached with his triumphant presentation of "Le Sacre du Printemps" this season.

But he is likewise a sympathetic and soundly schooled interpreter of the classics. He is particularly happy with the eighteenth century composers—Handel, Haydn, Mozart—and his Beethoven is a Beethoven that speaks for himself (as Beethoven is well able to!) without the finicky intrusion of a tampering personality between the composer and the audience. To all who like their music straight the Monteux method has been peculiarly sympathetic.

Sergei Kussevitzky, on the other hand, seems to be quite frankly a sensationalist. He first attracted attention to himself as a virtuoso of the double-bass. There is sensationalism in the very picking on the cumbersome "bull fiddle" as a solo instrument. When in due course Mr. Kussevitzky turned his attention to the conducting of orchestras, his procedure was anything but self-effacing. He is said even to have boasted that he conducted a composition as he felt it at the moment of his conducting, without reference to the expressed wishes of the composer. He has been described as a consummate actor who hypnotizes his audience and sometimes his orchestra.

He did not, however, hypnotize Igor Stravinsky when he conducted in London the Stravinsky "symphonies" for twenty-three wind instruments in memory of Claude Achille Debussy. Stravinsky, who does not appreciate the inspiration of the moment in the conducting of his works, complained in the public prints that Mr. Kussevitzky put "expression" into the performance of the work in question, whereas the composer had explicity forbidden conductors to indulge in that intrepretative luxury.

Mr. Kussevitzky has made a feature of the conducting of the modern Russians, in particular Scriabin. In consequence, perhaps, reports have gone abroad that he is no man for the classics, which still must make the daily bread of the audiences of any orchestra like the Boston Symphony. An answer to this accusation is contained in the record of Mr. Kussevitzky's programs as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra last month and this. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and symphonies by Haydn, by Schubert and by Brahms have figured in the list. Nor does he disdain Tchaikovsky, a Russian who usually enjoys little favor with the partisans of Scriabin, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

There is one Russian composer who is almost unknown in this country. He is Miaskovsky. A so-called sonata of his composition figured in the latest concert of the League of Composers here, but Miaskovsky is the composer of half a dozen symphonies, and they are being played much now in Moscow. V. Belaiev, writing in the "Musical Digest," speaks thus of a performance in Moscow of the fifth Miaskovsky symphony:—"This work had the greatest success, and the composer was recalled three times. Quite easy to perceive and understand, this symphony, next to the works of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, gained by the propinquity. The freshness of feeling and the wise economy in the means of expression make this work an outstanding one." The sixth symphony, not yet performed at the time of Mr. Belaiev's writing, seems to be like Beethoven's Ninth and certain symphonies of Mahler, a choral symphony.

Sergei Kussevitzky was born in 1874 in Northern Russia. He is said to have conducted a little orchestra at the age of twelve. Musical managers feared to bring him to this country as a double bass soloist, believing, rightly or wrongly, that audiences would not care to see a solo performer perched beside a double-bass, no matter how admirable his playing. As a matter of fact, Mr. Kussevitzky took the curse off his chosen instrument in a measure by using a small specimen.

A Kussevitzky specialty was a recurring tour of the Volga River with an orchestra, stopping frequently for concerts, some of which were given on the deck of the specially chartered steamer. Latterly Paris has been the Kussevitzky headquarters, and Mr. Kussevitzky has conducted many concerts in Paris and in London besides conducting performances of "Boris Godounoff" at the Paris Opera.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had conductors from several countries, but Mr. Kussevitzky will be its first Russian. Russian conductors, however, are not a novelty in New York, where Modest Altschuler long presided over the Russian Symphony Society and Safonoff for a time swayed the destinies of the Philharmonic Society.

ESTABLISHED 188
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
APR 5 192

LAST OF EXTRA SYMPHONY SERIES

Eva Gauthier Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux will take leave of the public of the Monday evening Boston symphony concerts at the last concert of this series which is to take place in Symphony hall next Monday, April 7, at 8:15. The soloist of the occasion will be Madame Eva Gauthier, the celebrated mezzo-soprano, who will appear in Ravel's Two Hebrew Poems and the principal aria from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a suite for string quartet and string orchestra by Rosario Scalero, the Italian composer, and excerpts from Richard Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

SINGS MONDAY

EVA GAUTHIER
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Last Concert of the Extra Series, at Symphony Hall, Monday Evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ASHVILLE
NORTH CAROLINA
CITIZEN

IS SIEGFRIED SPOOFING US? DOES WAGNER'S SON MEAN IT

When He Calls Jazz "Musical Achievement?"—Radio Profit Five Millions—Atlanta Opera—Jerusalem Opera.

By George Pullen Jackson

"When Propagandist Meets propagandist" might have been the superscription over the photo that appeared in two of America's important musical journals recently, but it wasn't. The picture showed a little party of big musicians in a home in New York City. Among those big musicians were Herr Siegfried Wagner, propagandist in America for German music; and M Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and propagandist for French music in America. Frau Wagner and Mme. Monteux were in the party and apparently "a good time was being had by all."

We recommend this spirit of friendship and conviviality to those who are propagandizing along other lines; for instance, to the Steuben society and the Alliance Francaise, also to Messrs Stresemann and Poincare.

CHATTANOOGA
TENN.
1924

"When Propagandist Meets Propagandist" might have been the superscription over the photo that appeared in two of America's important musical journals recently; but it wasn't. The picture showed a little party of big musicians in a home in New York City. Among those big musicians were Herr Siegfried Wagner, propagandist in America for German music; and M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and propagandist for French music in America. Frau Wagner and Mme. Monteux were in the party and apparently "a good time was being had by all."

We recommend this spirit of friendship and conviviality to those who are propagandizing along other lines; for instance, to the Steuben society and the Alliance Francaise, also to Messrs Stresemann and Poincare.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 4 192

MONTEUX BIDS FAREWELL AT CONCERT

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Heard for Last Time by Thursday Subscribers.

Pierre Monteux, who is now approaching the end of his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took leave of the Thursday evening subscribers at Carnegie Hall last night. This last programme was a simple one and scarcely characteristic of Mr. Monteux, who, whatever else may or may not be said for him, has been a stimulating impresario for the modernists since he has been at the head of the Boston band. Last evening he built his programme of the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven and Franck's symphony, with the Chopin E minor concerto between them. Moriz Rosenthal was the soloist in the concerto.

The art of Mr. Rosenthal as a piano virtuoso was probably as well displayed in this Chopin confectionery as in anything he could have chosen to play. It exactly suits him, for it gives him all the opportunities even a prima donna virtuoso can want in order to let his hearers glut themselves on his finger accomplishments, and it puts no excessive strain on his emotion.

The concerto is Chopin not quite at his worst, because he could not souse the form in all the sentimentality he was capable of in, for instance, some of the nocturnes. He came as near to this as he could in the romanza, but even so, this is not quite the Chopin who weeps for himself in the moonlight. Paradoxically enough, however, it is perhaps just on that account trivial Chopin. And the orchestral part is, of course, pitiful.

Mr. Resenthal played the music with an infinitely neat variation in dynamics, and he very tenderly under-sentimentalized the larghetto. Altogether, it was a strikingly wise piece of pianism, and it was immensely liked by the audience.

There is nothing new or old to be said any more about the "Leonore" overture. Some conductors play it with enormous dramatic contrasts, some play it as a piece of music, and some just play it. Mr. Monteux runs a little to all three styles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
N. Y.
AMERICAN
APR 4 192

ROSENTHAL WINS IN A CHAPIN CONCERTO

Heard as Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Devora Nadworney Is Gifted Vocalist as Shown in Debut

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

ARISTOCRATIC, romantic, brilliant, the Chopin E minor piano concerto represents a true musical echo of the period in which it was written.

LEONARD LIEBLING

However, there also is a deeper note of tenderness in the work, a more spiritual message of beauty, and that is the true reason why this old-fashioned music with its frankly decorative passage-writing and its attenuated orchestration has survived. Other crinolined concertos of the time, by Henselt, Litolff, Raff were romanticists, have disappeared long ago into the limbo of forgotten things.

Old fashioned the Chopin E minor concerto may be but its abiding loveliness never fails to stir a responsive chord in the heart of anyone with a poetic sense.

And many such listeners seemed to be at the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Moriz Rosenthal played the Chopin masterpiece, and did it with reverent, tender, caressing hands. The proud spirit, the rich imaginativeness, the haunting sweetness, and the sudden wild gusts of passion, all so typical of Chopin, were reflected faithfully in the Rosenthal rendering. He used velvet tipped fingers to sound the filigree passages. His tone was of melting softness and soulfulness in the Romanza. The final Rondo glinted, and fluttered, and sparkled.

Only at the very end did Rosenthal unloose the heavy ordinance of his technique, when he thundered the interlocked octaves which Carl Tausig put in his elaborated version of the somewhat tame finish of the Chopin original.

Applause rolled forth for five minutes after Rosenthal had ended, and he bowed his thanks repeatedly.

Aside from furnishing a particularly delicate, precise and finely-felt accompaniment for the Chopin concerto, Pierre Monteux and his players also gave pleasure with their performances of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 5 192

Boston Symphony Conductors

Pierre Monteux, Musician, Yields the Baton to Sergei Kussevitzky, Able Histrion.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Pierre Monteux is now on his last visit to New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sergei Kussevitzky will succeed him in that position next autumn. The orchestra that the Russian will inherit is today as much Pierre Monteux's orchestra as the old Boston Symphony before the wartime disruption was Wilhelm Gericke's and Karl Muck's. With fostering care Mr. Monteux has refashioned the band, and his intelligent and unremitting discipline have developed its playing to a point of virtuosity worthy of its days of greatest previous renown.

As a conductor Mr. Monteux has carried on worthily the high tradition of musicianship that has long been a treasured possession of the Boston band. He is not a sensationalist, not a conductor for the eye, the antipodes of the "prima donna of the baton." The three conductors who have presided longest over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. Gericke, Muck and Monteux, have been primarily musicians, and their reigns have been marked by an absorption in the musical provision of their audience to the exclusion of personal display and aggrandizement.

Mr. Monteux is especially distinguished for the variety, the catholicity, the artistic arrangement of his programs. No other orchestral conductor in American today shows equal flair, courage, tact and breadth of view in his selection of the music that his band shall play. Mr. Monteux has led a great deal of modern music here, especially of the French and the Russian schools. Indeed, he is the authoritative interpreter of Debussy and of Stravinsky, and perhaps his apotheosis as an orchestra leader was reached with his triumphant presentation of "Le Sacre du Printemps" this season.

But he is likewise a sympathetic and soundly schooled interpreter of the classics. He is particularly happy with the eighteenth century composers—Handel, Haydn, Mozart—and his Beethoven is a Beethoven that speaks for himself (as Beethoven is well able to!) without the finicky intrusion of a tampering personality between the composer and the audience. To all who like their music straight the Monteux method has been peculiarly sympathetic.

Sergei Kussevitzky, on the other hand, seems to be quite frankly a sensationalist. He first attracted attention to himself as a virtuoso of the double-bass. There is sensationalism in the very picking on the cumbersome "bull fiddle" as a solo instrument. When in due course Mr. Kussevitzky turned his attention to the conducting of orchestras, his procedure was anything but self-effacing. He is said even to have boasted that he conducted a composition as he felt it at the moment of his conducting, without reference to the expressed wishes of the composer. He has been described as a consummate actor who hypnotizes his audience and sometimes his orchestra.

He did not, however, hypnotize Igor Stravinsky when he conducted in London the Stravinsky "symphonies" for twenty-three wind instruments in memory of Claude Achille Debussy. Stravinsky, who does not appreciate the inspiration of the moment in the conducting of his works, complained in the public prints that Mr. Kussevitzky put "expression" into the performance of the work in question, whereas the composer had explicity forbidden conductors to indulge in that intrepretative luxury.

Mr. Kussevitzky has made a feature of the conducting of the modern Russians, in particular Scriabin. In consequence, perhaps, reports have gone abroad that he is no man for the classics, which still must make the daily bread of the audiences of any orchestra like the Boston Symphony. An answer to this accusation is contained in the record of Mr. Kussevitzky's programs as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra last month and this. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and symphonies by Haydn, by Schubert and by Brahms have figured in the list. Nor does he disdain Tchaikovsky, a Russian who usually enjoys little favor with the partisans of Scriabin, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

There is one Russian composer who is almost unknown in this country. He is Miaskovsky. A so-called sonata of his composition figured in the latest concert of the League of Composers here, but Miaskovsky is the composer of half a dozen symphonies, and they are being played much now in Moscow. V. Belaiev, writing in the "Musical Digest," speaks thus of a performance in Moscow of the fifth Miaskovsky symphony:—"This work had the greatest success, and the composer was recalled three times. Quite easy to perceive and understand, this symphony, next to the works of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, gained by the propinquity. The freshness of feeling and the wise economy in the means of expression make this work an outstanding one." The sixth symphony, not yet performed at the time of Mr. Belaiev's writing, seems to be like Beethoven's Ninth and certain symphonies of Mahler, a choral symphony.

Sergei Kussevitzky was born in 1874 in Northern Russia. He is said to have conducted a little orchestra at the age of twelve. Musical managers feared to bring him to this country as a double bass soloist, believing, rightly or wrongly, that audiences would not care to see a solo performer perched beside a double-bass, no matter how admirable his playing. As a matter of fact, Mr. Kussevitzky took the curse off his chosen instrument in a measure by using a small specimen.

A Kussevitzky specialty was a recurring tour of the Volga River with an orchestra, stopping frequently for concerts, some of which were given on the deck of the specially chartered steamer. Latterly Paris has been the Kussevitzky headquarters, and Mr. Kussevitzky has conducted many concerts in Paris and in London, besides conducting performances of "Boris Godounoff" at the Paris Opera.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had conductors from several countries, but Mr. Kussevitzky will be its first Russian. Russian conductors, however, are not a novelty in New York, where Modest Altschuler long presided over the Russian Symphony Society and Safonoff for a time swayed the destinies of the Philharmonic Society.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
18 BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
APR 5 1924

MUSIC

Monteux Farewell

A somewhat festive air pervaded the opera house of the Academy of Music last night, upon occasion of the closing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-sixth season of concerts in Brooklyn simultaneous with Pierre Monteux's final appearance here as its conductor. The audience, of large numbers, held faces familiar for many years as patrons of these annual concerts, which are given under Institute auspices, who, during past years, have in the same hall witnessed the final bows of such predecessors as Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck and Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Monteux's consulship over the Boston players covers a period of five years. He has achieved magnificent results in redeveloping the fallen perfection of the Boston band that followed in the wake of the World War, and has established a remarkable standard in the matter of programme making. Of the three major orchestras annually visiting Brooklyn, the offerings of Mr. Monteux have always outshone in the variety of their contrast.

Last night's orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture and Scriabin's "The Divine Poem." The soloist was Moriz Rosenthal, returned after a seventeen years' absence, who was heard in Chopin's E minor concerto.

A previous Brooklyn performance of Scriabin's symphony does not occur to memory. In three movements, respectively denominated "Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures" and "Divine Activity," the score of Russia's early modernist, reveals those Wagnerian influences felt in many other of his works, nevertheless remaining strongly individual in its thematic, harmonic and instrumental text. Not itself of "ultra" form, "The Divine Poem," impressive throughout, foreshadows present day composition. Scriabin follows a programmatic idea of human significance, too long for narration here, but quite clearly conveyed in his titles. Mr. Monteux and his players have made a serious study of this work, and thorough acquaintance was evidenced by a rendition fully satisfying in comprehensiveness. Furthermore, their playing, incisive and brilliant, left nothing to be desired.

Mr. Rosenthal's choice of concerto was most happy. A rare survivor of the Liszt-Joseffy era, he brought to Chopin's work (with its F minor sister pianistically greatest of all piano concertos) a large measure of the Joseffy tradition. The thrill last night lay less in the classical mould of the first movement, but reached intensity in the following Romance and concluding Rondo. The ravishment of tonal embroidery, the delicacy of dynamics and nuance, in short all that which constitutes the real Chopin, was simply breathcatching. Rosenthal's exquisite pianissimi, vanishing almost into apprehension beyond hearing, emphasized the miracle of his famous technique in a phase of pure refinement. As a lightning flash, brilliant and dazzling, came his own version, at the close, a double-octave treatment of Chopin's coda. Due mention of Mr. Rosenthal's poeticism has been omitted.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 4 1924

From Spanish Gardens.

The "Noches en los Jardines de Espana," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, are by Manuel de Falla, who is steadily gaining recognition as the foremost composer of Spain. There are three of these garden nights—"In the Generalife," "Far-Off Dance" and "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." That interesting writer on modern music, G. Jean Aubry, says of them:—

"De Falla is much more than a painter of Spain; he is an invoker of Spanish emotion, often the most hidden, brilliant (in the vulgar meaning of virtuosity that is attributed musically to this epithet), than these nocturnes; but nothing is more strongly colored by the play of lights and shadows skillfully contrived. The force and the simplicity of the effects are remarkable; it is necessary to hear how the 'Far-Off Dance,' based on a tango rhythm, swells by a simple augmentation in a manner to attain at the end an astonishing intensity—which resolves itself into a glorious explosion."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 1924

Pierre Monteux, Artist and Drill Master, Bids Farewell

WITH a flourish of his competent baton, Pierre Monteux last night bid farewell to Brooklyn audiences. We cannot conjecture his future plans, nor say when, if ever, he may be expected to appear again at the Academy as an orchestral conductor; but we can, and aptly, turn our glance over the years, four in number, during which he has directed the destinies of the Boston band.

His capabilities have been often dwelt upon: not only is Monteux an admirable drill master, attested by the improvement of the orchestra since chaotic conditions evolving upon the resignation of Dr. Karl Muck, but he is also that rara avis, the complete artist—perhaps more the artist than the orchestral technician.

One need only direct the attention to the programs that Monteux has offered, both in Boston and in New York, programs that point to the progressive intelligence of their maker. He has been partial to new music and to that of his countrymen, the French. No one conducting in New York has achieved the clarity and subtlety that distinguishes Monteux's readings of the music of Debussy, Ravel or other modern Frenchmen. Nor could any one, we think, produce a more striking "Sacre du Printemps" than that directed by this conductor. The performance of Strawinsky's score has been the outstanding feature of the musical orchestral year, and credit for it must go to Monteux.

Moriz Rosenthal, who played Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano and orchestra, was a bit at a disadvantage, for it was the conductor's and not the soloist's evening. On any other occasion Rosenthal might have appropriated a larger share of the applause; but as it happened both he and Chopin were supplementary. The Concerto is an unhappy work and hardly worth playing—seldom is. The music, for Chopin, is surprisingly thin and uninteresting. Which of the orchestrations was used we do not know, but it was hardly a satisfactory one. Rosenthal played brilliantly. He is the virtuoso's virtuoso, treating all that he plays with the same self-sufficient technical mastery. Were he a bit more the poet one might have enjoyed the Romanze of the Concerto—the lovely second movement in which the greater Chopin occasionally reveals himself.

For his share of the proceedings Monteux brought forth Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, and Scriabine's "The Divine Poem."

Elsewhere we have remarked that the best of Scriabine is to be gleaned from the piano music. The orchestral poems are verbose and sophomoric. That intellectual sensualism that is an important factor in the Russian national character found its outlet in these symphonies of imposing purpose. Scriabine's predilection for abstracts is shown in his programmatic titles: "The Poem of Ecstasy," "The Poem of Fire" and "The Divine Poem." This latter is further divided into sections marked "Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Divine Activity."

It is hardly to be wondered at that Scriabine, hampered by such an atrocious program, should have flung recklessly on paper such musical platitudes. "The Divine Poem" possesses no apparent merits; it is a long score built upon nothing childish in its affectations of the sublime. Of the orchestral Scriabine the finest is in the "Poeme de l'Extase," but even that can not claim the interest of the piano miniatures.

M. Monteux treated both Scriabine and Beethoven to a superlative performance, and in the concerto aided Rosenthal with a splendidly balanced accompaniment. He was, at the end accorded an ovation by an audience that must regret his departure for other fields.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Realm of Music

By Frank H. Warren

There were two heavens open to the public last evening. The Metropolitan Opera Company disclosed its picture in the third act of "Le Roi de Lahore," where Indra's paradise unfolds a thing of color, poppies, pageant dancing and songs. If one isn't content with certain details of Indra's allure one may seek solace in other attractions of the Indran Elysium.

Then, in Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Orchestra was giving the next to its final concert of the season, the pianist Moriz Rosenthal opened the pearly gates of music in the romanza movement of Chopin's E minor concerto. Of this adagio Chopin himself said: "It is of a romantic, calm and partly melancholy character. It is intended to convey the impression one receives when the eye rests on a beloved landscape which calls up in one's soul beautiful memories—for instance, on a fine moonlit spring night."

Mr. Rosenthal made his audience conjure up all this and more. One might have fancied the entire audience dreaming of distant glories and imbibing ambrosia and nectar. Very beautifully done by both soloist and orchestra. The other movements, too, were in the correct mood, though we thought Mr. Rosenthal at times a bit too refined, overcautious.

Mr. Monteux's conducting was musicianly and artistic in the "Leonore" overtrue and the Cesar Franck D minor symphony. For one, we regret to see Mr. Monteux relinquishing his post just when he has about brought the orchestra back to its former playing standard. He makes his final appearance here at to-morrow's concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
APR 6 '24

ENGLISH COMPOSER SPEAKS AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

Laurence V. Powell, the English composer, explained the rhythmics and other complex features of Stravinsky's composition, "Sacre du Printemps," last evening in the lecture hall of the Public Library, Copley sq. "The Rite of Spring" was played here a short while ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be repeated at the Symphony concerts this week.

At the close of the talk by Mr Powell, the entire selection was given on the player-piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 6 1924

ANTICIPATIONS

By EDWARD CUSHING

ABOUT this time of each succeeding year, disregarding the ironical jests of an intemperate spring, the publicity agent of our friend the artist, issues his pronouncements for the approaching months of summer, as well as some few hints of what the winter, still beyond the horizon, may bring. Such announcements come in legions, and range from the future plans of Miss Aida Sforzando to the career of some eminent conductor visiting these shores for the first time in professional capacity.

They are welcome, since they mark the continuity of the musical year. Four warm months may intervene, but for the indefatigable gentlemen who compose these amazing notices, mimiographed and sent out by the thousands, there is no division. Summer is merely a period for preparedness, a marking-time lull in the war of artistic temperaments.

The enthusiast regards them with pleasure, particularly those relating to summer music, the gaudy notices of hundreds of concerts to be given in this park and in that; the open air opera; the music week, etc. We too, eye them affectionately and look over the promising pile of documental evidence with an amiable glance. Possibly—there are always possibilities—we shall not get away for our planned vacation, whether it be in London during the season, on the Continent, in New Hampshire, or merely Montauk Point. If so, a Brahms symphony and a bit of Wagner al fresco, under the baton of Mr. van Hoogstraten, may help to fill the gap.

The present season is in its penultimate week. Three orchestras have bowed themselves out: the State Symphony, the Boston and the New York. Some 16 performances of opera remain, and a few concerts—nothing more. Before so very long the time for recapitulation will be at hand, but at the moment future announcements claim our attention.

* * *

FIRST of all we will skip the summer months and come to the season of 1924-25.

From the press department of the Boston Symphony comes forecast regarding Serge Koussewitsky, the new Russian conductor of that organization. At the Manhattan concerts of Thursday and Saturday, and at the Academy on Friday evening, Pierre Monteux, for the past four years at the head of that splendid orchestra, made his final appearances in New York.

In Boston Monteux is well thought of; no other since the departure of Dr. Karl Muck has done so much to bring the orchestra up to its old level of perfection. But Monteux, despite this, is not a great drillmaster. He is, first of all, a musician of intelligence and scope. His programs have attested his progressive spirit and his catholicity of taste. He has given all-Wagner programs as well as first performances of "Sacre du Printemps" and similar scores. He plays Scriabine and Mozart with equal facility; he discovers and performs novelties that are above the average in interest.

Koussewitsky is apparently a man of much the same caliber. He is partial to the moderns, particularly Scriabine and Strawinsky, and has acquired a brilliant reputation as conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra, and more particularly through the Koussewitsky concerts in Paris.

Born at Twer, in northern Russia, he completed his musical education at the Moscow Conservatory and enjoyed a career as a double bass virtuoso throughout Europe. In Moscow he organized an orchestra and gave concerts both there, in Petersburg and elsewhere in Russia. Later he went to Paris and London to become one of the most admired of conductors, both symphonic and, on the occasion of the production of Russian works, operatic. He sails for America on September 4.

New old music—"old classical works which never have been given before," Koussewitsky has said—and modern scores from the Russians, Miakowski and Serge Taniel, are promised under his direction by the Boston Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
APR 6 1924

The chief event of the week is, of course, the repetition of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" by the Boston Symphony at its regular concerts. It is a great pity that this piece was not also offered to the Monday subscribers. It represents the finest achievement of Mr Monteux's career in Boston as a performance and is to boot one of the most notable of modernist masterpieces. "The Rites of Spring" is not part of the regular program, which would be long enough without it. An intermission before it is played will enable those who do not care to hear it to depart gracefully and leisurely. It would be a kindly if not altogether customary act for some of those who leave before "The Rites of Spring" to hand out their ticket stubs at the door to the poor enthusiasts without season tickets, many of whom cannot hear it otherwise owing to the scarcity of single tickets for these concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS
APR 6 1924

CHORUS BECOMES NATIONAL ... Christmas

Kussewitsky to Succeed Monteux

The conductorship of the Boston symphony for the next season, and the actual successor to the admirable Pierre Monteux seem to have been settled for all time, with Sergei Kussewitsky to sail for America in September to take up the baton with the Boston organization. The symphony will be heard in Pittsburgh under the new conductor, opening the local orchestra series.

Mr. Monteux completes his considerable period of service as head of the organization with a reputation greatly enhanced by the results he has achieved. The career of Kussewitsky is most interesting. Born at Tver, in Northern Russian, in 1874, he conducted at the age of 12 a little orchestra in the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow conservatory at 22, and soon appeared as a soloist on the double bass and as the greatest player of this instrument in Europe.

In 1907 he gave his first performance as an orchestra conductor, at which time Sergei Rachmaninoff was the soloist, introducing on that occasion his second piano concerto in Berlin. In 1910 Kussewitsky formed in Moscow a large symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices and in the 10 years that followed became famous as an orchestral leader in Europe, Russia, Scandinavia, his brilliancy as a virtuoso leader everywhere conceded.

Marie Sundelius will be heard in recital for the American Legion in Warren, Pa., tomorrow night. The Sundelius family lived in Warren for a time, and Miss Sundelius sang in one of the church choirs when a girl. The committee which engaged her did not know this interesting circumstance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
18 BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAY 5 1924

MUSIC

Monteux Farewell

A somewhat festive air pervaded the opera house of the Academy of Music last night, upon occasion of the closing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-sixth season of concerts in Brooklyn simultaneous with Pierre Monteux's final appearance here as its conductor. The audience, of large numbers, held faces familiar for many years as patrons of these annual concerts, which are given under Institute auspices, who, during past years, have in the same hall witnessed the final bows of such predecessors as Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck and Henri Rabaud.

Mr. Monteux's consulship over the Boston players covers a period of five years. He has achieved magnificent results in redeveloping the fallen perfection of the Boston band that followed in the wake of the World War, and has established a remarkable standard in the matter of programme making. Of the three major orchestras annually visiting Brooklyn, the offerings of Mr. Monteux have always outshone in the variety of their contrast.

Last night's orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture and Scriabin's "The Divine Poem." The soloist was Moriz Rosenthal, returned after a seventeen years' absence, who was heard in Chopin's E minor concerto.

A previous Brooklyn performance of Scriabin's symphony does not occur to memory. In three movements, respectively denominated "Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures" and "Divine Activity," the score of Russia's early modernist, reveals those Wagnerian influences felt in many other of his works, nevertheless remaining strongly individual in its thematic, harmonic and instrumental text. Not itself of "ultra" form, "The Divine Poem," impressive throughout, foreshadows present day composition. Scriabin follows a programmatic idea of human significance, too long for narration here, but quite clearly conveyed in his titles. Mr. Monteux and his players have made a serious study of this work, and thorough acquaintance was evidenced by a rendition fully satisfying in comprehensiveness. Furthermore, their playing, incisive and brilliant, left nothing to be desired.

Mr. Rosenthal's choice of concerto was most happy. A rare survivor of the Liszt-Joseffy era, he brought to Chopin's work (with its F minor sister pianistically greatest of all piano concertos) a large measure of the Joseffy tradition. The thrill last night lay less in the classical mould of the first movement, but reached intensity in the following Romance and concluding Rondo. The ravishment of tonal embroidery, the delicacy of dynamics and nuance, in short all that which constitutes the real Chopin, was simply breathcatching. Rosenthal's exquisite pianissimi, vanishing almost into apprehension beyond hearing, emphasized the miracle of his famous technique in a phase of pure refinement. As a lightning flash, brilliant and dazzling, came his own version, at the close, a double-octave treatment of Chopin's coda. Due mention of Mr. Rosenthal's poeticism has been omitted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
MAY 5 1924

Pierre Monteux, Artist and Drill Master, Bids Farewell

WITH a flourish of his competent baton, Pierre Monteux last night bid farewell to Brooklyn audiences. We cannot conjecture his future plans, nor say when, if ever, he may be expected to appear again at the Academy as an orchestral conductor; but we can, and aptly, turn our glance over the years, four in number, during which he has directed the destinies of the Boston band.

His capabilities have been often dwelt upon: not only is Monteux an admirable drill master, attested by the improvement of the orchestra since chaotic conditions evolving upon the resignation of Dr. Karl Muck, but he is also that rara avis, the complete artist—perhaps more the artist than the orchestral technician.

One need only direct the attention to the programs that Monteux has offered, both in Boston and in New York, programs that point to the progressive intelligence of their maker. He has been partial to new music and to that of his countrymen, the French. No one conducting in New York has achieved the clarity and subtlety that distinguishes Monteux's readings of the music of Debussy, Ravel or other modern Frenchmen. Nor could any one, we think, produce a more striking "Sacre du Printemps" than that directed by this conductor. The performance of Strawinsky's score has been the outstanding feature of the musical orchestral year, and credit for it must go to Monteux.

Moriz Rosenthal, who played Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano and orchestra, was a bit at a disadvantage, for it was the conductor's and not the soloist's evening. On any other occasion Rosenthal might have appropriated a larger share of the applause, but as it happened both he and Chopin were supplementary. The Concerto is an unhappy work and hardly worth playing—seldom is. The music, for Chopin, is surprisingly thin and uninteresting. Which of the orchestrations was used we do not know, but it was hardly a satisfactory one. Rosenthal played brilliantly. He is the virtuoso's virtuoso, treating all that he plays with the same self-sufficient technical mastery. Were he a bit more the poet one might have enjoyed the Romanze of the Concerto—the lovely second movement in which the greater Chopin occasionally reveals himself.

For his share of the proceedings Monteux brought forth Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, and Scriabine's "The Divine Poem."

Elsewhere we have remarked that the best of Scriabine is to be gleaned from the piano music. The orchestral poems are verbose and sophomoric. That intellectual sensualism that is an important factor in the Russian national character found its outlet in these symphonies of imposing purpose. Scriabine's predilection for abstracts is shown in his programmatic titles: "The Poem of Ecstasy," "The Poem of Fire" and "The Divine Poem." This latter is further divided into sections marked "Struggles," "Sensuous Pleasures," and "Divine Activity."

It is hardly to be wondered at that Scriabine, hampered by such an atrocious program, should have flung recklessly on paper such musical platitudes. "The Divine Poem" possesses no apparent merits; it is a long score built upon nothing childish in its affectations of the sublime. Of the orchestral Scriabine the finest is in the "Poeme de l'Extase," but even that can not claim the interest of the piano miniatures.

M. Monteux treated both Scriabine and Beethoven to a superlative performance, and in the concerto aided Rosenthal with a splendidly balanced accompaniment. He was at the end accorded an ovation by an audience that must regret his departure for other fields.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Realm of Music

By Frank H. Warren

There were two heavens open to the public last evening. The Metropolitan Opera Company disclosed its picture in the third act of "Le Roi de Lahore," where Indra's paradise unfolds a thing of color, poppies, pageant dancing and songs. If one isn't content with certain details of Indra's allure one may seek solace in other attractions of the Indran Elysium.

Then, in Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Orchestra was giving the next to its final concert of the season, the pianist Moriz Rosenthal opened the pearly gates of music in the romanza movement of Chopin's E minor concerto. Of this adagio Chopin himself said: "It is of a romantic, calm and partly melancholy character. It is intended to convey the impression one receives when the eye rests on a beloved landscape which calls up in one's soul beautiful memories—for instance, on a fine moonlit spring night."

Mr. Rosenthal made his audience conjure up all this and more. One might have fancied the entire audience dreaming of distant glories and imbibing ambrosia and nectar. Very beautifully done by both soloist and orchestra. The other movements, too, were in the correct mood, though we thought Mr. Rosenthal at times a bit too refined, overcautious.

Mr. Monteux's conducting was musicianly and artistic in the "Leonore" overtrue and the Cesar Franck D minor symphony. For one, we regret to see Mr. Monteux relinquishing his post just when he has about brought the orchestra back to its former playing standard. He makes his final appearance here at to-morrow's concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

ENGLISH COMPOSER SPEAKS AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

Laurence V. Powell, the English composer, explained the rhythmics and other complex features of Stravinsky's composition, "Sacre du Printemps," last evening in the lecture hall of the Public Library. Copley sq. "The Rite of Spring" was played here a short while ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be repeated at the Symphony concerts this week.

At the close of the talk by Mr Powell, the entire selection was given on the player-piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 6 1924

From Spanish Gardens.

The "Noches en los Jardines de Espana," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, are by Manuel de Falla, who is steadily gaining recognition as the foremost composer of Spain. There are three of these garden nights—"In the Generalife," "Far-Off Dance" and "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." That interesting writer on modern music, G. Jean Aubry, says of them:—

"De Falla is much more than a painter of Spain; he is an invoker of Spanish emotion, often the most hidden, brilliant (in the vulgar meaning of virtuosity that is attributed musically to this epithet), than these nocturnes; but nothing is more strongly colored by the play of lights and shadows skillfully contrived. The force and the simplicity of the effects are remarkable; it is necessary to hear how the 'Far-Off Dance,' based on a tango rhythm, swells by a simple augmentation in a manner to attain at the end an astonishing intensity—which resolves itself into a glorious explosion."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 6 1924

ANTICIPATIONS

By EDWARD CUSHING

ABOUT this time of each succeeding year, disregarding the ironical jests of an intemperate spring, the publicity agent of our friend the artist, issues his pronouncements for the approaching months of summer, as well as some few hints of what the winter, still beyond the horizon, may bring. Such announcements come in legions, and range from the future plans of Miss Aida Sforzando to the career of some eminent conductor visiting these shores for the first time in professional capacity.

They are welcome, since they mark the continuity of the musical year. Four warm months may intervene, but for the indefatigable gentlemen who compose these amazing notices, mimiographed and sent out by the thousands, there is no division. Summer is merely a period for preparedness, a marking-time lull in the war of artistic temperaments.

The enthusiast regards them with pleasure, particularly those relating to summer music, the gaudy notices of hundreds of concerts to be given in this park and in that; the open air opera; the music week, etc. We too, eye them affectionately and look over the promising pile of documental evidence with an amiable glance. Possibly—there are always possibilities—we shall not get away for our planned vacation, whether it be in London during the season, on the Continent, in New Hampshire, or merely Montauk Point. If so, a Brahms symphony and a bit of Wagner al fresco, under the baton of Mr. van Hoogstraten, may help to fill the gap.

The present season is in its penultimate week. Three orchestras have bowed themselves out: the State Symphony, the Boston and the New York. Some 16 performances of opera remain, and a few concerts—nothing more. Before so very long the time for recapitulation will be at hand, but at the moment future announcements claim our attention.

* * *

FIRST of all we will skip the summer months and come to the season of 1924-25.

From the press department of the Boston Symphony comes [illegible]ly forecast regarding Serge Koussewitsky, the new Russian conductor of that organization. At the Manhattan concerts of Thursday and Saturday, and at the Academy on Friday evening, Pierre Monteux, for the past four years at the head of that splendid orchestra, made his final appearances in New York.

In Boston Monteux is well thought of; no other since the departure of Dr. Karl Muck has done so much to bring the orchestra up to its old level of perfection. But Monteux, despite this, is not a great drillmaster. He is, first of all, a musician of intelligence and scope. His programs have attested his progressive spirit and his catholicity of taste. He has given all-Wagner programs as well as first performances of "Sacre du Printemps" and similar scores. He plays Scriabine and Mozart with equal facility; he discovers and performs novelties that are above the average in interest.

Koussewitsky is apparently a man of much the same caliber. He is partial to the moderns, particularly Scriabine and Strawinsky, and has acquired a brilliant reputation as conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra, and more particularly through the Koussewitsky concerts in Paris.

Born at Twer, in northern Russia, he completed his musical education at the Moscow Conservatory and enjoyed a career as a double bass virtuoso throughout Europe. In Moscow he organized an orchestra and gave concerts both there, in Petersburg and elsewhere in Russia. Later he went to Paris and London to become one of the most admired of conductors, both symphonic and, on the occasion of the production of Russian works, operatic. He sails for America on September 4.

New old music—"old classical works which never have been given before," Koussewitsky has said—and modern scores from the Russians, Miakowski and Serge Taniel, are promised under his direction by the Boston Orchestra.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

The chief event of the week is, of course, the repetition of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" by the Boston Symphony at its regular concerts. It is a great pity that this piece was not also offered to the Monday subscribers. It represents the finest achievement of Mr Monteux's career in Boston as a performance and is to boot one of the most notable of modernist masterpieces. "The Rites of Spring" is not part of the regular program, which would be long enough without it. An intermission before it is played will enable those who do not care to hear it to depart gracefully and leisurely. It would be a kindly if not altogether customary act for some of those who leave before "The Rites of Spring" to hand out their ticket stubs at the door to the poor enthusiasts without season tickets, many of whom cannot hear it otherwise owing to the scar[illegible] of single tickets for these concert[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS
APR 6 192[illegible]

CHORU[illegible] BECOMES NATIO[illegible]
Christm[illegible]

Kussewitsky to Succeed Monteux

The conductorship of the Boston Symphony for the next season, and the actual successor to the admirable Pierre Monteaux seem to have been settled for all time, with Sergei Koussewitsky to sail for America next September to take up the baton with the Boston organization. The symphony will be heard in Pittsburgh under the new conductor, opening the local orchestra series.

Mr. Monteux completes his considerable period of service as head of the organization with a reputation greatly enhanced by the results he has achieved. The career of Koussewitsky is most interesting. Born at Tver, in Northern Russian, in 1874, he conducted at the age of 12 a little orchestra in the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow conservatory at 22, and soon appeared as a soloist on the double bass and as the greatest player of this instrument in Europe.

In 1907 he gave his first performance as an orchestra conductor, [illegible] which time Sergei Rachmaninoff was the soloist, introducing on that occasion his second piano concerto [illegible] Berlin. In 1910 Kussewitsky formed in Moscow a large symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices and in the 10 years that followed became famous as an orchestral leader in Europe, Russia, Scandinavia, his brilliancy as a virtuoso leader everywhere conceded.

Marie Sundelius will be heard in recital for the American Legion in Warren, Pa., tomorrow night. The Sundelius family lived in Warren for a time, and Miss Sundelius sang in one of the church choirs when a girl. The committee which engaged her did not know this interesting circumstance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 6 1924

Gardens of Spain Home of Dreams, De Falla Finds

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

"THE GARDENS OF SPAIN," to judge by De Falla's orchestral composition of that name, heard at yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are moonshiny, tuneful places, where one dreams rhythmically to sensuous and colorful music.

Usually such compositions carry familiar earmarks—or shall one say footmarks?—of typically Spanish music, idealized symphonically in the modern style.

To think of Spain in tone, generally is for composers to fall into the rhythm and manner of the bolero, the fandango, the malaguena, the seguedilla. Add castanets and tambourines, and the recipe is fairly complete.

However, De Falla is not quite so commonplace. While he retains thedance forms as a formal basis for his musical scheme, he permits his fancy to wander further afield, and he does not try to depict actual scenes as much as he endeavors to suggest atmosphere.

The result is a delicate, finely-wrought and extremely pleasing composition, somewhat similar in general treatment to Debussy's lovely "Iberia" Series of tone pictures.

Pierre Monteux and his Bostonians gave De Falla a sensitive and seductive performance.

The complete title of the work is "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," and it is for piano and orchestra. Heinrid Gebhard was the accomplished pianist.

Handel's G minor Concerto Grosso, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture were the classic guards that flanked De Falla and Scriabin.

The latter's "Divine Poem" symphony is a brilliant reading, again made the impression of prolixity, diffuseness, and a lyrical soul losing itis way in the vast space of the dramatic.

It was Pierre Monteux's final appearance here as the conductor of the Boston Symphony. Next Winter we shall regard the back of Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian, said to wield a baton both febrile and fiery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 7 1924

Monteaux's Farewell.

For the last time in New York, Pierre Monteux, Saturday afternoon, conducted a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the delightful features of Mr. Monteux's regime has been his bringing forward of unfamiliar music. On this farewell occasion he put on his program the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" of Manuel de Falla, who is making a strong bid for primacy among Spanish composers.

This composition proved disappointing. Both in its musical substance and in its instrumental dress it did not stray far from the banal. About the most favorable thing that can be said of it seems to be that it is neither cheap nor vulgar. The important piano part in the work was skillfully played by Heinrich Gebhard. But the best Spanish composers remain the Frenchmen Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, Laparra and Bizet, and the Italian, Zandonai.

The concert opened with the G minor concerto grosso of Handel, a composer for whom Mr. Monteux has always shown a strong affection. There followed Scriabin's "Divine Poem," which, now that it no longer astonishes, seems a swollen and bombastic affair, empty of everything but its liberal borrowings from Wagner and Liszt. After that came the de Falla "Nights." To close the programme, Mr. Monteux chose Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture, and the performance he obtained made a valedictory of superb spirit and finish.

The audience was most enthusiastic throughout the afternoon, as if to leave no doubt in Mr. Monteux's mind as to the place he held in its esteem. The occasion did not pass into history without the interposition of Buelow's "vegetables of fame," for in the course of the concluding demonstration of enthusiasm, a large wreath was carried up and handed to the retiring conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TIMES
Boston
APR 8 1924

Vladimir de Pachmann, the temperamental French pianist, will be one of the artists at the Springfield, Mass., musical festival, April 26. At that time he will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this will be his first orchestral appearance in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
APR 6 1924

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The State of Modern Music

The repetition of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" as an afterpiece at the Symphony concerts this week has turned more minds than one hereabouts to speculations upon the present State and future prospects of modern music. Last January the Paris musical magazine Le Courrier Musical, conducted a symposium upon this topic and collected views from many distinguished musicians. But they did not agree as to what constitutes modern music. Felix Weingartner, remembered here as the most distinguished of the Boston Opera's conductors, wished to define "modern music" as music independent of the actual epoch, and launched into a plea for Bach and Mozart.

Henri Rabaud, now director of the Paris Conservatoire, once conductor of the Boston Symphony, answered briefly and in a fashion, the pointedness of which will delight not a few, that rather than make prognostication about modern music he would confine himself to expressing a wish.

"Let us," he wrote, "hope that modern music tends to give joy to men who have true ears. Men who do not hear false notes will always be easily satisfied."

One is reminded of the anecdote which is the most recent of its historic forms. It presents a conductor leading a new modern piece at its first rehearsal observing that the trumpets are playing a passage not in the full orchestral score, and violently dissonant. Being remonstrated with, the trumpet players produce their parts, which are note for note as they have played them. The composer, who is present, is appealed to to settle the point as to whether the copyist's error is in the full score or in the trumpet parts. But strange to say he can not tell which he meant to write.

Present Day Experiments

Laparra, heard here as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony, and represented in the old Boston Opera repertory by his "La Habanera," given this season in New York as one of the Metropolitan Opera's two "novelties," agrees with Cyril Scott, the English composer-pianist, who once gave a couple of programs of his own works at Jordan Hall, that this is a period of groping, of experiment, of transition.

Mr Scott thinks that out of present day experiments will grow "an augmented harmonic vocabulary, joined to a greater delicacy and variety of melody." Arnold Bax, the English composer who has become more Gaelic than the Gaels of the Irish Rennaissance, thinks that the sooner modern music disentangles itself from "the current phase of pure and naive objectivity," the better it will be for all concerned. Mr Bax believes in fairies, along with Barrie and Yeats, and wants to depict their revels musically.

Stravinsky, it will be remembered, is said to have become the chief apostle of objectivity. According to report, he remonstrated with Kusevitsky after a performance of his "Nightingale" for having endeavored to put meaning into the music, and went on in the vein of Hanslick's "The Beautiful in Music" to speak of sounding arabesques and that sort of thing as the function of music, which he claimed to be unemotional.

Schoenberg, though he wrote in the symposium, based his remarks on the fact that Germany won't have any music, modern or ancient, unless some way out of present distresses among those portions of the population which chiefly support all serious artistic enterprises is discovered.

Darius Milhaud wrote, no doubt with his tongue in his cheek, that if French music would only return to the path indicated by Gounod all would be well. Milhaud himself would write pretty fair diluted Gounod if he never strove to be up to date in idiom but followed his natural bent.

Honegger, the only one of the much discussed and widely self-advertised "Six" whose abilities seem genuinely notable, says that the Parisian sophisticated public, which finds words like "The Rites of Spring" outmoded, is spoiled by too much spice in its musical diet. People are wrong to be disgusted by everything that is not strictly new. Honegger's "King David," on the testimony of judges who seem trustworthy, appears to be among the most notable of modern masterpieces. In another decade we may hear it in Boston, if a chorus is forthcoming that will venture on difficult novelties.

All the contributors agree that the state of modern music is not wholly satisfactory, though their recipes for its improvement are amazingly diverse. Part of the trouble, no doubt is that the old musical language, as enlarged by both Wagner and Debussy is inadequate for the expression of new thoughts. Yet for at least 3000 years men have been crying out with the author of the book of Ecclesiastes that "there is no new thing under the sun." Beethoven and Wagner have already between them usurped pretty nearly the whole field of the heroic and the dramatic.

Like that of all supreme creative artists, their influence on lesser men has been almost wholly bad. Look what Michelangelo did to the art of Guido Reni, or Shakspere to the dramatists who came after him in the fields he had covered. Nobody yet has written a Wagnerian music drama except Wagner, or a great symphony in the grand manner except Beethoven.

Yet the world is growing weary at once of the familiar old masters and the pretty miniaturists and ironists of the present day. Not Casella, but Pizzetti; not Ravel, but Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" is what people want. Listeners weary at last by having their emotions gently titivated by an eternity of polite French songs, which have neither melody nor rhythm nor feeling to them in the ordinary sense of those terms.

The concert hall after all cannot become a salon without grave loss. The barbaric yawp of "La Sacre" is a relief after so much Ravel. It will no more eclipse Debussy than Beethoven eclipsed Mozart in the long run. But imagine Saint-Saens or Arnold Bax after "Le Sacre!"

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 7 1924

Nocturnes a L'Espagnole.

A considerably newer, but yet not vastly different (except that they were far less beautifully effective) set of nocturnes was played by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. These were the young Spaniard, Manuel de Falla's evocatively titled "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." This was their first local performance.

The suite has three movements —"At Generalife" (in the upland Moorish gardens of the "Villa of Waters" near Granada), "Dance in the Distance" and "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba," the latter two enchained. There is much that is very beautiful in this music, with reminiscences of the manner rather than of the matter of Debussy. We were rather of the belief that there was more in it than Mr. Monteux got out of it; that there might have been a more solicitous feeling for the atmospheric effect in the orchestration, a more romantically poetic revelation. The performance, in fact, struck us as forthright and sometimes crude.

The suite is written for piano and orchestra and we thought the solo part something of an intrusion. It was deftly played by Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston, and this effect on us didn't seem to be any fault of his.

The rest of Mr. Monteux's programme consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, the "Tannhaeuser" overture and, after the de Falla piece, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem." Scriabin's pitifully pretentious music seems to become more futile and impotent the oftener we listen to it. Saturday it seemed, besides, not to have even a shred of originality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO,
ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 6 1924

* *

A New Conductor in Boston.

After having been several times denied, it now seems that Sergei Kussevitsky will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, succeeding Pierre Monteux, who, without ostentation, has been entirely successful in rebuilding the orchestra from a wreck into another smoothly running organization. The change follows in its entirety the Boston tradition of looking eastward and not westward for orchestral accomplishments.

Kussevitsky, now about 50 years old, used to be known as the most spectacular double bass soloist in Europe. About twenty years ago he became ambitious to conduct and, whether from his own private means or by friendly contributions, engaged an orchestra of his own for the purpose. Having developed a reputation in Germany, he organized a symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices in Moscow, and in the next ten years became famous not only in Russia but in other parts of Europe.

One of his proceedings used to be an annual tour of the Volga river. He chartered a ship, took along his entire orchestra, and at the ports of call gave concerts from a platform constructed on the deck. Events of the war drove him from Russia to headquarters at Paris. He will conduct symphony concerts this spring in England, Italy, and Spain, and on May 1 will direct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera.

He is rated as an enthusiastic exponent of modern music and a brilliant virtuoso leader, though subject to dispute on his treatment of classical works. He promises to bring over some Russian music unknown in this country which he considers of interest, believes that there will be little worth while from Germany in the next few years, and says that Spain, Russia, and France will produce most of the new music.

* *

Here and Th[illegible] Music

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 6 1924

19

Gardens of Spain Home of Dreams, De Falla Finds

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

"THE GARDENS OF SPAIN," to judge by De Falla's orchestral composition of that name, heard at yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are moonshiny, tuneful places, where one dreams rhythmically to sensuous and colorful music.

Usually such compositions carry familiar earmarks—or shall one say footmarks?—of typically Spanish music, idealized symphonically in the modern style.

To think of Spain in tone, generally is for composers to fall into the rhythm and manner of the bolero, the fandango, the malaguena, the seguedilla. Add castanets and tambourines, and the recipe is fairly complete.

However, De Falla is not quite so commonplace. While he retains thedance forms as a formal basis for his musical scheme, he permits his fancy to wander further afield, and he does not try to depict actual scenes as much as he endeavors to suggest atmosphere.

The result is a delicate, finely-wrought and extremely pleasing composition, somewhat similar in general treatment to Debussy's lovely "Iberia" Series of tone pictures.

Pierre Monteux and his Bostonians gave De Falla a sensitive and seductive performance.

The complete title of the work is "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," and it is for piano and orchestra. Heinrid Gebhard was the accomplished pianist.

Handel's G minor Concerto Grosso, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture were the classic guards that flanked De Falla and Scriabin.

The latter's "Divine Poem"s symphony is a brilliant reading, again made the impression of prolixity, diffuseness, and a lyrical soul losing itis way in the vast space of the dramatic.

It was Pierre Monteux's final appearance here as the conductor of the Boston Symphony. Next Winter we shall regard the back of Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian, said to wield a baton both febrile and fiery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
APR 1924

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The State of Modern Music

The repetition of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" as an afterpiece at the Symphony concerts this week has turned more minds than one hereabouts to speculations upon the present State and future prospects of modern music. Last January the Paris musical magazine Le Courrier Musical, conducted a symposium upon this topic and collected views from many distinguished musicians. But they did not agree as to what constitutes modern music. Felix Weingartner, remembered here as the most distinguished of the Boston Opera's conductors, wished to define "modern music" as music independent of the actual epoch, and launched into a plea for Bach and Mozart.

Henri Rabaud, now director of the Paris Conservatoire, once conductor of the Boston Symphony, answered briefly and in a fashion, the pointedness of which will delight not a few, that rather than make prognostication about modern music he would confine himself to expressing a wish.

"Let us," he wrote, "hope that modern music tends to give joy to men who have true ears. Men who do not hear false notes will always be easily satisfied."

One is reminded of the anecdote which is the most recent of its historic forms presents a conductor leading a new modern piece at its first rehearsal observing that the trumpets are playing a passage not in the full orchestral score, and violently dissonant. Being remonstrated with, the trumpet players produce their parts, which are note for note as they have played them. The composer, who is present, is appealed to to settle the point as to whether the copyist's error is in the full score or in the trumpet parts. But strange to say he can not tell which he meant to write.

Present Day Experiments

Laparra, heard here as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony, and represented in the old Boston Opera repertory by his "La Habanera," given this season in New York as one of the Metropolitan Opera's two "novelties," agrees with Cyril Scott, the English composer-pianist, who once gave a couple of programs of his own works at Jordan Hall, that this is a period of groping, of experiment, of transition.

Mr Scott thinks that out of present day experiments will grow "an augmented harmonic vocabulary, joined to a greater delicacy and variety of melody." Arnold Bax, the English composer who has become more Gaelic than the Gaels of the Irish Rennaissance, thinks that the sooner modern music disentangles itself from "the current phase of pure and naive objectivity," the better it will be for all concerned. Mr Bax believes in fairies, along with Barrie and Yeats, and wants to depict their revels musically.

Stravinsky, it will be remembered, is said to have become the chief apostle of objectivity. According to report, he remonstrated with Kusevitsky after a performance of his "Nightingale" for having endeavored to put meaning into the music, and went on in the vein of Hanslick's "The Beautiful in Music" to speak of sounding arabesques and that sort of thing as the function of music, which he claimed to be unemotional.

Schoenberg, though he wrote in the symposium, based his remarks on the fact that Germany won't have any music, modern or ancient, unless some way out of present distresses among those portions of the population which chiefly support all serious artistic enterprises is discovered.

Darius Milhaud wrote, no doubt with his tongue in his cheek, that if French music would only return to the path indicated by Gounod all would be well. Milhaud himself would write pretty fair diluted Gounod if he never strove to be up to date in idiom but followed his natural bent.

Honegger, the only one of the much discussed and widely self-advertised "Six" whose abilities seem genuinely notable, says that the Parisian sophisticated public, which finds words like "The Rites of Spring" outmoded, is spoiled by too much spice in its musical diet. People are wrong to be disgusted by everything that is not strictly new. Honegger's "King David," on the testimony of judges who seem trustworthy, appears to be among the most notable of modern masterpieces. In another decade we may hear it in Boston, if a chorus is forthcoming that will venture on diffcult novelties.

All the contributors agree that the state of modern music is not wholly satisfactory, though their recipes for its improvement are amazingly diverse. Part of the trouble no doubt is that the old musical language, as enlarged by both Wagner and Debussy is inadequate for the expression of new thoughts. Yet for at least 3000 years men have been crying out with the author of the book of Ecclesiastes that "there is no new thing under the sun." Beethoven and Wagner have already between them usurped pretty nearly the whole field of the heroic and the dramatic.

Like that of all supreme creative artists, their influence on lesser men has been almost wholly bad. Look what Michelangelo did to the art of Guido Reni, or Shakspere to the dramatists who came after him in the fields he had covered. Nobody yet has written a Wagnerian music drama except Wagner, or a great symphony in the grand manner except Beethoven.

Yet the world is growing weary at once of the familiar old masters and the pretty miniaturists and ironists of the present day. Not Casella, but Pizzetti; not Ravel, but Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" is what people want. Listeners weary at last by having their emotions gently titivated by an eternity of polite French songs, which have neither melody nor rhythm nor feeling to them in the ordinary sense of those terms.

The concert hall after all cannot become a salon without grave loss. The barbaric yawp of "La Sacre" is a relief after so much Ravel. It will no more eclipse Debussy than Beethoven eclipsed Mozart in the long run. But imagine Saint-Saens or Arnold Bax after "Le Sacre!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 7 1924

Monteaux's Farewell.

For the last time in New York, Pierre Monteux, Saturday afternoon, conducted a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the delightful features of Mr. Monteux's regime has been his bringing forward of unfamiliar music. On this farewell occasion he put on his program the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" of Manuel de Falla, who is making a strong bid for primacy among Spanish composers.

This composition proved disappointing. Both in its musical substance and in its instrumental dress it did not stray far from the banal. About the most favorable thing that can be said of it seems to be that it is neither cheap nor vulgar. The important piano part in the work was skillfully played by Heinrich Gebhard. But the best Spanish composers remain the Frenchmen Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, Laparra and Bizet, and the Italian, Zandonai.

The concert opened with the G minor concerto grosso of Handel, a composer for whom Mr. Monteux has always shown a strong affection. There followed Scriabin's "Divine Poem," which, now that it no longer astonishes, seems a swollen and bombastic affair, empty of everything but its liberal borrowings from Wagner and Liszt. After that came the de Falla "Nights." To close the programme, Mr. Monteux chose Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture, and the performance he obtained made a valedictory of superb spirit and finish.

The audience was most enthusiastic throughout the afternoon, as if to leave no doubt in Mr. Monteux's mind as to the place he held in its esteem. The occasion did not pass into history without the interposition of Buelow's "vegetables of fame," for in the course of the concluding demonstration of enthusiasm, a large wreath was carried up and handed to the retiring conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
APR 7 1924

Nocturnes a L'Espagnole.

A considerably newer, but yet not vastly different (except that they were far less beautifully effective) set of nocturnes was played by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. These were the young Spaniard, Manuel de Falla's evocatively titled "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." This was their first local performance.

The suite has three movements —"At Generalife" (in the upland Moorish gardens of the "Villa of Waters" near Granada), "Dance in the Distance" and "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba," the latter two enchained. There is much that is very beautiful in this music, with reminiscences of the manner rather than of the matter of Debussy. We were rather of the belief that there was more in it than Mr. Monteux got out of it; that there might have been a more solicitous feeling for the atmospheric effect in the orchestration, a more romantically poetic revelation. The performance, in fact, struck us as forthright and sometimes crude.

The suite is written for piano and orchestra and we thought the solo part something of an intrusion. It was deftly played by Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston, and this effect of us didn't seem to be any fault of his.

The rest of Mr. Monteux's programme consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, the "Tannhaeuser" overture and, after the de Falla piece, Scriabin's "The Divine Poem." Scriabin's pitifully pretentious music seems to become more futile and impotent the oftener we listen to it. Saturday it seemed, besides, not to have even a shred of originality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO,
ILL.
TRIBUNE

* *

A New Conductor in Boston.

After having been several times denied, it now seems that Sergei Kussevitsky will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, succeeding Pierre Monteux, who, without ostentation, has been entirely successful in rebuilding the orchestra from a wreck into another smoothly running organization. The change follows in its entirety the Boston tradition of looking eastward and not westward for orchestral accomplishments.

Kussevitsky, now about 50 years old, used to be known as the most spectacular double bass soloist in Europe. About twenty years ago he became ambitious to conduct and, whether from his own private means or by friendly contributions, engaged an orchestra of his own for the purpose. Having developed a reputation in Germany, he organized a symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices in Moscow, and in the next ten years became famous not only in Russia but in other parts of Europe.

One of his proceedings used to be an annual tour of the Volga river. He chartered a ship, took along his entire orchestra, and at the ports of call gave concerts from a platform constructed on the deck. Events of the war drove him from Russia to headquarters at Paris. He will conduct symphony concerts this spring in England, Italy, and Spain, and on May 1 will direct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera.

He is rated as an enthusiastic exponent of modern music and a brilliant virtuoso leader, though subject to dispute on his treatment of classical works. He promises to bring over some Russian music unknown in this country which he considers of interest, believes that there will be little worth while from Germany in the next few years, and says that Spain, Russia, and France will produce most of the new music.

* *

Here and Th...

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TIMES
Boston
APR 8 1924

Vladimir de Pachmann, the temperamental French pianist, will be one of the artists at the Springfield, Mass., musical festival, April 26. At that time he will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this will be his first orchestral appearance in America.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF 192

LAST OF MONDAY SERIES

Symphony Assisted by Eva Gauthier at Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Hard upon the heels of Mr. Monteux's final appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last evening yet another of the series of farewells that is now his portion—that to the public of the Monday evening concerts at Symphony Hall.

EVA GAUTHIER SOLOIST

Among the things for which Mr. Monteux's term as director will be ever gratefully remembered is the establishment and successful furthering of this ... series of concerts, now become as truly a part of the orchestra's regime as those of Friday afternoon's and Saturday evening's. Empty seats at these Monday concerts have become a rarity; and last night, as was to be expected, Symphony hall was completely filled by an audience that greeted the conductor warmly upon his first appearance and that heaped applause upon him after the performance of each number on the programme.

In no way was this programme prepared as for a special occasion. Rather it followed the general course of its predecessors; a well-liked Symphony, Beethoven's Seventh; a piece for resounding conclusion, Ritcher's arrangement of Siegfried's Ascent of the Rock and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Seifgried" and "Gotterdammerung"; a middle number of contrasting character, Rosario Scalero's Suite for String Quartet and Orchestra; and finally music for the assisting soloist, in this case Eva Gauthier, who was heard in Ravel's Two Hebrew Melodies, in the Recitative and Air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and in Rosina's "Una voce poco fa" from Rosini's "Barber of Seville."

In the Symphony of Beethoven, admirably performed, and in the glorious music of Wagner lay the chief pleasure of the concert. Ravel's melodies are curious rather than deeply impressive, while the overworked music of the youthful Debussy is little more than warmed over Massenet. And not for Mme. Gauthier, unsurpassed interpreter of certain modern composers, is the ornate music of Rossini.

Finally Scalero's Suite, the work of an Italian musician now living in New York, and performed here for the first time, seemed hardly to repay the pains lavished upon it by Mr. Monteux, the orchestra, and the solo quartet—Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Fourel and Bedetti. There are pleasing moments in the variations on a theme from Schumann's "Album for the Young," and here and there throughout the piece come interesting instrumental effects. But in the last analysis the suite must be dismissed as well-made commonplace.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra ... ive renewals till May 1 for its Carnegie Hall series under Serge Koussevitzky.

English ... Opera Company ... ued ... for English

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE

GAUTHIER SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Eva Gauthier was the soloist at the 8th and last of the Boston Symphony Monday concerts last night. Her individual and vivid personality attracted her hearers quite as much as did her singing. For Pierre Monteux, who will not be here to conduct next season's Monday concerts, there was prolonged and heartfelt applause at both the beginning and end of the concert. This audience obviously respects its leader and unaffected musicianship. ... but ... it ought.

Mme Gauthier has tried many experiments in the course of a career which to date has been remarkably successful, but she has never made a rasher venture than attempting "Una voce poco fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville" last evening. She is by nature a lirico spinto and this number is in the province of the coloratura soprano, its passage and unaffected musicianship. ... but ... it ought.

Mme Gauthier has tried many experiments in the course of a career which to date has been remarkably successful, but she has never made a rasher venture than attempting "Una voce poco fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville" last evening. She is by nature a lirico spinto and this number is in the province of the coloratura soprano, its passages

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
20 APR 8 1924

LAST OF MONDAY SERIES

Symphony Assisted by Eva Gauthier at Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Hard upon the heels of Mr. Monteux's final appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last evening yet another of the series of farewells that is now his portion—that to the public of the Monday evening concerts at Symphony Hall.

EVA GAUTHIER SOLOIST

Among the things for which Mr. Monteux's term as director will be ever gratefully remembered is the establishment and successful furthering of this very series of concerts, now become as truly a part of the orchestra's regime as those of Friday afternoon's and Saturday evening's. Empty seats at these Monday concerts have become a rarity; and last night, as was to be expected, Symphony hall was completely filled by an audience that greeted the conductor warmly upon his first appearance and that heaped applause upon him after the performance of each number on the programme.

In no way was this programme prepared as for a special occasion. Rather it followed the general course of its predecessors; a well-liked Symphony, Beethoven's Seventh; a piece for resounding conclusion, Ritcher's arrangement of Siegfried's Ascent of the Rock and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Seigfried" and "Gotterdammerung"; a middle number of contrasting character, Rosario Scalero's Suite for String Quartet and Orchestra; and finally music for the assisting soloist, in this case Eva Gauthier, who was heard in Ravel's Two Hebrew Melodies, in the Recitative and Air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and in Rosina's "Una voce poco fa" from Rosini's "Barber of Seville."

In the Symphony of Beethoven, admirably performed, and in the glorious music of Wagner lay the chief pleasure of the concert. Ravel's melodies are curious rather than deeply impressive, while the overworked music of the youthful Debussy is little more than warmed over Massenet. And not for Mme. Gauthier, unsurpassed interpreter of certain modern composers, is the ornate music of Rossini.

Finally Scalero's Suite, the work of an Italian musician now living in New York, and performed here for the first time, seemed hardly to repay the pains lavished upon it by Mr. Monteux, the orchestra, and the solo quartet—Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Fourel and Bedetti. There are pleasing moments in the variations on a theme from Schumann's "Album for the Young," and here and there throughout the piece come interesting instrumental effects. But in the last analysis the suite must be dismissed as well-made commonplace.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra will ... renewals till May 1 for its Car... Hall series under Serge Kousse...

English ... Opera Company ... for English

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE

GAUTHIER SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme Eva Gauthier was the soloist at the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Monday concerts last night. Her individual and vivid personality interested her hearers quite as much as did her singing. For Pierre Monteux, who will not be here to conduct next season's Monday concerts, there was prolonged and heartfelt applause at both the beginning and end of the concert. This audience obviously respects his sincere and unaffected musicianship, as indeed it ought.

Mme Gauthier has tried many experiments in the course of a career which to date has been remarkably successful, but she has never made a rasher venture than attempting "Una voce poco fa," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville" last evening. She is by nature a mezzo soprano and this number is in the province of the coloratura soprano. It speaks volumes for Mme Gauther's skill and aplomb that her performance of this cavatina was far from a fiasco.

She also sang two "Hebrew Melodies" with all the mordant sophistication that Ravel's music demands, and achieved a satisfactory performance of the familiar air of Lia from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son." Her voice has improved in quality of late, though there is still at times an unpleasant metallic quality of tone and an occasional lapse into vibrato, possibly caused by shortness of breath.

Rosario Scalero, an Italian composer now living in New York, was present to acknowledge the cordial applause that greeted his new suite for string quartet and orchestra, played for the first time here. It is well written and unpretentious music, with some scandalously tuneful variations and a not too contrapuntal fugued finale. The audience like it and were applauding heartily even before the presence of the composer was disclosed, which by no means always is the case under similar circumstances.

Mr Monteux, whatever the defects of his interpretations of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and of excerpts from Wagner last night, at least made no attempt to show off at the expense of these great classics. His modesty may come to be recalled with [illegible] some day.

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

EVA GAUTHIER AS SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux Conducts Last of Monday Symphony Series

A large and enthusiastic audience crowded Symphony hall last evening for the last concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux's leadership Mr. Monteux, making his farewell to the Monday subscribers, was applauded with a vigor that evidences the warm esteem in which his audiences have come to hold him, and was recalled many times.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which Mr. Monteux began the regular symphony series last fall, was given another brilliant performance last night. Surely the magnificent renderings that have been given the Seventh, the Ninth and the Sixth symphonies by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should make 1923-1924 stand forth as a memorable Beethoven season.

Eva Gauthier was the soloist of the evening. She sang two Hebrew melodies of Ravel, recitative and area of Lia, "Azael! Azael!" from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" and "Une Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." Mme. Gauthier was singing exceedingly well, but surely her graceful use of her voice, her persuasive personality, the popularity of the Rossini and the Debussy and, to some, of the ear-charming dissonances of Ravel's second melody, "The Eternal Enigma"—surely these were not all the reasons for her many recalls. For there seemed to be a justified interest in her most remarkable gown—a stunning affair of geranium pink, with panels and odd sweeping train faced with emerald green.

Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz of the violins, Mr. Fourel of the violas and Mr. Bedetti of the 'cellos formed the string quartet for Rosario Scalero's suite for string quartet and string orchestra, performed for the first time in Boston. Graceful, easy-flowing melodies and colorful use of the various choirs pleased the hearers. The composer was discovered in the audience to share in the applause.

To close, excerpts from The Ring were given which included Siegfried's passing through the fire to Bruenhilde's rock, from the third act of "Siegfried"; Dawn and Siegfried's journey up the Rhine from "Gotterdammerung" and the close of the last opera of the Nibelungen cycle. These selections are those adapted for concert use by Hans Richter, except for the final pages of "Gotterdammerung," which Mr. Monteux has substituted for Richter's addition of a few measures of the Valhalla motive.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

FINAL MONDAY CONCERT PLEASES

Symphony Series Closes with Tribute to Monteux

Mr. Monteux planned this program for the fifth, and final, concert of the Monday series, the soloist being Eva Gauthier, mezzo soprano.

Symphony in A Major.....Beethoven
Two Hebrew Melodies.....Ravel
(1) Kaddisch
(2) The Eternal Enigma
Recitative and Aria "Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue".....Debussy
A Suite for String Quartet and String Orchestra, Op. 20.....Scalero
(First time in Boston)
String Quartet: Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Fourel, Bedetti.
Cavatina, "Una voce poco fa" from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Excerpts from "The Ring of the Nibelungs," Siegfried's Ascent to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, Close of "The Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner

The concert was unusual in some respects. At the beginning it became an occasion of the proper homage to Mr. Monteux, who was greeted on his entrance with long applause of the genuinely hearty sort, which bore testimony to the high regard in which the Monday public hold him. And after the brilliant close of the symphony the applause was so cordial that Mr. Monteux promptly had the orchestra to their feet to share it.

Then came Mme. Gauthier, as sometimes happens, with her enthusiasm for the odd outstripping her discrimination. Those Hebrew songs—the second has above all else to recommend a piquant piano accompaniment, the piquancy of which vanishes in the orchestral arrangement, and of the Kaddish melody nobody yet has succeeded in making an effective concert song. Boldly, too, Mme. Gauthier dragged back to its original place the mezzo-soprano repertory, Rossini's air of which coloratura sopranos had taken possession many years ago. She did well. Only she would have shown a sager discretion if she had left to the sopranos their bedizenments and had sung the air as Rossini set it down. Mme. Gauthier pleased the audience.

Mr. Scalero's modest piece lacked the needed color to hold its own between Mme. Gauthier's two appearances. Conservative to the point of dullness, it may have been written to show what the composer could accomplish with strings alone. In point of sonority he accomplished much. There is, too, certain simple dignity in the prelude, a liveliness about the finale which make them pleasant enough to hear. But it is hard to believe that the heavy-handed variations on a trivial Schumann theme ever could entertain. The suite was beautifully played. Mr. Scalero acknowledged the friendly applause from his seat in the audience.

A stirring performance of excerpts from "The Ring" brought the concert and the series to close. At its end Mr. Monteux once more was acclaimed, and that with the cordial warmth so distinctly his due. R. R. G.

LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

At the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this week Mr. Monteux will present for the first time in Boston, in the orchestral version at least, Schelling's tone poem "A Victory Ball," which Lowell heard at the beginning of the season as scored for Sousa's band. Sigrid Onegin, who comes to Lowell early next season, will be the soloist at the concerts.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

FLOODGATES OPEN UPON MONTEUX'S DEPARTING HEAD

NEW YORK SINGS MORE PRAISES OF FAREWELL

His Qualities as Man, Musician and Conductor — An Orchestra Restored After Grievous Decline—The Range of His Powers and Programmes—Even Return Predicted

TO gain the leisure which, granted the abilities and the background, is the secret of most good writing, Mr. Gilman of the New York Tribune-Herald reserved until yesterday his article about the departing Monteux. None other is likely to excel it and by many a title it deserves to be reprinted in full. Everyone knows how in a clearing shower the brightening light will suddenly flash across the rain. In these days Mr. Monteux is living in such a downpour of "tributes." Like the sun across it are Mr. Gilman's sayings.

The week-end [in New York] was chiefly one of orchestral farewells, of which the only final and unqualified one was the goodby spoken by Pierre Monteux, who retires from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give place to Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant and inrubrical Muscovite, who will assume the leadership of the orchestra next season.

It seems to us that Mr. Monteux should feel happy, rather than depressed, over the circumstances of his farewell. He departs hence trailing clouds of glory. The handsome things that are being said of him these days, in print and in private, must make him blush; for Mr. Monteux is one of the few conductors we know who seem capable of blushing. He leaves us in the fullness of his powers, and with an extraordinary record of achievement. His conducting during the past season in New York has won him almost unqualified praise. If he had done nothing else but perform Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" with the mastery and eloquence that are still fresh in everyone's mind he would be entitled to rest on his oars. And what Mr. Monteux has done with, to and for the illustrous orchestra which he has commanded will not soon be forgotten. He took charge of it in a period of demoralization, when it had become third-rate and almost negligible. He leaves it a superb instrument, one of the great orchestras of the world, an orchestra which should cause Mr. Koussevitzky to weep tears of joy when first it plays for him—for we have heard the orchestras that Mr. Koussevitzky has had to work with in Paris and London.

Suppose Mr. Monteux had been reengaged—suppose he were to stay on in these parts for another term? Let him imagine what might have happened, and let him console himself. Critics, like brides, throw their bouquets backward, as Mr. Stewart Mitchell once happily observed. If Mr. Monteux were not leaving us for good, would there have been as many bouquets flung in his direction? We fear not. Those who are restive in the presence of the modernists of music would probably begin to complain next season of his programmes. "Too much Arthur Bliss—too much Stravnisky," he might hear them grumbling. They might lay it up against him that he has played only one Symphony of Beethoven in New York this season, although other concert goers surfeited with Beethoven Cycles and countless repetitions of The Fifth, would prefer to bless him for his moderation in this respect.

And the mutterings that one heard after Mr. Monteux's "All-Wagner" programme might have broken forth in open protest if he were staying on with day—except the musical Lower Orders?

And so Mr. Monteux might have found, if he had remained, that the public that goes to symphony concerts is a fickle creature, heartless and unfaithful, given to jiltings and cold shoulders. Consider the case of Mr. ——. But let that pass. Mr. Monteux has been praised, at times, with foolishness—for virtues, if they are virtues, of no importance. He has been meanor on the stand is quiet and repraised, for example because his depressed, in contrast with other conductors, who, pursuing a different method, convey their wishes to their orchestras by gestures more demonstrative and emphatic. But this seems to us highly insignificant. If Mr. Damrosch can best obtain a lovely diminuendo by turning his back on his orchestra and beaming upon the audience, why shouldn't he resort to that method? If Mr. Mengelberg can best obtain one of his cataclysmic fortissimi by shaking his fist at the brass and percussion like a demoniacal Ajax, whose affair is it but his? If Mr. Stokowski can make his violins sing like a choir of morning stars by one of those sweeping, unison, two-armed gestures of his, is it not impertinent to ask him to accomplish his ends by other methods? If Mr. Koussevitzky can best prevail upon his first horn to deliver a melting cantilena by smiling sweetly at the hornist as at a beloved friend, why should we question an expedient which justifies itself by its success?

We refuse to set it to Mr. Monteux's credit, therefore that his method of conveying his reminders to his men happens to be impassive. It would be a matter of complete indifference to us if he chose to conduct without any baton at all, as Mr. Safonov used to do; or by a system of signal-flags; or with a baseball bat; or, as Beau Brummel used to say, with only "a glance of the eye." After all, those who object to Mr. Damrosch's beaming countenance, or Mr. Mengelberg's fist, or Mr. Koussevitzky's sweet smile, have only to lower their lids—they are there to listen, and not to look.

Continued on Following Page

Therefore it sems more pertinent to remember Mr. Monteux because of the quality of his interpretations [illegible] cause of his demeanor on the [illegible] We shall think of him grat[illegible] cause of his sensibility and [illegible] ig in... use of his ... style, which taught him that Schubert must not be made to sound like Strauss, nor Wagner like Chaikovsky; which taught him that Handel lived in a different world from Mozart and that Debussy was not Lisst. We shall think of him gratefully, furthermore, because as a conductor he was skillful, craftsmanlike, indefatigable, a master of his instrument. And (impertinent though this may be) we shall remember him with affection and admiration because he was modest, gentle, without pettiness or bile; a rare artist, a fine spirit, equable and wise and poised. . . .

The playing of the orchestra was of memorable excellence throughout Saturday afternoon, and Mr. Monteux was at the top of his form. He was applauded at every point where applause could be interjected, and the friendliness, appreciation and regret of the audience were unmistakably manifested. There was also—need we add?—a wreath. And thus passes Monteux from the contemporary orchestral scene. But we shall be greatly astonished if we do not see him again some day his baton in hand, on the stage of Carnegie Hall, which has witnessed stranger recrudescences than that would be.

In the New York Mail-Telegram—Munsey's clumsy name—Mr. Pitts Sanborn, of old warm toward Mr. Monteux when there were few voices to praise him, now takes up the chorus of praise: "Pierre Monteux is making [illegible]

EVA GAUTHIER SOLOIST

Among the things for which Mr. Monteux's term as director will be ever gratefully remembered is the establishment and successful furthering of this very series of concerts, now become as truly a part of the orchestra's regime as those of Friday afternoon's and Saturday evening's. Empty seats at these Monday concerts have become a rarity; and last night, as was to be expected, Symphony hall was completely filled by an audience that greeted the conductor warmly upon his first appearance and that heaped applause upon him after the performance of each number on the programme.

In no way was this programme prepared as for a special occasion. Rather it followed the general course of its predecessors; a well-liked Symphony, Beethoven's Seventh; a piece for resounding conclusion, Ritcher's arrangement of Siegfried's Ascent of the Rock and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Seigfried" and "Gotterdammerung"; a middle number of contrasting character, Rosario Scalero's Suite for String Quartet and Orchestra; and finally music for the assisting soloist, in this case Eva Gauthier, who was heard in Ravel's Two Hebrew Melodies, in the Recitative and Air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and in Rosina's "Una voce poco fa" from Rosini's "Barber of Seville."

In the Symphony of Beethoven, admirably performed, and in the glorious music of Wagner lay the chief pleasure of the concert. Ravel's melodies are curious rather than deeply impressive, while the overworked music of the youthful Debussy is little more than warmed over Massenet. And not for Mme. Gauthier, unsurpassed interpreter of certain modern composers, is the ornate music of Rossini.

Finally Scalero's Suite, the work of an Italian musician now living in New York, and performed here for the first time, seemed hardly to repay the pains lavished upon it by Mr. Monteux, the orchestra, and the solo quartet—Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz, Fourel and Bedetti. There are pleasing moments in the variations on a theme from Schumann's "Album for the Young," and here and there throughout the piece come interesting instrumental effects. But in the last analysis the suite must be dismissed as well-made commonplace.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 23 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra will ... renewals till May 1 for its Carnegie Hall series under Serge Koussevitzky.

English grand Opera Company ... engagements for English quartet and orchestra, played for the first time here. It is well written and unpretentious music, with some scandalously tuneful variations and a not too contrapuntal fugued finale. The audience like it and were applauding heartily even before the presence of the composer was disclosed, which by no means always is the case under similar circumstances.

Mr Monteux, whatever the defects of his interpretations of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and of excerpts from Wagner last night, at least made no attempt to show off at the expense of these great classics. His modesty may come to be recalled ... some ...

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

EVA GAUTHIER AS SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux Conducts Last of Monday Symphony Series

A large and enthusiastic audience crowded Symphony hall last evening for the last concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux's leadership. Mr. Monteux, making his farewell to the Monday subscribers, was applauded with a vigor that evidences the warm esteem in which his audiences have come to hold him, and was recalled many times.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which Mr. Monteux began the regular symphony series last fall, was given another brilliant performance last night. Surely the magnificent renderings that have been given the Seventh, the Ninth and the Sixth symphonies by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should make 1923-1924 stand forth as a memorable Beethoven season.

Eva Gauthier was the soloist of the evening. She sang two Hebrew melodies of Ravel, recitative and area of Lia, "Azael! Azael!" from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" and "Une Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." Mme. Gauthier was singing exceedingly well, but surely her graceful use of her voice, her persuasive personality, the popularity of the Rossini and the Debussy and, to some, of the ear-charming dissonances of Ravel's second melody, "The Eternal Enigma"—surely these were not all the reasons for her many recalls. For there seemed to be a justified interest in her most remarkable gown—a stunning affair of geranium pink, with panels and odd sweeping train faced with emerald green.

Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz of the violins, Mr. Fourel of the violas and Mr. Bedetti of the 'cellos formed the string quartet for Rosario Scalero's suite for string quartet and string orchestra, performed for the first time in Boston. Graceful, easy-flowing melodies and colorful use of the various choirs pleased the hearers. The composer was discovered in the audience to share in the applause.

To close, excerpts from The Ring were given which included Siegfried's passing through the fire to Bruenhilde's rock, from the third act of "Siegfried"; Dawn and Siegfried's journey up the Rhine from "Gotterdammerung" and the close of the last opera of the Nibelungen cycle. These selections are those adapted for concert use by Hans Richter, except for the final pages of "Gotterdammerung," which Mr. Monteux has substituted for Richter's addition of a few measures of the Valhalla motive.

above all else to recommend a piquant piano accompaniment, the piquancy of which vanishes in the orchestral arrangement, and of the Kaddish melody nobody yet has succeeded in making an effective concert song. Boldly, too, Mme. Gauthier dragged back to its original place the mezzo-soprano repertory, Rossini's air of which coloratura sopranos had taken possession many years ago. She did well. Only she would have shown a sager discretion if she had left to the sopranos their bedizenments and had sung the air as Rossini set it down. Mme. Gauthier pleased the audience.

Mr. Scalero's modest piece lacked the needed color to hold its own between Mme. Gauthier's two appearances. Conservative to the point of dullness, it may have been written to show what the composer could accomplish with strings alone. In point of sonority he accomplished much. There is, too, certain simple dignity in the prelude, a liveliness about the finale which make them pleasant enough to hear. But it is hard to believe that the heavy-handed variations on a trivial Schumann theme ever could entertain. The suite was beautifully played. Mr. Scalero acknowledged the friendly applause from his seat in the audience.

A stirring performance of excerpts from "The Ring" brought the concert and the series to close. At its end Mr. Monteux once more was acclaimed, and that with the cordial warmth so distinctly his due. R. R. G.

"THE MAGIC FLOWER"

LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

At the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this week Mr. Monteux will present for the first time in Boston, in the orchestral version at least, Schelling's tone poem "A Victory Ball," which Lowell heard at the beginning of the season as scored for Sousa's band. Sigrid Onegin, who comes to Lowell early next season, will be the soloist at the concers.

ductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give place to Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant and irrubrical Muscovite, who will assume the leadership of the orchestra next season.

It seems to us that Mr. Monteux should feel happy, rather than depressed, over the circumstances of his farewell. He departs hence trailing clouds of glory. The handsome things that are being said of him these days, in print and in private, must make him blush, for Mr. Monteux is one of the few conductors we know who seem capable of blushing. He leaves us in the fullness of his powers, and with an extraordinary record of achievement. His conducting during the past season in New York has won him almost unqualified praise. If he had done nothing else but perform Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" with the mastery and eloquence that are still fresh in everyone's mind he would be entitled to rest on his oars. And what Mr. Monteux has done with, to and for the illustrous orchestra which he has commanded will not soon be forgotten. He took charge of it in a period of demoralization, when it had become third-rate and almost negligible. He leaves it a superb instrument, one of the great orchestras of the world, an orchestra which should cause Mr. Koussevitzky to weep tears of joy when first it plays for him—for we have heard the orchestras that Mr. Koussevitzky has had to work with in Paris and London.

Suppose Mr. Monteux had been reengaged—suppose he were to stay on in these parts for another term? Let him imagine what might have happened, and let him console himself. Critics, like brides, throw their bouquets backward, as Mr. Stewart Mitchell once happily observed. If Mr. Monteux were not leaving us for good, would there have been as many bouquets flung in his direction? We fear not. Those who are restive in the presence of the modernists of music would probably begin to complain next season of his programmes. "Too much Arthur Bliss—too much Stravnisky," he might hear them grumbling. They might lay it up against him that he has played only one Symphony of Beethoven in New York this season, although other concert goers surfeited with Beethoven Cycles and countless repetitions of The Fifth, would prefer to bless him for his moderation in this respect.

And the mutterings that one heard after Mr. Monteux's "All-Wagner" programme might have broken forth in open protest if he were staying on with day—except the musical Lower Orders?

And so Mr. Monteux might have found, if he had remained, that the public that goes to symphony concerts is a fickle creature, heartless and unfaithful, given to jiltings and cold shoulders. Consider the case of Mr. ——. But let that pass. Mr. Monteux has been praised, at times, with foolishness—for virtues, if they are virtues, of no importance. He has been meanor on the stand is quiet and repraised, for example because his depressed, in contrast with other conductors, who, pursuing a different method, convey their wishes to their orchestras by gestures more demonstrative and emphatic. But this seems to us highly insignificant. If Mr. Damrosch can best obtain a lovely diminuendo by turning his back on his orchestra and beaming upon the audience, why shouldn't he resort to that method? If Mr. Mengelberg can best obtain one of his cataclysmic fortissimi by shaking his fist at the brass and percussion like a demoniacal Ajax, whose affair is it but his? If Mr. Stokowski can make his violins sing like a choir of morning stars by one of those sweeping, unison, two-armed gestures of his, is it not impertinent to ask him to accomplish his ends by other methods? If Mr. Koussevitzky can best prevail upon his first horn to deliver a melting cantilena by smiling sweetly at the hornist as at a beloved friend, why should we question an expedient which justifies itself by its success?

We refuse to set it to Mr. Monteux's credit, therefore that his method of conveying his reminders to his men happens to be impassive. It would be a matter of complete indifference to us if he chose to conduct without any baton at all, as Mr. Safonov used to do; or by a system of signal-flags; or with a baseball bat; or, as Beau Brummel used to say, with only "a glance of the eye." After all, those who object to Mr. Damrosch's beaming countenance, or Mr. Mengelberg's fist, or Mr. Koussevitzky's sweet smile, have only to lower their lids—they are there to listen, and not to look.

Continued on Following Page

Therefore it sems more pertinent to remember Mr. Monteux because ... the quality of his interpretations ... cause of his demeanor on t... We shall think of him grat... cause of his sensi... ... is ... ... use of ... style, which taught him that Schubert must not be made to sound like Strauss, nor Wagner like Chaikovsky; which taught him that Handel lived in a different world from Mozart and that Debussy was not Lisst. We shall think of him gratefully, furthermore, because as a conductor he was skilful, craftsmanlike, indefatigable, a master of his instrument. And (impertinent though this may be) we shall remember him with affection and admiration because he was modest, gentle, without pettiness or bile; a rare artist, a fine spirit, equable and wise and poised. . . .

The playing of the orchestra was of memorable excellence throughout Saturday afternoon, and Mr. Monteux was at the top of his form. He was applauded at every point where applause could be interjected, and the friendliness, appreciation and regret of the audience were unmistakably manifested. There was also—need we add?—a wreath. And thus passes Monteux from the contemporary orchestral scene. But we shall be greatly astonished if we do not see him again some day his baton in hand, on the stage of Carnegie Hall, which has witnessed stranger recrudescences than that would be.

In the New York Mail-Telegram—Munsey's clumsy name—Mr. Pitts Sanborn, of old warm toward Mr. Monteux when there were few voices to praise him, now takes up the chorus of praise: "Pierre Monteux is making his last visit to New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky will succeed him in that position next autumn. The orchestra that the Russian will inherit is today as much Pierre Monteux's orchestra as the old Boston Symphony before the wartime disruption was Wilhelm Gericke's and Karl Muck's. With fostering care, Mr. Monteux has refashioned the band, and his intelligent and unremitting discipline have developed its playing to a point of virtuosity worthy of its days of greatest previous renown.

"As a conductor Mr. Monteux has carried on worthily the high tradition of musicianship that has long been a treasured possession of the Boston band. He is not a sensationalist, not a conductor for the eye, the antipodes of the 'prima donna of the baton.' The three conductors who have presided longest over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. Gericke, Muck and Monteux, have been primarily musicians, and their reigns have been marked by an absorption in the musical provision of their audience to the exclusion of personal display and aggrandizement.

"Mr. Monteux is especially distinguished for the variety, the catholicity, the artistic arrangement of his programmes. No other orchestral conductor in America today shows equal flair, courage, tact, and breadth of view in his selection of the music that his band shall play. Mr. Monteux has led a great deal of modern music in New York, especially of the French and the Russian schools. Indeed, he is the authoritative interpreter of Debussy and of Stravinsky, and perhaps his apotheosis as an orchestral leader was reached with his triumphant performances of 'The Rite of Spring' this season. But he is likewise a sympathetic and soundly schooled interpreter of the classics. He is particularly happy with the eighteenth-century composers—Handel, Haydn, Mozart—and his Beethoven is a Beethoven that speaks for himself (as Beethoven is well able to do) without the finicky intrusion of a tampering personality between the composer and the audience. To all who like their music straight Mr. Monteux's method has been peculiarly sympathetic."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 8 1924

SYMPHONY CONCERT, NOVEL IN NUMBERS, NOVEL IN INCIDENT

MME. GAUTHIER AND MR. SCALERO NEWCOMERS

Mr. Monteux Begins Bostonian Farewells to a Reciprocating Audience—A Singer Out of Her Finer Sphere—Classic Composer in a Modern Day—Inning for Beethoven, Inning for Wagner

MUCH that was unusual befell at Symphony Hall yesterday when, for the year, the Monday evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra came to end. For the first time Bostonians might observe Mr. Monteux and one of his publics in the act of leave-taking; since for the last time, he and an audience of Monday were face to face. It filled the hall upstairs and down, eager at every opportunity to prove its regard for the departing conductor. As he came to his place, it applauded long and loud. Through two minutes by the watch he stood waiting at his music-stand, and a hundred and twenty seconds may enclose no little clapping. At every pause in the progress of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the hall rang with just plaudits—not to be stilled at the close until the orchestra stood in crescent around the conductor who has remade it. Interludes for the singer, Mme Gauthier, ensued; while, after the novel piece of the evening—Mr. Scalero's Suite for Strings—Mr. Monteux directed the applause toward the composer, modestly placed in the parquet. Opportunity returned at the end of the concert upon orchestral fragments of "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." Music and performance had plainly stirred all within earshot. For minutes the listeners lingered; twice and thrice Mr. Monteux bowed his thanks. Equally pleasant to watch was the zest of the audience and the modesty of the conductor—the one as genuine as the other.

For the first time in Boston, Mme. Gauthier sang with orchestra, in a symphony concert, across a far-spreading concert-room—natural, if not altogether wise, ambition on her part. For this hazard of new fortunes, she chose Ravel's settings for voice and orchestra of two Hebrew Melodies—one, "Kaddisch," a hymn of praise to Jehovah, saluted also as the Phœnician Adonaïs; the other, "Eternal Enigma," curious byplay, as it seemed, upon the ironies of existence. To these she added one of the less hackneyed airs from Debussy's early cantata, "The Prodigal Son" and Rosina's pretty little showpiece, "Una Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's operatic comedy, "The Barber." By these signs Mme. Gauthier is as eclectic in an orchestral concert as she is in her own recitals—and as astute, since in the Hebrew Melodies, she had the advantage of Ravel's artful mating of voice and instruments; in Debussy's air of his sandpapered sweetness, Massenet-like; in Rosina's cavatina of a tune that almost sings—and also ornaments—itself. It was interesting, moreover, to note how well Mr. Monteux, as practised operatic hand, shaped Rossini's Italian phrasing; and with what imagination, learning and skill Ravel wrought the orchestral part in his Hebrew Melodies. To the Hymn of Praise he put a quasi-liturgical music that was yet thin-textured, astringent, economical in the fashion of our time; while to the few measures of the ironic piece he set wisp-like tones darting down the wind—Mephistopheles's whistle in Boïto's opera on the lips and in the fancy of a man of mocking wit.

None the less, it was possible to believe Mme. Gauthier's adventure ill-advised. In all four pieces, her voice seemed to lack the body and impetus essential to a large concert-hall; while it is not sufficiently rich or deep-tinted to withstand a manifold orchestral background. Mme. Gauthier praised Jehovah and Adonaïs less as the sons of Israel in the concourse of the text than as a solitary woman worshipping in her chamber or by the fountain. Verse and music span an ardor, a vehemence, beyond her vocal powers. In her tones, in the long tunnel of Symphony Hall, Rosina's ornaments of song evaporated. The singer seemed to slide over them; while they themselves seemed to slip away. Ravel's quick ironies of a questioning world unanswered, were too wisp-like in these great spaces; across them, a thicker-timbred voice would better have carried Messrs. Debussy and Massenet. In her own recitals Mme Gauthier excels in adroit variations of pace and rhythm; in subtle shadings, modulations, transitions; in a diabolic skill with the keen edges of her tones. By insight and intuition, as of one mind upon another, she lays hold of her audience. Now these are not the ways, means or consequences of an "assisting artist" at a symphony concert.

Unusual in turn was Mr. Scalero—middle-aged gentleman, as he seemed when he rose from his place, with a profile not unlike that of a more ascetic Roman cardinal. He is an Italian; yet he made his studies of music in German and Austrian cities. He is also an Italian composer; yet he inclines not to the theatre; eschews the of Casella, Malipiero and the other modernists; makes no compromise between the old fashions and the new, like Respighi and Sabata; cultivates, instead, the austerer courses and the purer forms of music as did Martucci and Sgambati in an earlier and neglected generation. A year ago the Flonzaley Quartet and Mme. Stanley brought hither his piece for violins, viola and violoncello with a voice singing verses of d'Annunzio. Last evening Mr. Monteux played his Suite for String Orchestra, with the leaders of the four choirs as String Quartet.

Music more within the classic and the academic tradition would be hard to imagine in kind. Mr. Scalero begins with a Choral-Prelude, harking back to the best models which are in Bach, but not directly imitating them. Writing, he is fertile in counterpoint, quick-eared to the blended or parted timbres of his choir, adept in threading his quartet through the tonal web. Mr. Scalero proceeds with a brief set of variations upon a songful, smiling theme drawn from an obscure "Album for the Young" signed Robert Schumann. The variations embroider the mood as well as the matter of the subject. They are agreeably compact; pleasantly fanciful; adept in technical means; a music of scholarship and a music of charm. A Finale ensues in which Mr. Scalero releases temperately the sonorities of his orchestra and again sets quartet and choir in unforced and pleasing interplay. In sum, a singular piece in these modernist days and for an Italian to write. Here are classic forms and procedures; music according to all the orthodoxies and in relative miniature—pure pattern woven with skill and threaded with fancy; of no signal invention or felicity, yet altogether pleasing. Unobtrusively "different" composer in this 1924 is Rosario Scalero. With reason was he clapped.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the music of Siegfried scaling to Brunnhilde's Rock, departing in the dawn, cleaving the Rhine, were the orchestra's inning. For his final pair of concerts Mr. Monteux is reserving the Fifth Symphony. It might rather have been the Seventh, although with that music he began the year; since with none of The Nine do he and the orchestra more excel. Once more, at their hands, the first movement swelled from streamlet to flood upon the waves of Beethoven's rhythms. The alternating scherzo leapt from transition to transition jetting melody like a fountain. In bounds went the Finale, touching the earth, like the hero in the old Greek myth, only to spring upward again. To the end it held unflagging—as near to frenzy as music and musicians—ordered things and human—may go. Nowhere is Mr. Monteux more fortunate with the stride of the melodies, the energies of the rhythms, the long ascent, the attained summits. Of one mind, of one spirit with the music is the musician. Beethoven speaks for himself and in a masterpiece; but he also speaks intensified. . . . Power was Mr. Monteux's quest with the fragments of Wagner—the power of tonal mass and tonal incisiveness up-piled, sharpened, contrasted. A warmer sensuous beauty might have deepened the music of the parting, the music of the singing river. But Wagner is invincible. Fools and slow of heart are they who would now thrust him into outer darkness. Caught themselves in that twilight, they do not see and barely hear a whole younger generation rising to him.

Incidents and Prospects

Except the "rush seats" in the second balcony, held for sale until Friday afternoon, every available place is already taken for the repetitions of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" at the Symphony Concerts of this week. The demand, moreover, is still brisk. It would be a courteous deed on the part of sundry subscribers, who declare in a loud voice and with reiteration that "they will go to no such concert," were they to bestow their tickets, for the occasion, on the box-office of Symphony Hall. Not a few eagerly desire them.

As another sign of the times and of the inclinations of a substantial public—fifteen minutes before Mr. Powell began his talk about "The Rite of Spring" at the Public Library last Saturday, it was necessary to close the doors, because not a foot of standing-room remained. And through an hour the lecturer held this close-packed audience.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon in New York Mr. Gebhard repeated the piano-part in de Falla's piece, "Nights in Gardens of Spain." Symphathetically, the Tribune-Herald said of him: "An accomplished virtuoso, he never plays for the sake of virtuosity. He is first the poet, the man of warm and delicate fancy, the sensitive musician, and his great skill is made to serve the ends of the interpreter. His playing in de Falla's music was beautifully proportioned, always within the frame, justly contributory to a delightful performance."

H. T. P.

To Fresh Fields

Eva Gauthier

Singer for the First Time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck, who was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to the time America went into the World War, will direct the orchestra at the Beyreuth festival this Summer. "Parsifal," the "Ring," "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger von Nuernberg" by Wagner, will be given. Siegfried Wagner, will be in charge of the festival.

COLUMBUS
OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade [illegible] York in two concerts [illegible] organization this [illegible] at the conclusion of the present season Mr. Monteux will sever his association with the Boston Orchestra. It may be said in passing that Mr. Monteux has worked wonders with the Boston Orchestra since he became its conductor, a few years ago. The Boston organization was an almost complete wreck when Mr. Monteux came to it. The union troubles and the expulsion of the German members during war times was responsible for the undoing of the fine organization which for so many years brought distinction to Boston. Mr. Monteux, by hard work, has brought the orchestra again to a fine state of efficiency. This French conductor was brought to this country by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the Metropolitan opera. For several years Mr. Monteux conducted, with great distinction, the French repertoire at the Metropolitan, and went from there to the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Monteux's record in the musical life of New York and Boston has been something to be proud of and he returns to his native France with the respect and honor of musical folk in general.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER

APR 13 1924

BY PHRYGIAN.

NEW YORK—Styles in orchestral conducting change rapidly. Pierre Monteux was not requested by the directorate of the Boston Symphony to continue his leadership after this year. What effect that may have had on the performances of the orchestra is open to question, but it remains a fact that the Boston organization has done far better work in this last year of Monteux's reign than in any preceding. It was not fair of Monteux to treat his directors in that way. He might have had the decency, knowing that this was his final year, to avoid the growing popularity that greeted him, culminating in a definite outburst of approval at the orchestra's final pair of concerts in New York this week.

The style has changed. We hearken for more demonstrative—patently demonstrative—souls than Monteux. Our directors want not only to hear emotion in the music. They want to see it in their conductor. And Monteux is one who, figuratively, always keeps his shirt on when conducting. He is not given to wayward motions or superfluous gesticulation to his groups of players. He just uses his head, and conducts. That is not quite the style here today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SYMPHONY CONCERT, NOVEL IN NUMBERS, NOVEL IN INCIDENT

MME. GAUTHIER AND MR. SCALERO NEWCOMERS

Mr. Monteux Begins Bostonian Farewells to a Reciprocating Audience—A Singer Out of Her Finer Sphere—Classic Composer in a Modern Day—Inning for Beethoven, Inning for Wagner

MUCH that was unusual befell at Symphony Hall yesterday when, for the year, the Monday evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra came to end. For the first time Bostonians might observe Mr. Monteux and one of his publics in the act of leave-taking, since for the last time, he and an audience of Monday were face to face. It filled the hall upstairs and down, eager at every opportunity to prove its regard for the departing conductor. As he came to his place, it applauded long and loud. Through two minutes by the watch he stood waiting at his music-stand, and a hundred and twenty seconds may enclose no little clapping. At every pause in the progress of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony the hall rang with just plaudits—not to be stilled at the close until the orchestra stood in crescent around the conductor who has remade it. Interludes for the singer, Mme Gauthier, ensued; while, after the novel piece of the evening—Mr. Scalero's Suite for Strings—Mr. Monteux directed the applause toward the composer, modestly placed in the parquet. Opportunity returned at the end of the concert upon orchestral fragments of "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." Music and performance had plainly stirred all within earshot. For minutes the listeners lingered; twice and thrice Mr. Monteux bowed his thanks. Equally pleasant to watch was the zest of the audience and the modesty of the conductor—the one as genuine as the other.

For the first time in Boston, Mme. Gauthier sang with orchestra, in a symphony concert, across a far-spreading concert-room—natural, if not altogether wise, ambition on her part. For this hazard of new fortunes, she chose Ravel's settings for voice and orchestra of two Hebrew Melodies—one, "Kaddisch," a hymn of praise to Jehovah, saluted also as the Phœnician Adonaïs; the other, "Eternal Enigma," curious byplay, as it seemed, upon the ironies of existence. To these she added one of the less hackneyed airs from Debussy's early cantata, "The Prodigal Son" and Rosina's pretty little showpiece, "Una Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's operatic comedy, "The Barber." By these signs Mme. Gauthier is as eclectic in an orchestral concert as she is in her own recitals—and as astute, since in the Hebrew Melodies, she had the advantage of Ravel's artful mating of voice and instruments; in Debussy's air of his sandpapered sweetness, Massenet-like; in Rosina's cavatina of a tune that almost sings—and also ornaments—itself. It was interesting, moreover, to note how well Mr. Monteux, as practised operatic hand, shaped Rossini's Italian phrasing; and with what imagination, learning and skill Ravel wrought the orchestral part in his Hebrew Melodies. To the Hymn of Praise he put a quasi-liturgical music that was yet thin-textured, astringent, economical in the fashion of our time; while to the few measures of the ironic piece he set wisp-like tones darting down the wind—Mephistopheles's whistle in Boito's opera on the lips and in the fancy of a man of mocking wit.

None the less, it was possible to believe Mme. Gauthier's adventure ill-advised. In all four pieces, her voice seemed to lack the body and impetus essential to a large concert-hall; while it is not sufficiently rich or deep-tinted to withstand a manifold orchestral background. Mme. Gauthier praised Jehovah and Adonaïs less as the sons of Israel in the concourse of the text than as a solitary woman worshipping in her chamber or by the fountain. Verse and music span an ardor, a vehemence, beyond her vocal powers. In her tones, in the long tunnel of Symphony Hall, Rosina's ornaments of song evaporated. The singer seemed to slide over them; while they themselves seemed to slip away. Ravel's quick ironies of a questioning world unanswered, were too wisp-like in these great spaces; across them, a thicker-timbred voice would better have carried Messrs. Debussy and Massenet. In her own recitals Mme Gauthier excels in adroit variations of pace and rhythm; in subtle shadings, modulations, transitions; in a diabolic skill with the keen edges of her tones. By insight and intuition, as of one mind upon another, she lays hold of her audience. Now these are not the ways, means or consequences of an "assisting artist" at a symphony concert.

Unusual in turn was Mr. Scalero—middle-aged gentleman, as he seemed when he rose from his place, with a profile not unlike that of a more ascetic Roman cardinal. He is an Italian; yet he made his studies of music in German and Austrian cities. He is also an Italian composer; yet he inclines not to the theatre; eschews the ways of Casella, Malipiero and the other modernists; makes no compromise between the old fashions and the new, like Respighi and Sabata; cultivates, instead, the austerer courses and the purer forms of music as did Martucci and Sgambati in an earlier and neglected generation. A year ago the Flonzaley Quartet and Mme. Stanley brought hither his piece for violins, viola and violoncello with a voice singing verses of d'Annunzio. Last evening Mr. Monteux played his Suite for String Orchestra, with the leaders of the four choirs as String Quartet.

Music more within the classic and the academic tradition would be hard to imagine in kind. Mr. Scalero begins with a Choral-Prelude, harking back to the best models which are in Bach, but not directly imitating them. Writing, he is fertile in counterpoint, quick-eared to the blended or parted timbres of his choir, adept in threading his quartet through the tonal web. Mr. Scalero proceeds with a brief set of variations upon a songful, smiling theme drawn from an obscure "Album for the Young" signed Robert Schumann. The variations embroider the mood as well as the matter of the subject. They are agreeably compact; pleasantly fanciful; adept in technical means; a music of scholarship and a music of charm. A Finale ensues in which Mr. Scalero releases temperately the sonorities of his orchestra and again sets quartet and choir in unforced and pleasing interplay. In sum, a singular piece in these modernist days and for an Italian to write. Here are classic forms and procedures; music according to all the orthodoxies and in relative miniature—pure pattern woven with skill and threaded with fancy; of no signal invention or felicity, yet altogether pleasing. Unobtrusively "different" composer in this 1924 is Rosario Scalero. With reason was he clapped.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the music of Siegfried sealing to Brunnhilde's Rock, departing in the dawn, cleaving the Rhine, were the orchestra's inning. For his final pair of concerts Mr. Monteux is reserving the Fifth Symphony. It might rather have been the Seventh, although with that music he began the year; since with none of The Nine do he and the orchestra more excel. Once more, at their hands, the first movement swelled from streamlet to flood upon the waves of Beethoven's rhythms. The alternating scherzo leapt from transition to transition jetting melody like a fountain. In bounds went the Finale, touching the earth, like the hero in the old Greek myth, only to spring upward again. To the end it held unflagging—as near to frenzy as music and musicians—ordered things and human—may go. Nowhere is Mr. Monteux more fortunate with the stride of the melodies, the energies of the rhythms, the long ascent, the attained summits. Of one mind, of one spirit with the music is the musician. Beethoven speaks for himself and in a masterpiece; but he also speaks intensified. . . . Power was Mr. Monteux's quest with the fragments of Wagner—the power of tonal mass and tonal incisiveness up-piled, sharpened, contrasted. A warmer sensuous beauty might have deepened the music of the parting, the music of the singing river. But Wagner is invincible. Fools and slow of heart are they who would now thrust him into outer darkness. Caught themselves in that twilight, they do not see and barely hear a whole younger generation rising to him.

Incidents and Prospects

Except the "rush seats" in the second balcony, held for sale until Friday afternoon, every available place is already taken for the repetitions of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" at the Symphony Concerts of this week. The demand, moreover, is still brisk. It would be a courteous deed on the part of sundry subscribers, who declare in a loud voice and with reiteration that "they will go to no such concert," were they to bestow their tickets, for the occasion, on the box-office of Symphony Hall. Not a few eagerly desire them.

As another sign of the times and of the inclinations of a substantial public—fifteen minutes before Mr. Powell began his talk about "The Rite of Spring" at the Public Library last Saturday, it was necessary to close the doors, because not a foot of standing-room remained. And through an hour the lecturer held this close-packed audience.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon in New York Mr. Gebhard repeated the piano-part in de Falla's piece, "Nights in Gardens of Spain." Symphathetically, the Tribune-Herald said of him: "An accomplished virtuoso, he never plays for the sake of virtuosity. He is first the poet, the man of warm and delicate fancy, the sensitive musician, and his great skill is made to serve the ends of the interpreter. His playing in de Falla's music was beautifully proportioned, always within the frame, justly contributory to a delightful performance." H. T. P.

To Fresh Fields

Eva Gauthier

Singer for the First Time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck, who was the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra up to the time America went into the World War, will direct the orchestra at the Bayreuth festival this Summer. "Parsifal," the "Ring," "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger von Nuernberg" by Wagner, will be given. Siegfried Wagner, will be in charge of the festival.

COLUMBUS
OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade New York in two concerts organization this w[illegible] the conclusion of the present season Mr. Monteux will sever his association with the Boston Orchestra. It may be said in passing that Mr. Monteux has worked wonders with the Boston Orchestra since he became its conductor, a few years ago. The Boston organization was an almost complete wreck when Mr. Monteux came to it. The union troubles and the expulsion of the German members during war times was responsible for the undoing of the fine organization which for so many years brought distinction to Boston. Mr. Monteux, by hard work, has brought the orchestra again to a fine state of efficiency. This French conductor was brought to this country by Mr. Gatti-Casazza for the Metropolitan opera. For several years Mr. Monteux conducted, with great distinction, the French repertoire at the Metropolitan, and went from there to the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Monteux's record in the musical life of New York and Boston has been something to be proud of and he returns to his native France with the respect and honor of musical folk in general.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER

BY PHRYGIAN.

NEW YORK—Styles in orchestral conducting change rapidly. Pierre Monteux was not requested by the directorate of the Boston Symphony to continue his leadership after this year. What effect that may have had on the performances of the orchestra is open to question, but it remains a fact that the Boston organization has done far better work in this last year of Monteux's reign than in any preceding. It was not fair of Monteux to treat his directors in that way. He might have had the decency, knowing that this was his final year, to avoid the growing popularity that greeted him, culminating in a definite outburst of approval at the orchestra's final pair of concerts in New York this week.

The style has changed. We hearken for more demonstrative—patently demonstrative—souls than Monteux. Our directors want not only to hear emotion in the music. They want to see it in their conductor. And Monteux is one who, figuratively, always keeps his shirt on when conducting. He is not given to wayward motions or superfluous gesticulation to his groups of players. He just uses his head, and conducts. That is not quite the style here today.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

22 SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
ARGONAUT
APR 12 1924

Sergei Kussewitsky, one of the most striking figures among European conductors of the day, is to be the next leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874, Kussewitsky was conducting at the age of twelve. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory at twenty-two, and soon appeared at the Imperial Opera at Moscow as a soloist on the double bass, and as the greatest player on this instrument in Europe. But his ambition was conducting. He conducted his first concert in 1907, and though he was known only as a soloist at the time of his debut his concerts were instantly successful. In 1910 he formed in Moscow a large symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices. In the following ten years he became famous as an orchestral leader throughout Europe. Since the war, which drove him from Russia, Paris has been his headquarters and his concerts at the opera have been major events of the Paris musical season. He has also made repeated tours of England and Spain as guest conductor. Mr. Kussewitsky promises to introduce in America the best modern Russian and French music. The music of the future, he says, will come from Spain, Russia and France, that of Germany being decadent.

Alfred H. Smith, president of the New York Cen-

TOWN TOPICS
NEW YORK CITY
APR 10 1924

SEMI-QUAVERS

ECHOES FROM THE CONCERT PLATFORM

MUSICAL history of this metropolis adds another date to its compilation: Pierre Monteux, for the past four years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned the baton of that honorable organization and has appeared for the last time as an orchestral conductor—such is my conjecture. Mr. Monteux may have plans up his sleeve; perhaps he will return to Paris, or continue here with some other orchestra, but such possibilities are still beyond the province of publicity, even of rumor.

Mr. Monteux took over the orchestra following the brief and disastrous reign of Henri Rabaud; he took it over in discouraging condition, many of its first players missing, the ensemble spirit gone, and built it up until today it is again one of the finest instruments in the world—not perhaps the perfect band of Dr. Karl Muck, but at least a very respectable and noteworthy candidate for such honors. Monteux's has not been an easy task and one marvels at it the more in view of the fact that this French conductor is not an orchestral taskmaster—he is a musician, and cares—as was recently remarked in an anonymous article published by the American Mercury—more for the music itself than its performance. We imagine him a rather lenient director of rehearsals. But he has achieved remarkable results. The Boston Band has taken inspiration from his almost fanatical devotion to the music from his progressive spirit.

Another phase of Monteux's term as conductor of the Boston Symphony calling for attention lies in his flair for programs. I have often remarked upon the expertness with which he selects and groups his works, at the courageous strides into the regions of modern music, and of the unfamiliar, not only from contemporary sources, but from among the classics. "Sacre du Printemps," the great score of Igor Strawinsky, was first performed in New York under his direction at one of the Thursday evening concerts of the present season, and repeated by request at a Saturday matinee. Not only Strawinsky, but Ravel, Bax, de Falla and many others owe first American performances to Monteux.

As a conductor he is at all times admirable, though less happy in regions of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms than in the music of his countrymen, Debussy and Ravel. To hear the "Nocturnes," or the "Prelude à l'apres-midi d'un faune" under his baton is an experience, and New York, as well as Boston, will wait long before it hears these familiar works played in so splendid a fashion.

THE last Thursday evening concert under Monteux's baton took place a week ago today. The program was made up of the third Leonora Overture of Beethoven, Chopin's Piano Concerto in E minor, played by Moriz Rosenthal, and the Franck Symphony in D minor. The reading of Franck's noble music was particularly notable: Beethoven less so. Much more at home was Monteux in Scriabine's "Divine Poem" and a de Falla novelty, presented at the following Saturday matinee.

Rosenthal played the Chopin concerto brilliantly, though it is a thin and uninteresting work. His extreme virtuosity would be better suited to Liszt or even Tchaikowsky than to this rather anemic work of the greatest of all piano composers.

Mr. Monteux's departure is greatly regretted. He leaves a lasting memory, an undeniable impression as an orchestral conductor. His successor, Serge Koussewitsky, comes to Boston next season with a brilliant Continental reputation, and into his hands Monteux delivers an orchestra far superior to any that Koussewitsky may have directed abroad.

The Emotionalist.

BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS

Music Notes.

Among the musical attractions promised Buffalo for next season are the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its new conductor, Serge Koussivitski; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who has enjoyed sensational success this season and who, at this early date is booked for 40 appearances next year; Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, pianists; Dusolina Giannini, the young Italian soprano, who won many admirers at her recent local appearance, and Myra Hess, the noted English pianist for whom Buffalo music lovers have been waiting eagerly.

Koussevitzky is completing, or has just completed, his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his well-known series of "Koussevitzky Concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for American to assume his duties an conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, September 4, on the S. S. Aquitania.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 12 1924

What London Thinks Of Boston's New Leader

The King is dead, long live the King! Boston, having lost Monteux, will next October have a new conductor. He will, of course, preside over the famous orchestra of the Hub when it comes to New York; hence we are all interested. What sort of a conductor is this man, Serge Kussevitsky by name?

London has long known him. Here is an estimate which appeared in Truth, February 14, 1923:

"Last week we had the pleasure of seeing again Serge Kussevitsky conduct the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kussevitsky is undoubtedly one of the greatest conductors living, and there was a notable roll-up at the Queen's Hall of our English conductors—Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Adrian Boult, and Mr. Eugene Goossens, among others.

"The program contained one first rate item, the Brahms Symphony in F (No. 3); one superb show piece, the Tchaikovsky fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini,' and a number of small items such as an orchestral version of a sentimental drawing-room song by Rachmaninoff, described as 'Vocalise.' Mr. Kussevitsky began magnificently with the Tchaikovsky; he simply carried his orchestra away with him in the fiery execution of an astounding bit of carefully planned virtuosity. No one I have heard since Nikisch can get so much out of an orchestra as Mr. Kussevitsky. In the words of an old poet: 'He rides the whirlwind and commands the storm.' After such a performance as the 'Francesca da Rimini' one is left breathless and settles down in one's seat in anticipation of a wonderful evening.

"But on this occasion Mr. Kussevitsky cheated us. I suspect he had concentrated his rehearsing on the Tchaikovsky and on the Raval arrangement of Moussorgsky's 'Picture Show,' which concluded the program. At any rate, I felt that the Brahms performance was being improvised, and that he was relying too much on the orchestra's ability to pick up his intentions as they went along. There was a complete lack of certainty and inevitability about the performance which contrasted strongly with the rendering of the Tchaikovsky work. Moreover, Mr. Kussevitsky's rendering of the Brahms was in itself too Tchaikovskian, too dramatic and overemphasized. There were good moments, but on the whole it was a poor, rhapsodically uneven performance of that fine work, and it gave me very little pleasure."

Dec. Sun
21924

AT N. Y. DEBUT

Young Conductor From Paris Acclaimed at His Appearance With the New York Symphony Orchestra.

By A. J. Warner.

The few days we recently spent in New York, with the primary object of being present at the concert given by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last Monday, were productive of several particularly interesting experiences musically and dramatically. On last Saturday afternoon we heard the Boston Symphony, conducted by Pierre Monteux, who made his farewell appearance in New York as the leader of that superlative orchestra which is to be in the hands of the "brilliant and irrubrical Muscovite", Sergei Koussevitzsky, next season. Mr. Monteux, who is almost as gifted as a program maker as he is as a drill master, has, during the years of his New England regime, brought the famous Boston band from the state of demoralization in which he found it to a plane of exalted excellence; under his leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the world's greatest orchestras. Indeed, as it played Saturday the question came often to mind whether, after all, America boasted any orchestra, which, in tone and precision of performance, was its equal. Mr. Monteux is not of the ranks of "prima donna conductors", but he is a musician of the keenest intelligence and a stylist par excellence.

Mr. Monteux on Saturday presented a notable program, which comprised Handel's Concerto grosso No. 6, for strings; Scriabin's "Divine Poem"; "Nights In the Gardens of Spain" by Manuel De Falla, most prominent of Spain's younger com-

In as graphic contrast stood the two novel pieces of the day. One was a "Poem for Orchestra," by subtitle "In a Withered Garden" written by Mr. Elliott Schenck, who in his time in New York and elsewhere has discharged creditably many a task as workaday conductor and ready music-maker for pieces of the theatre. By the evidence of the pages now played, he is less credible and creditable as symphonic composer. Commonplace are the course of mood, the play of suggestion through his tone-poem. As uninventive is the matter of his music, as unimaginative and routine the progress and the workmanship. Not to mince words, "In a Withered Garden" is mediocrity little mitigated, seldom veiled. And for mediocrity, be it European or American, there is no place at the Symphony Concerts. Open always they should be—and are—to able and individual music from American pens, but not to certain unforgetable variations of Professor Seth Bingham or to this plodding tone-poem of Mr. Schenck.

For the first time into Bostonian and probably into American, concert-hall came also de Falla's 'Nights in the Gardens of Spain: Symphonic Impressions for Orchestra and Piano." By memory of the dances from his ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," played under Mr. Monteux in 1921, by the plain evidence of the music of yesterday, de Falla is an acquired, a difficult, but a grateful, pleasure to which the ear must be sharpened and the other perceptive faculties attuned. Not easily or at once do they savor his Spanish music, oftenest, so far as Boston knows it, in rhythms of the dance. Far is it from the conventional Spanish tinsel of opera house and concert-hall; while it draws not too near to the imaginative and more idiomatic Spanish measures of Bizet in "Carmen"; of Wolf in songs and the operatic comedy, "Der Corregidor"; of Rimsky-Korsakov in his "Spanish Caprice." On its own soil it shuns the flashing gauds, the leaping beat, the whirl, glare and flourish of the Spanish dances cultivated by Mr. Copeland and other pianists. The nearest neighbors, in these parts, to this music of Spanish gardens and Spanish nights is La-

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
The Independent
New York City
APR

Music

By Pitts Sanborn

Stravinsky

ONLY a few short months ago Igor Stravinsky was still the musical terror that walketh by night. At least in so far as we of America are concerned, he was the anti-composer, the headsman and likewise the grave-digger of music. Under his ultimate sentence one of the seven arts, and not the oldest, had wound up its affairs for good and all and ceased to be a going concern. The same sort of thing, it is true, was said about Wagner within memory of men not yet old; and then about Richard Strauss; and then about Debussy. Today Wagner is as much an established classic as Bach, Handel, or Beethoven; nobody now worries over cyanide or bichloride in the oozy molasses of Richard Strauss; Debussy is as deadly as a bolt of watered silk. History has not been close-mouthed to the victims of Stravinskyphobia. But history, notoriously, is Cassandra. Men hear her, and how little do they heed!

The fact is that observers of the musical scene in America have this year witnessed the swift development of a menace into a reputation. The marvel reached a pitch hardly short of the miraculous when on March 27 and 28 Carnegie Hall, New York, housed within the compass of two days four performances of Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," in its symphonic version, all four given under auspices of the very highest regularity and respectability.

The other Stravinsky novelties produced in New York in less than five months have been the folk pantomime of fox, goat, cat, and rooster, called in honor of the first "Renard," done in concert form by the International Composers' Guild; that ballet of spring rites and sacrifice in pagan Russia, "Le Sacre du Printemps," performed as a symphonic poem late in January, and repeated early in March, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux; the so-called "Symphonies" for twenty-three wind instruments in memory of Claude Debussy, brought forward by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski, and "L'Histoire du Soldat," a burlesque on the monotony and fruitlessness of soldiering, presented without scenery or speakers, as a purely instrumental work, at a concert of the League of Composers.

In fairness to American cities other than New York, one should record that Philadelphia, thanks to Mr. Stokowski and its own orchestra, heard "Le Sacre du Printemps" season before last, and that Mr. Monteux had led it in Boston a few days earlier in the month of his first bringing it to New York; and also that Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia anticipated Mr. Damrosch by a few days in doing "Le Chant du Rossignol."

The case of the "Sacre," though composed over eleven years ago, is the most important, because of all Stravinsky's works to date the most important is still the "Sacre." Now, nearly everything that could conceivably be written about anything has been written about this pagan ballet of the spring. In praise of it the dictionaries have literally been emptied.

If while the rites of Russian spring were raging through the Boston b[ourgeoi]sie, a few gentle souls resolutely walked out of Carnegie Hall, their indignation was at least silent, whereas the majority of the audience that packed the hall to bursting could not refrain from cheers. And the cheers were the verdict.

So in the last weeks of the music season of 1923–24 Igor Stravinsky finds himself irrevocably "accepted" in America. The recent anarch of the tonal art is the new pillar of its vast cathedral. Some other shocker will now have to be discovered and set up as the target of a musical indignation that must always have an object and an outlet. In any case, Igor Stravinsky is exempt.

TRANS Mar 27

Kusevitzky Variously

Mr. Kusevitzky revisited London the other day to lead the London Symphony Orchestra through one of his discoveries—a little eighteenth-century symphony by Boccherini; Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"—a programme conservative enough to soothe the most apprehensive of Bostonian dowagers. The reviewers agreed that Boccherini's piece

22 SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
ARGONAUT

APR 12 1924

Sergei Kussewitsky, one of the most striking figures among European conductors of the day, is to be the next leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874, Kussewitsky was conducting at the age of twelve. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory at twenty-two, and soon appeared at the Imperial Opera at Moscow as a soloist on the double bass, and as the greatest player on this instrument in Europe. But his ambition was conducting. He conducted his first concert in 1907, and though he was known only as a soloist at the time of his debut his concerts were instantly successful. In 1910 he formed in Moscow a large symphony orchestra and a chorus of 250 voices. In the following ten years he became famous as an orchestral leader throughout Europe. Since the war, which drove him from Russia, Paris has been his headquarters and his concerts at the opera have been major events of the Paris musical season. He has also made repeated tours of England and Spain as guest conductor. Mr. Kussewitsky promises to introduce in America the best modern Russian and French music. The music of the future, he says, will come from Spain, Russia and France, that of Germany being decadent.

Alfred H. Smith, president of the New York Cen-

TOWN TOPICS
NEW YORK CITY

10

SEMI-QUAVERS

ECHOES FROM THE CONCERT PLATFORM

MUSICAL history of this metropolis adds another date to its compilation: Pierre Monteux, for the past four years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned the baton of that honorable organization and has appeared for the last time as an orchestral conductor—such is my conjecture. Mr. Monteux may have plans up his sleeve; perhaps he will return to Paris, or continue here with some other orchestra, but such possibilities are still beyond the province of publicity, even of rumor.

Mr. Monteux took over the orchestra following the brief and disastrous reign of Henri Rabaud; he took it over in discouraging condition, many of its first players missing, the ensemble spirit gone, and built it up until today it is again one of the finest instruments in the world—not perhaps the perfect band of Dr. Karl Muck, but at least a very respectable and noteworthy candidate for such honors. Monteux's has not been an easy task and one marvels at it the more in view of the fact that this French conductor is not an orchestral taskmaster—he is a musician, and cares—as was recently remarked in an anonymous article published by the American Mercury—more for the music itself than its performance. We imagine him a rather lenient director of rehearsals. But he has achieved remarkable results. The Boston Band has taken inspiration from his almost fanatical devotion to the music from his progressive spirit.

Another phase of Monteux's term as conductor of the Boston Symphony calling for attention lies in his flair for programs. I have often remarked upon the expertness with which he selects and groups his works, at the courageous strides into the regions of modern music, and of the unfamiliar, not only from contemporary sources, but from among the classics. "Sacre du Printemps," the great score of Igor Strawinsky, was first performed in New York under his direction at one of the Thursday evening concerts of the present season, and repeated by request at a Saturday matinee. Not only Strawinsky, but Ravel, Bax, de Falla and many others owe first American performances to Monteux.

As a conductor he is at all times admirable, though less happy in regions of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms than in the music of his countrymen, Debussy and Ravel. To hear the "Nocturnes," or the "Prelude à l'apres-midi d'un faune" under his baton is an experience, and New York, as well as Boston, will wait long before it hears these familiar works played in so splendid a fashion.

THE last Thursday evening concert under Monteux's baton took place a week ago today. The program was made up of the third Leonora Overture of Beethoven, Chopin's Piano Concerto in E minor, played by Moriz Rosenthal, and the Franck Symphony in D minor. The reading of Franck's noble music was particularly notable: Beethoven less so. Much more at home was Monteux in Scriabine's "Divine Poem" and a de Falla novelty, presented at the following Saturday matinee.

Rosenthal played the Chopin concerto brilliantly, though it is a thin and uninteresting work. His extreme virtuosity would be better suited to Liszt or even Tchaikowsky than to this rather anemic work of the greatest of all piano composers.

Mr. Monteux's departure is greatly regretted. He leaves a lasting memory, an undeniable impression as an orchestral conductor. His successor, Serge Koussewitsky, comes to Boston next season with a brilliant Continental reputation, and into his hands Monteux delivers an orchestra far superior to any that Koussewitsky may have directed abroad.

The Emotionalist.

BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS

Music Notes.

Among the musical attractions promised Buffalo for next season are the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its new conducter, Sergei Koussivitski; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who has enjoyed sensational success this season and who, at this early date is booked for 40 appearances next year; Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, pianists; Dusolina Giannini, the young Italian soprano, who won many admirers at her recent local appearance, and Myra Hess, the noted English pianist for whom Buffalo music lovers have been waiting eagerly.

Koussevitzky is completing, or has just completed, his series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He will shortly go to Italy and conduct symphony concerts in Milan and Rome, and to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there. In May he will return to Paris to complete his well-known series of "Koussevitzky Concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Opera. Thence he will probably go to London to conduct a short opera season there before taking his summer vacation. He will sail for American to assume his duties an conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, September 4, on the S. S. Aquitania.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

APR 12 1924

What London Thinks Of Boston's New Leader

The King is dead, long live the King! Boston, having lost Monteux, will next October have a new conductor. He will, of course, preside over the famous orchestra of the Hub when it comes to New York; hence we are all interested. What sort of a conductor is this man, Serge Kussevitzky by name?

London has long known him. Here is an estimate which appeared in Truth, February 14, 1923:

"Last week we had the pleasure of seeing again Serge Kussevitsky conduct the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kussevitsky is undoubtedly one of the greatest conductors living, and there was a notable roll-up at the Queen's Hall of our English conductors—Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Adrian Boult, and Mr. Eugene Goossens, among others.

"The program contained one first rate item, the Brahms Symphony in F (No. 3); one superb show piece, the Tchaikovsky fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini,' and a number of small items such as an orchestral version of a sentimental drawing-room song by Rachmaninoff, described as 'Vocalise.' Mr. Kussevitsky began magnificently with the Tchaikovsky; he simply carried his orchestra away with him in the fiery execution of an astounding bit of carefully planned virtuosity. No one I have heard since Nikisch can get so much out of an orchestra as Mr. Kussevitsky. In the words of an old poet: 'He rides the whirlwind and commands the storm.' After such a performance as the 'Francesca da Rimini' one is left breathless and settles down in one's seat in anticipation of a wonderful evening.

"But on this occasion Mr. Kussevitsky cheated us. I suspect he had concentrated his rehearsing on the Tchaikovsky and on the Raval arrangement of Moussorgsky's 'Picture Show,' which concluded the program. At any rate, I felt that the Brahms performance was being improvised, and that he was relying too much on the orchestra's ability to pick up his intentions as they went along. There was a complete lack of certainty and inevitability about the performance which contrasted strongly with the rendering of the Tchaikovsky work. Moreover, Mr. Kussevitsky's rendering of the Brahms was in itself too Tchaikovskian, too dramatic and overemphasized. There were good moments, but on the whole it was a poor, rhapsodically uneven performance of that fine work, and it gave me very little pleasure."

AT N. Y. DEBUT

Young Conductor From Paris Acclaimed at His Appearance With the New York Symphony Orchestra.

By A. J. Warner.

The few days we recently spent in New York, with the primary object of being present at the concert given by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last Monday, were productive of several particularly interesting experiences musically and dramatically. On last Saturday afternoon we heard the Boston Symphony, conducted by Pierre Monteux, who made his farewell appearance in New York as the leader of that superlative orchestra which is to be in the hands of the "brilliant and irrubrical Muscovite", Sergei Koussevitzsky, next season. Mr. Monteux, who is almost as gifted as a program maker as he is as a drill master, has, during the years of his New England regime, brought the famous Boston band from the state of demoralization in which he found it to a plane of exalted excellence; under his leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the world's greatest orchestras. Indeed, as it played Saturday the question came often to mind whether, after all, America boasted any orchestra, which, in tone and precision of performance, was its equal. Mr. Monteux is not of the ranks of "prima donna conductors", but he is a musician of the keenest intelligence and a stylist par excellence.

Mr. Monteux on Saturday presented a notable program, which comprised Handel's Concerto grosso No. 6, for strings; Scriabin's "Divine Poem"; "Nights In the Gardens of Spain" by Manuel De Falla, most prominent of Spain's younger com-

In as graphic contrast stood the two novel pieces of the day. One was a "Poem for Orchestra," by subtitle "In a Withered Garden" written by Mr. Elliott Schenck, who in his time in New York and elsewhere has discharged creditably many a task as workaday conductor and ready music-maker for pieces of the theatre. By the evidence of the pages now played, he is less credible and creditable as symphonic composer. Commonplace are the course of mood, the play of suggestion through his tone-poem. As uninventive is the matter of his music, as unimaginative and routine the progress and the workmanship. Not to mince words, "In a Withered Garden" is mediocrity little mitigated, seldom veiled. And for mediocrity, be it European or American, there is no place at the Symphony Concerts. Open always they should be—and are—to able and individual music from American pens, but not to certain unforgetable variations of Professor Seth Bingham or to this plodding tone-poem of Mr. Schenck.

For the first time into Bostonian and probably into American, concert-hall came also de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain: Symphonic Impressions for Orchestra and Piano." By memory of the dances from his ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," played under Mr. Monteux in 1921, by the plain evidence of the music of yesterday, de Falla is an acquired, a difficult, but a grateful, pleasure to which the ear must be sharpened and the other perceptive faculties attuned. Not easily or at once do they savor his Spanish music, oftenest, so far as Boston knows it, in rhythms of the dance. Far is it from the conventional Spanish tinsel of opera house and concert-hall; while it draws not too near to the imaginative and more idiomatic Spanish measures of Bizet in "Carmen"; of Wolf in songs and the operatic comedy, "Der Corregidor"; of Rimsky-Korsakov in his "Spanish Caprice." On its own soil it shuns the flashing gauds, the leaping beat, the whirl, glare and flourish of the Spanish dances cultivated by Mr. Copeland and other pianists. The nearest neighbors, in these parts, to this music of Spanish gardens and Spanish nights is Le-

ESTABLISHED 1881
From The Independent
New York City
April 12

Music

By Pitts Sanborn

Stravinsky

ONLY a few short months ago Igor Stravinsky was still the musical terror that walketh by night. At least in so far as we of America are concerned, he was the anti-composer, the headsman and likewise the grave-digger of music. Under his ultimate sentence one of the seven arts, and not the oldest, had wound up its affairs for good and all and ceased to be a going concern. The same sort of thing, it is true, was said about Wagner within memory of men not yet old; and then about Richard Strauss; and then about Debussy. Today Wagner is as much an established classic as Bach, Handel, or Beethoven; nobody now worries over cyanide or bichloride in the oozy molasses of Richard Strauss; Debussy is as deadly as a bolt of watered silk. History has not been close-mouthed to the victims of Stravinskyphobia. But history, notoriously, is Cassandra. Men hear her, and how little do they heed!

The fact is that observers of the musical scene in America have this year witnessed the swift development of a menace into a reputation. The marvel reached a pitch hardly short of the miraculous when on March 27 and 28 Carnegie Hall, New York, housed within the compass of two days four performances of Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," in its symphonic version, all four given under auspices of the very highest regularity and respectability.

The other Stravinsky novelties produced in New York in less than five months have been the folk pantomime of fox, goat, cat, and rooster, called in honor of the first "Renard," done in concert form by the International Composers' Guild; that ballet of spring rites and sacrifice in pagan Russia, "Le Sacre du Printemps," performed as a symphonic poem late in January, and repeated early in March, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux; the so-called "Symphonies" for twenty-three wind instruments in memory of Claude Debussy, brought forward by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski, and "L'Histoire du Soldat," a burlesque on the monotony and fruitlessness of soldiering, presented without scenery or speakers, as a purely instrumental work, at a concert of the League of Composers.

In fairness to American cities other than New York, one should record that Philadelphia, thanks to Mr. Stokowski and its own orchestra, heard "Le Sacre du Printemps" season before last, and that Mr. Monteux had led it in Boston a few days earlier in the month of his first bringing it to New York; and also that Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia anticipated Mr. Damrosch by a few days in doing "Le Chant du Rossignol."

The case of the "Sacre," though composed over eleven years ago, is the most important, because of all Stravinsky's works to date the most important is still the "Sacre." Now, nearly everything that could conceivably be written about anything has been written about this pagan ballet of the spring. In praise of it the dictionaries have literally been emptied.

If while the rites of Russian spring were raging through the Boston b[illegible]d, a few gentle souls resolutely walked o[illegible]t of Carnegie Hall, their indignation w[illegible]s at least silent, whereas the majority of a[illegible] audience that packed the hall to bursting could not refrain from cheers. And the c[illegible]heers were the verdict.

So in the last weeks of the m[illegible]usic season of 1923–24 Igor Stravinsky fin[illegible]ds himself irrevocably "accepted" in Am[illegible]erica. The recent anarch of the tonal art is the new pillar of its vast cathedral. Some other shocker will now have to be discovered and set up as the target of a musical indignation that must always have an object and an outlet. In any case, Igor Stravinsky is exempt.

Kusevitzky Variously

Mr. Kusevitzky revisited London the other day to lead the London Symphony Orchestra through one of his discoveries—a little eighteenth-century symphony by Boccherini; Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"—a programme conservative enough to soothe the most apprehensive of Bostonian dowagers. The reviewers agreed that Boccherini's piece

REDUCTION

RATIO

19x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

Transcript Oct 14 p. 16

Warm Blood Once Pulsed Within Them

Timely Reminder That Living, Passioned Men Wrote the Classics of Music

THE two recent performances of the Ninth Symphony, under Weingartner and Koussevitsky respectively, have, of course, set people discussing the merits of the two conductors. The facile parasse has been going about [illegible] Times or London) that Weingartner was the more "classical" and Koussevitsky's the more "romantic." What is really meant is that Weingartner was quiet and Koussevitsky was passionate, that Weingartner conformed to a tradition and Koussevitsky made a personal matter of the work. And the question arises, which of the two methods is the better one, the one that does more justice to, and pays most respect to, the intentions of the composer?

I hope I shall not be understood anywhere in this article to be disparaging Weingartner's performance, which, in its way, was a masterpiece and a model. I am only going to urge that Koussevitsky's conception of the symphony is not merely a possible one, but a more probable one than Weingartner's—that is to say, more like what Beethoven meant the work to sound like. "But," it will be objected once more, "the Ninth Symphony is a classic. Beethoven is a classic and Koussevitsky's performance was conceived throughout in the spirit of today. How then can such a performance be true to the composer and to the music?"

Let us ask ourselves, in the first place, what a classic is, and what a "classical" performance is. The noun and the adjective are too often used to give a wrapping of dignity to the commonplace of the dull: as Walter Bache said of some pianist or other, "he is a refined classical player. Angliçé, a wooden-headed brute." You cannot turn the village grocer into a Cato simply by draping a toga round him; and you do not, necessarily get the real Beethoven or Bach by passing him through the mind of some player who has been left unmind of some player who has been left unmoved by all the modern developments of music. But there is, of course, a distinction between this stupid, negative sort of classicism and the classicism of such a performance of a Beethoven symphony as Weingartner gives us and the question is whether this other classicism really shows us the composer as he was.

I venture to surmise that it does not. The fallacy comes from supposing that an artist a century or two ago saw himself as we see him today. The modern classicists have forgotten to allow for the perspective of time. Looking back over a century, we see a small, dim, immobile figure that is hardly distinguishable from the landscape around him. Could we see the figure in its own place and its own time, we would realise that this was a man like ourselves, a man whom the passion, the sadness, the torment of things were pressed cruellies, not idealised abstractions. The classic, in a word, is a classic to us, but he was not a classic to himself; to himself he was a romantic, even though he may have lived in an age that did not know that word. The "classical" old not know that word. The "classical" old Beethoven of tradition is a beautiful figure; but he is not the Beethoven that Beethoven knew.

If composers were wise, they would write only nonchalant music, for that is the music that changes least in the course of the ages. A good dance tune means to the man of today precisely what it meant to the Elizabethan ancestor; but very little of the pathetic or passionate music of three hundred years ago means for us of today what it meant to the men who wrote it and the men who first heard it. We may take it that these fellows were of the same flesh and blood as ourselves, that they felt an emotion like that of love at least as keenly as we do, and that their love music was, to them, as passionate as our love music is to us. But their love music is not passionate to us; were it not for the words, we should not even know, in many cases, that passion was at the root of the music: time has thinned the blood of their songs and paled their colors. We sing or listen to these songs today calmly, detachedly, as we might look at some rusted old sword. It was not thus that Romeo sang and Juliet listened. For us, this music is classical music; but the men who wrote it and the men who sang it, the men who lived hard and drank deep and fought for places in the pit at the Globe to see the latest play of Shakspeare or Marlowe, these men were to themselves romantics, not classics.

Let us come down to a later age. There is virtually no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express love as we feel it; and we may be sure that it is only a matter of time for the most passionate of the romantic love music to come to seem as unreal, as remote to us, as the love music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries does to us. Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" (from "Paris and Helen") was, we may safely say, conceived by him, and accepted by his singers and his hearers, as a cry from a heart hot with the realities of things. To us it is something remote, shadowy, almost ghostly: we admire the beautiful turns of the melody, but no modern heart-throb has ever struck his breast [illegible] and said, "Yes, this is love as I feel it, and as I know, Paris felt it for Helen." We can understand a Tristan and an Isolde feeling as they do, crushing to ruin themselves and dragging others with them. We can still understand Schubert's Gretchen swooning at the memory of Faust's kiss. But by no effort of the imagination can we conceive of a man and woman who felt only as Gluck's Paris and Helen feel bringing destruction upon themselves and the world.

Yet Gluck, we may be pretty sure, saw his Paris and Helen thus, and so did his audience. Young lovers in that audience saw themselves in this Paris and this Helen, just as young lovers of twenty years ago saw themselves in Schumann's songs. We today see only bloodless wraiths in Gluck's hero and heroine, and it can hardly be doubted that in another generation or two the love music of Schumann will seem as ghostly—a mere historical curiosity like Cacolni's "Amarilli," sweet to the ear, but raising no storm in the soul. A generation or two after that, the blood will be out of Wolf's passion; the tempest of passion in the "Oehi, Geliebter, geh' fort" or the "Erstes Liebesfeil eines Mädchens" will be like the sighing of a ghostly wind in a ghostly garden. And, marvellously enough, exciting as is the nervous vitality of "Tristan," that too, sooner or later, will charm the imagination without quickening the pulse or raising the emotional temperature —it will go the way of "Amarilli," and "Care selve ben," and "Bist du bei mir," and the love songs of Handel and "O del mio dolce ardor."

All music, in fact, without a performer of genius, or, when we read the score for ourselves, without full imaginative sympathy on our part, is merely the filament without the current—or rather a network of filaments. The network may have a beauty and an interest of its own, the beauty of a fine pattern; but without the current it does not glow, and if we are going to suppose that it did no glow for the old composer who made it we are committing ourselves to the very doubtful proposition that the human heart and the human nerves in those days were different things from the heart and nerves of today.

Continued on Page Eight

WARM BLOOD

Continued from Page Eight

Romain Rolland has made the profound suggestion that a good deal of Palestrina's music, especially in the motets and responses, is essentially dramatic; these pieces are "drames intimes." "Only those who have never read these works," says Rolland, "can believe that music owed its dramatic expressiveness to the literary efforts of the archeologists at the end of the nineteenth century." Few people can now hear, or want to hear, anything dramatic in Palestrina; but, we today probably hear in his music some things he did not hear, and fail to hear other things that to him were vital. So, too, with the dramatic impression that other ancient music sometimes yields. For once the tissue is not now cold filament, but filament raised to something like its original incandescence.

[illegible] departure. If we accept Rolland's dictum that every classic was a romantic in its own day, have we not to revise our own opinion as to what constitutes a "classical" reading of an old piece? I put it forward not as a paradox, but as a sober theory, that of the two performances we have recently had of the Ninth Symphony, Weingartner's was the fanciful romantic and Koussevitsky's both the true romantic and the classical. And this for reasons that may perhaps seem, at first sight, a little paradoxical. Beethoven's music, we know, was torn from him in convulsions, and any reading that turns the volcano in eruption that his soul was when writing such a work as the Ninth Symphony into a smooth and placid green hillock seems to me a wrong reading. Weingartner, the supposed "classical" conductor, in fact romanticises Beethoven. He sees him not as he was, but in a diminishing perspective, with all his violent passions softened by time, his big [illegible] to [illegible] tension. Weingartner's [illegible] is [illegible] in reality, only a fictitious romantic. Koussevitsky sees Beethoven very much as we may be sure, as Beethoven felt when he wrote the [illegible] Koussevitsky's reading, that is to say, is the genuine "classical" reading, because it sees the classic as the classic saw himself. But as the classic saw himself as a romantic, this genuine classicism of performance, in contrast with the fictitious classicism of Germania tradition, makes of the Ninth Symphony, as [illegible] did first, what it was in 1824—a romantic work, a romantic, but a Beethovenian romantic, not the embalmed romantic of tradition. Pass the right electric current through the classic filament and we get romantic light and heat that the classic himself would recognise as his own.

MONDAY TRANSCRIPT
Iron and Steel News

Herald Mar 31

ORCHESTRA PLAYS NINTH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Students in Voice Parts

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux produced Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in honor of the 106th anniversary of its first performance, preceded by the Fidelio overture. The voice parts of the last movement were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and Marie Sundelius, soprano; Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. The demand for seats was so great, as everybody knows, that a repetition of the concert was promptly arranged for the evening, and that, too, was immediately sold out.

There is a fund in Vienna that provides for an annual performance of the "ninth Symphony by the Philharmonic orchestra. The bequest, plausibly meant as a surprise, have been judicious. If a had the Ninth Symphony, or any other symphony, as a matter of course, in Boston every year, there would have, by the gala spirit to be felt yesterday in the air. One did not walk far on Huntington avenue without recognizing them was something unusual afoot. There were throngs hurrying briskly toward Symphony hall. Many bore with scores in their hands, and old people who had heard the symphony many times, and young people who had never heard the chorus at all, alike seemed astir with excitement. Expectancy gave way to enthusiasm when Mr. Monteux came in to face a crowded hall, and the enthusiasm grew livelier and livelier till the end, when Mr. Monteux, and Dr. Davison (whom Mr. Monteux summoned to share the applause) were greeted with acclaim that lasted long.

Such enthusiasm could never be if we heard the Ninth Symphony every year. It cannot exist for any work, however great, we hear too often. Since enthusiasm that rouses is the breath of life of musical performance, as routine is the canker that finally kills, why not withdraw from the current repertory certain classic works and let them rest, unheard until, quasi-novelties, they can be studied and heard anew with something of the freshness that comes from unfamiliarity?

Of the performance yesterday there is room to say little. The applause grew warmer after each movement, till, at the close of the adagio, Mr. Monteux had the orchestra rise to share it. The chorus covered themselves and Dr. Davison with glory. Not once did they falter or lose the pitch even on cruelly high notes unmercifully held, nor did they let their bright, youthful tone quality suffer. With stirring spirit, too, they sang, the spirit of Schiller's poem —when or where, one may ask, has this lyric music been more successfully sung?

R. G.

Mar 31

TWO PERFORMANCES OF CHORAL SYMPHONY

Masterpiece's Centennial Fittingly Honored

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the aid of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and four solo singers, gave two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony yesterday afternoon and evening. Symphony Hall was crowded to capacity for both concerts, which had been sold out weeks in advance.

The pension fund for retired members of the orchestra must have profited by a large sum, since the entire receipts were [illegible] and expenses [illegible] Mr. Monteux, who conducted, was applauded with exceptional warmth. Never before has he given here so brilliant an interpretation of a great classic symphony.

The centennial anniversary of the first performance of the Choral Symphony, which occurred at Vienna May 7, 1824, was fittingly honored. If the Choral Symphony could be repeated during music week, May 4 to 10, considerable dignity would be added to the [illegible] varyingly schedule now proposed.

The Ninth Symphony stands alone. No other work by Beethoven and nothing written before or since by another composer has close imaginative kinship with it. Only the romantic lyricism of the adagio recalls any other Beethoven slow movements. The first movement is the most perfectly constructed and the noblest of all symphony first movements. The scherzo is the most amazing scherzo yet composed.

The finale, with its agonizing effort to express the inexpressible, is like a torso of Michelangelo. It is almost unimaginable, scattered and fragmentary. The moods shift from the lithe community of the tenor solo to the intense awe of the choral setting of the words, "O'er the stars rise [illegible] pavilions."

Those to whom music offers a world in itself where "all is order and beauty" will prefer the instrumental introduction of this symphony to its finale. But Beethoven chose the music for Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which is the text of that finale, a recapitulation of the chief themes of the instrumental movements, from which the voices recitative: "Friends, no tones sublime as it sing together of human fellowship." His impulse was ethical, not primarily esthetic. In his own life there had been [illegible] much pain and trouble. He would in this, his most ambitious work, exalt joy and human brotherhood. To this aim he consciously sacrifices the unity, the formal purity, of the first three movements. Imperfect as this finale is, one feels in it the power of few great triumphs of human imagination.

Mr Monteux conducted with sedulous endeavor to follow the broad outlines of the work. He sought to make its emotional meaning clear and poignant to every hearer. His self-effacing skill and pains contributed notably to a memorable performance. With the overture to "Fidelio," prefixed to the symphony, he was also unusually successful.

The chorus, trained by Mr Davison, who shared in the applause at the end, made a valiant and impressive attempt to do justice to music that in its original form is nearly unsingable. The soloists, Mmes Sundelius and Squires, and Messrs Stratton and Patton, whose parts are even more exacting than those for the voices, also did as well as could be expected. The audience was obviously deeply impressed and enthusiastic in its admiration of both music and performers.

F. S.

Trans Mar 29

Symphony

SYMPHONY RENEWED, UNUSUAL SPANIARD, DOUBLE CONTRASTS

MR. MONTEUX FALLS SHORT WITH CHAIKOVSKY

Tame and Pallid Performance of "The Pathetic" — Chabrier Glorified, Heroic and Wagnerian — An American Comes and Goes—De Falla for Discovery and Acquired Taste—Sobriety, Simplicity, Directness

ONCE more, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the proof stood clear and plain for all conductors is Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." Of old, Dr. Muck fell far short of it. In the present Mr. Monteux draws no nearer. Probably the truth is that it exacts a particular temperament, a particular method in the enhancing and imparting director. For ample spoken "The Pathetic" bids conductor and orchestra lay on and spare not. There is no record of Chaikovsky's own way with it in the concert-hall; but by many an internal evidence he relied much upon the revelation and the emphasis of performance. Recall the unforgettable melody for the entrance and progress of which nearly the whole orchestra is enrolled; which recurs at the end of the First Movement; which for an instant re-crosses the Finale. Obviously, it is melody to be intensified to the utmost—voice of wistful longing and haunting regret, voice as well of sheer musical beauty. Too obviously Mr. Monteux prepared the entrance. Far too, tamely he and the orchestra set to the singing. Too slow had been his pace, too thin-spread his tone through the sombre beginning of the Symphony. Once clear of the songful theme, to no frenzy did he mount with the tortured Chaikovsky flailing the air of memory.

The March Movement aside, as deficient and disappointing was Mr. Monteux's version of the remainder of the Symphony. As his pace was too slow in the first division, so in the second it was too fast, and "the waltz that never waltzes" went syncopated way, untroubled by gnawing mood, unpursued by vague but carking dread. Even in the March-Scherzo, energetic and rhythmic as he was, the conductor fell far short of the frenetic mounting and re-mounting of the music, of the agonizing vehemence that should ceaselessly drive and sharpen and modulate. No black despair mantled the Finale, no pang of oblivion pierced it; the celebrated clash of the cymbals was as the whisper, not the crack, of doom. It is hard to recall any music that under Mr. Monteux's baton has sounded so attenuated, pale and relatively insignificant.

If Dr. Muck, as the saying was, "got all the accents wrong," Mr. Monteux missed most of them altogether. In both instances source and cause, explanation and excuse are one and the same: lack of instrumental sympathy, want of emotional understanding. In the "Pathetic Symphony" the full-fraught conductor must saturate himself with Chaikovsky haunted, obsessed, frenzied, by dread consumed and overwhelmed. Then he must wring out every measure; pierce with every pause or transition; cut to the quick with accent or modulation; drain dry each source of beauty, who could recall dread and desolation in music of power. The dancer may listen at each return of that songful theme; the heart flow as it unfolds, since one of its beauty springs a universal emotion. The checked beat of the second movement, the thud, thud, thud of the interposing drum, may seem the eclipse and doom of human desire. But under the conductor who will and accomplishes, Chaikovsky merely whines and tortures him elf in public, pricked with a perverse pleasure.

Frenzy in the march must charge and charge again at the soaring wails of oblivion, or else it is the mere tonal surge and crash of a military band, that the audience clapped and clapped again yesterday. To an oblivion of anger Wagner wrote the music, when Tristan and Isolde sing and the orchestra sounds across the garden. To an oblivion of agony Wagner wrote the music in the Finale of "The Pathetic"—and only the conductor will release the voice and the passion. Otherwise [illegible] casure, as one who would dispense an [illegible]ful. Penetrated and transmitted, "The Pathetic" is a symphony to be listened to [illegible]ly the heart at each re-hearing. [illegible]rimmed and nearly polished. It invites the contempt of those who profess to believe [illegible]t the drool of drear the auto-intoxication of sentimental hysterics.

The surprise, disappointment and disillusion over Mr. Monteux's version of the Symphony seemed the keener beside his veritable glorification, at the end of the concert, of Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The piece is cut-Wagnerian pattern after the manner of [illegible] parve's grave and mordant opera, "La [illegible]eighties.

Rather it takes over a method and purposes a style; while throughout and to this day, Chabrier's errors whip and sting it. Left to itself, it is still effective and efficient in its detachment. Under Mr. Monteux contemplated Chaikovsky of "The Pathetic"; whereas quick of mind enthralled composers in the Parisian [illegible] and warm of heart, he embraced Chabrier of "Gwendoline." The introduction to the overture smote and clanged with Viking swords. The end chanted full-throated the anthem of Valhalla. Between rose and fell measures of longing, measures of fate. Again the moral is written. Unless a music be impregnable masterpiece, by virtue or shortcoming performance may make clear it. From Mr. Monteux's loins [illegible] the epical Chabrier

Sobrieties

Manuel de Falla

Spanish Composer, New to the Symphony Concerts

(From Messrs. Chesters' "Miniature Xses

Soberly, compactly, sparingly, de Falla writes, as one who is no tonal spendthrift, who has assorted, assimilated, selected. He is neither academic nor impressionistic, of the oldest or of the newest fashion. Out of himself, out of Spanish store, out of the materia musica common to our time, he weaves his measures. He writes with a sensitive mind and hand upon harmonies, timbres, modulations, rhythms and contours. He seems to prefer direct expression by simple means. Above all, he is instinct with gravity of feeling, imagery, expression, transforming to his own nature, subduing to his individual will, whatever he may choose from the common musical stock of Spain.

Thus, these "impresiones" gathered on the slopes above Granada or on Cordovan mountainsides are no night-pieces, haunted and perfumed, pulsing with the sound and stir of life, after the manner of Debussy's "Ibaris." No more are they ornate and ardent rhapsodies for orchestra, and piano displayfully mated and parted. Rather, they are music of sensations remembered—calm and solitude and stillness; the rhythmic energy of distant dance drawing nearer and larger; the luminous darkness enfolding flower and shrub and fountain, the living [illegible] of southern nights. Poignant is the mood, with all de Falla's gravity. Often it generates a sober beauty within and upon the music. Always grace of motion informs and animates it. To the instrumental voices de Falla adds the timbre of the piano; to the pattern its garlands and arabesques. With discernment Mr. Monteux and Mr. Gebhard caught the mood and the quality. With skill they kept the balance.

H. T. F.

TRANSCRIPT April 16

Warm Blood Once Pulsed Within Them

Timely Reminder That Living, Passioned Men Wrote the Classics of Music

[illegible] great performance [illegible] Symphony, under Wilhelm Furtwängler, and Koussevitzky sings the [illegible] comes, not people about. This [illegible] for [illegible] condemns [illegible] been going on. The [illegible] Seidl and Neuman in the [illegible] Beethoven's the hero of the week. What is really meant is the Wolfgartner way quite [illegible] Wolfgartner, [illegible] Wolfgartner, adorned in a tradition all [illegible] made a two-fold matter. [illegible] was [illegible] Wolfgartner [illegible] the [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] Wolfgartner [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] Wolfgartner [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] Wolfgartner

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Transcript Apr 1 14

Warm Blood Once Pulsed Within Them

Timely Reminder That Living, Passioned Men Wrote the Classics of Music

THE two recent performances of the Ninth Symphony, under Weingartner and Koussevitzky respectively, have, of course, set people discussing the methods of the two conductors. The facile phrase has been going about [writes Ernest Neuman in the Times of London] that Weingartner was quiet and Koussevitzky was passionate, that the more "classical" reading, and Koussevitzky's the more "romantic." What is really meant is that Weingartner conformed to a tradition and Koussevitzky made a personal matter of the work. And the question arises, which of the two methods is the better one, the one that does more justice to, and pays most respect to, the intentions of the composer?

I hope I shall not be understood anywhere in this article to be disparaging Weingartner's performance, which, in its way, was a masterpiece and a model. I am only going to urge that Koussevitzky's conception of the symphony is not merely a possible one, but a more probable one than Weingartner's—that is to say, more like what Beethoven meant the work to sound like. "But," it will be objected once more, "the Ninth Symphony is a classic, Beethoven is a classic and Koussevitzky's performance was conceived throughout in the spirit of today. How then can such a performance be true to the composer and to the music?"

Let us ask ourselves, in the first place, what a classic is, and what a "classical" performance is. The noun and the adjective are too often used to give a wrapping of dignity to the commonplace of the dull: as Walter Bache said of some pianist or other, "he is a refined classical player, Anglicé, a wooden-headed brute." You cannot turn the village grocer into a Cato simply by draping a toga round him; and you do not necessarily get the real Beethoven or Bach by passing him through the mind of some player who has been left untouched by all the modern developments of music. But there is, of course, a distinction between this stupid, negative sort of classicism and the classicism of such a performance of a Beethoven symphony as Weingartner gives us and the question is whether this other and better classicism really shows us the composer as he was.

I venture to surmise that it does not. The fallacy comes from supposing that an artist of a century or two ago saw himself as we see him today. The modern classicists have forgotten to allow for the perspective of time. Looking back over a century, we see a small, dim, immobile figure that is hardly distinguishable from the landscape around him. Could we see the figure in its own place and its own time, we would realize that this was a man like ourselves, a man whom the passion, the sadness, the torment of things were present realities, not idealized abstractions. The classic, in a word, is a classic to us, but he was not a classic to himself; to himself he was a romantic, even though he may have lived in an age that did not know that word. The "classical" Beethoven of tradition is a beautiful figure; but he is not the Beethoven that Beethoven knew.

If composers were wise, they would write only nonchalant music, for that is the music that changes least in the course of the ages. A good dance tune means to the man of today precisely what it meant to his Elizabethan ancestor; but very little of the pathetic or passionate music of three hundred years ago means for us of today what it meant to the men who wrote it and the men who first heard it. We may take it that these fellows were of the same flesh and blood as ourselves, that they felt an emotion like that of love at least as keenly as we do, and that their love music was, to them, as passionate as our love music is to us. But their love music is not passionate to us; were it not for the words, we should not even know, in many cases, that passion was at the root of the music; time has thinned the blood of their songs and paled their colors. We sing or listen to these songs today calmly, detachedly, as we might look at some rusted old sword. It was not thus that Romeo sang and Juliet listened. For us, this music is classical music; but the men who wrote it and the men who sang it, the men who lived hard and drank deep and fought for places in the pit at the Globe to see the latest play of Shakspeare or Marlowe, these men were to themselves romantics, not classics.

Let us come down to a later age. There is virtually no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express love as we feel it; and we may be sure that it is only a matter of time for the most passionate of the romantic love music to come to seem as unreal, as remote, as the love music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries does to us. Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" (from "Paris and Helen") was, we may safely say, conceived by him, and accepted by his singers and his hearers, as a cry from a heart hot with the realities of things. To us it is something remote, shadowy, almost ghostly; we admire the beautiful turns of the melody, but no modern hearer of it has ever struck his breast and said, "Yes, this is love as I feel it, and as, I know, Paris felt it for Helen." We can understand a Tristan and an Isolde, feeling as they do, crashing to ruin themselves and dragging others with them. We can still understand Schubert's Gretchen swooning at the memory of Faust's kiss. But by no effort of the imagination can we conceive of a man and woman who felt only as Gluck's Paris and Helen feel

Herald Mar 31

ORCHESTRA PLAYS NINTH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Students in Voice Parts

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Smphony orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux produced Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in honor of the 100th anniversary of its first performance, preceded by the Fidelio overture. The voice parts of the last movement were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and Marie Sundelius, soprano Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. The demand for seats was so great, as everybody knows, that a repetition of the concert was promptly arranged for the evening, and the house was immediately sold out.

There is a fund in Vienna that provides for an annual performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Philharmonic orchestra. The bequest, piously meant, can scarcely have been judicious. If we had the Ninth Symphony, or any other symphony, as a matter of course, in Boston every year, there would hardly be the gala spirit to be felt yesterday in the air. One did not walk far on Huntington avenue without recognizing there was something unusual forward. There were throngs hurrying briskly toward Symphony hall, many persons with scores in their hands, and old people who had heard the symphony many times, and young people who had never heard the chorus at all, alike seemed astir with excitement. Expectancy gave way to enthusiasm when Mr. Monteux came in to face a crowded hall, and the enthusiasm grew livelier and livelier till the end, when Mr. Monteux, and Dr. Davison (whom Mr. Monteux summoned to share the applause) were greeted with acclaim that lasted long.

Such enthusiasm could never be if we heard the Ninth Symphony every year. It cannot exist for any work, however great, we hear too often. Since enthusiasm that rouses is the breath of life of musical performance, as routine is the canker that finally kills, why not withdraw from the current repertory certain classic works and let them rest unheard until, quasi-novelties, they can be studied and heard anew with something of the freshness that comes from unfamiliarity?

Of the performance yesterday there is room to say little. The applause grew warmer after each movement, till, at the close of the adagio, Mr. Monteux had the orchestra rise to share it. The chorus covered themselves and Dr. Davison with glory. Not once did they falter or lose the pitch even on cruelly high notes unmercifully held, nor did they let their bright, youthful tone quality suffer. With stirring spirit, too, they sang, the spirit of Schiller's poem—when or where, one may ask, has this trying music been more successfully sung?

R. R. G.

Globe Mar 31

TWO PERFORMANCES OF CHORAL SYMPHONY

Masterpiece's Centennial Fittingly Honored

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the aid of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and four solo singers, gave two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony yesterday afternoon and evening. Symphony Hall was crowded to capacity for both concerts, which had been sold out weeks in advance.

The pension fund for retired members of the orchestra must have profited by a large sum, since the entire proceeds were for that purpose, and expenses were few. Pierre Monteux, who conducted, was applauded with exceptional warmth. Never before has he given here so brilliant an interpretation of a great classic symphony.

The centennial anniversary of the first performance of the Ninth Symphony, which occurred at Vienna May 7, 1824, was fittingly honored. If the Choral Symphony could be repeated during music week, May 4 to 10, considerable dignity would be added to the rather variegated schedule now proposed.

The Ninth Symphony stands alone. No other work by Beethoven and nothing written before or since by another composer has close imaginative kinship with it. Only the romantic lyricism of the adagio recalls other Beethoven slow movements. The first movement is the most perfectly constructed and the noblest of all symphony first movements. The scherzo is the most amazing scherzo yet composed.

The choral finale, with its agonizing effort to express the inexpressible, is like a torso by Michelangelo. It is almost unsingable, scattered and ejaculatory. The moods shift in it from the blithe comradeship of the tenor solo to the intense awe of the choral setting of the words, "O'er the stars rise His pavilions." Those to whom music offers a world in itself where "all is order and beauty" will prefer the instrumental movements of this symphony to its finale. But Beethoven chose to prefix to Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which is the text of that finale, a recapitulation of the chief themes of the instrumental movements, followed by the baritone recitative, "Friends, not these tones, but let us sing together of human fellowship."

His impulse was ethical, not primarily esthetic. In his own life there had been far too much pain and solitude. He would in this, his most ambitious work, exalt joy and human brotherhood. To this aim he consciously sacrifices the unity, the formal perfection of the first three movements. Imperfect as this finale is, one feels it as among the few great triumphs of human imagination.

Mr Monteux conducted with sedulous endeavor to follow the broad outlines of the work. He sought to make its emotional meaning clear and poignant to every hearer. His self-effacing skill and pains contributed notably to a memorable performance. With the overture to "Fidelio," prefixed to the symphony, he was also unusually successful.

The chorus, trained by Mr Davison, who shared in the applause at the end, made a valiant and impressive attempt to cope with music that in its original key is nearly unsingable. The soloists, Mmes Sundelius and Squire, and Messrs Stratton and Patton, whose parts are even more mercilessly written for voices, also did as well as could be expected. The audience was obviously deeply impressed and enthusiastic in its admiration of both music and performers.

P. R.

Trans Mar 29

Symphony

SYMPHONY RENEWED, UNUSUAL SPANIARD, DOUBLE CONTRASTS

MR. MONTEUX FALLS SHORT WITH CHAIKOVSKY

Tame and Pallid Performance of "The Pathetic" — Chabrier Glorified, Heroic and Wagnerian — An American Comes and Goes—De Falla for Discovery and Acquired Taste—Sobriety, Simplicity, Directness

ONCE more, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the proof stood clear. Not for all conductors is Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." Of old, Dr. Muck fell far short of it. In the present Mr. Monteux draws no nearer. Probably the truth is that it exacts a particular temperament, a particular method in the enhancing and imparting director. For by ample token "The Pathetic" bids conductor and orchestra lay on and spare not. There is no record of Chaikovsky's own way with it in the concert-hall; but by many an internal evidence he relied much upon the revelation and the emphasis of performance. Recall the unforgettable melody for the entrance and progress of which nearly the whole orchestra is stilled; which recurs at the end of the First Movement; which for an instant re-crosses the Finale. Obviously, it is melody to be intensified to the utmost—voice of wistful longing and haunting regret, voice as well of sheer musical beauty. Too obviously Mr. Monteux prepared the entrance. Far too, tamely he and the orchestra set to the singing. Too slow had been his pace, too thin-spread his tone through the sombre beginning of the Symphony. Once clear of the songful theme, to no frenzy did he mount with the tortured Chaikovsky flailing the air of memory.

The March Movement aside, as deficient and disappointing was Mr. Monteux's version of the remainder of the Symphony. As his pace was too slow in the first division, so in the second it was too fast, and "the waltz that never waltzes" went syncopated way, untroubled by gnawing mood, unpursued by vague but carking dread. Even in the March-Scherzo, energetic and rhythmic as he was, the conductor fell far short of the frenetic mounting and re-mounting of the music, of the agonizing vehemence that should ceaselessly drive and sharpen and modulate. No black despair mantled the Finale, no pang of oblivion pierced it; the celebrated clash of the cymbals was as the whisper, not the crack, of doom. It is hard to recall any music that under Mr. Monteux's hand has sounded so attenuated, pale and relatively insignificant.

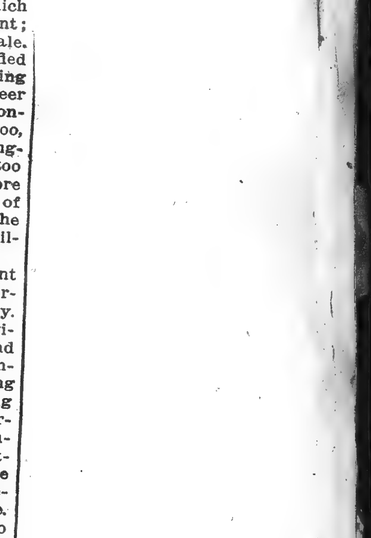
If Dr. Muck, as the saying was, "got all the accents wrong," Mr. Monteux missed most of them altogether. In both instances source and cause, explanation and excuse are one and the same: lack of temperamental sympathy, want of emotional understanding. In the "Pathetic Symphony" the full-fraught conductor must saturate himself with Chaikovsky haunted, obsessed, frenzied, by dread consumed and overwhelmed. Then he must wring out every measure; pierce with every pause or transition; cut to the quick with accent or modulation; drain dry each climax. More than beat must spur performance. Music for the Mengelbergs, the Schnéevoigts, the Kusevitzkys, is "The Pathetic." Of another mind and mettle are the Mucks and the Monteuxs; while as abounding and susceptible an instrument as the Boston Orchestra will no more than answer to him that plays upon it.

For worse consequence, "The Pathetic" played but tamely, seems to upturn the maundering and self-pitying Chaikovsky, not the Chaikovsky who could recollect longing and regret in music of beauty, who could recall dread and desolation in music of power. The throat may tighten at each return of that songful theme; the heart slow as it unfolds, since out of its beauty springs a universal emotion. The checked beat of the second movement, the thud, thud, thud of the interposing drum, may seem the eclipse and doom of human desire. But unless the conductor thus wills and accomplishes, Chaikovsky merely whines and tortures himself in public, pricked with a perverse pleasure.

Frenzy in the march must charge and charge again at the closing walls of oblivion, or else it is the mere tonal surge and rhythmical excitement that the audience clapped and clapped again yesterday. To an oblivion of ecstasy Wagner wrote the music, when Tristan and Isolde sing and the orchestra sounds across the garden. To an oblivion of annihilation Chaikovsky wrote the music in the Finale of "The Pathetic"—if only the conductor will release the voice and the passion. Otherwise Chaikovsky "glooms" and postures, without measure, as one who would dispense an awful. Penetrated and transmitted, "The Pathetic" is music to haunt the mind and stay the heart at each re-hearing. Skimmed and merely polished, it invites the contempt of those who profess to believe it the drool of dread, the auto-intoxication of sentimental hysterics.

The surprise, disappointment and disillusion over Mr. Monteux's version of the Symphony seemed the keener beside his veritable glorification, at the end of the concert, of Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The piece is cut to Wagnerian pattern after the manner of enthralled composers in the Parisian eighties. It does not imitate specifically. Rather it takes over a method and pursues a style; while throughout and to this day, Chabrier's own fervors whip and heat it. Left to itself, it is still effective and effulgent theatre-music. In detachment, Mr. Monteux contemplated Chaikovsky of "The Pathetic"; whereas quick of mind and warm of heart, he embraced Chabrie of "Gwendoline." The introduction to th overture smote and clanged with Viking swords. The end chanted full-throated the anthem of Valhalla. Between rose and fell measures of longing, measures of fate. Again the moral is written. Unless a music be impregnable masterpiece, by virtue or shortcoming performance may make or mar it. From Mr. Monteux's loins g this epical Chabrier.

Sobrieties



Manuel de Falla

Spanish Composer, New to the Symphony Concerts

(From Messrs. Chesters' "Miniature Esse

parra's grave and Habanera."

Soberly, compacti writes, as one wh thrift, who has ass lected. He is neit pressionistic, of the fashion. Out of h store, out of the m to our time, he wea writes with a sens upon harmonies, rhythms and contou fer direct expressio Above all, he is in feeling, imagery, ex to his own nature, dividual will, what from the common m

Thus, these "impr the slopes above Gre mountainside are no and perfumed, pulsin stir of life, after the "Iberia." No more ardent rhapsodies for displayfully mated they are music of sen calm and solitude and mic energy of dist nearer and larger; t enfolding flower and the throb and myster Poignant is the mood gravity. Often it gen within and upon the of motion informs a the instrumental voice timbre of the piano; t lands and arabesques Mr. Monteux and Mr. mood and the quality. the balance.

Transcript April 14

Warm Blood Once Pulsed Within Them

Timely Reminder That Living, Passioned Men Wrote the Classics of Music

THE two recent performances of the Ninth Symphony, under Weingartner and Koussevitzky respectively, have, of course, set people discussing the methods of the two conductors. The facile phrase has been going about [writes Ernest Neuman in the Times of London] that Weingartner's was the more "classical" reading, and Koussevitzky's the more "romantic." What is really meant is that Weingartner was quiet and Koussevitzky was passionate, that Weingartner conformed to a tradition and Koussevitzky made a personal matter of the work. And the question arises, which of the two methods is the better one, the one that does more justice to, and pays most respect to, the intentions of the composer?

I hope I shall not be understood anywhere in this article to be disparaging Weingartner's performance, which, in its way, was a masterpiece and a model. I am only going to urge that Koussevitzky's conception of the symphony is not merely a possible one, but a more probable one than Weingartner's—that is to say, more like what Beethoven meant the work to sound like. "But," it will be objected once more, "the Ninth Symphony is a classic. Beethoven is a classic and Koussevitzky's performance was conceived throughout in the spirit of today. How then can such a performance be true to the composer and to the music?"

Let us ask ourselves, in the first place, what a classic is, and what a "classical" performance is. The noun and the adjective are too often used to give a wrapping of dignity to the commonplace of the dull: as Walter Bache said of some pianist or other, "he is a refined classical player, Anglicé, a wooden-headed brute." You cannot turn the village grocer into a Cato simply by draping a toga round him; and you do not necessarily get the real Beethoven or Bach by passing him through the mind of some player who has been left untouched by all the modern developments of music. But there is, of course, a distinction between this stupid, negative sort of classicism and the classicism of such a performance of a Beethoven symphony as Weingartner gives us and the question is whether this other and better classicism really shows us the composer as he was.

I venture to surmise that it does not. The fallacy comes from supposing that an artist of a century or two ago saw himself as we see him today. The modern classicists have forgotten to allow for the perspective of time. Looking back over a century, we see a small, dim, immobile figure that is hardly distinguishable from the landscape around him. Could we see the figure in its own place and its own time, we would realize that this was a man like ourselves, a man whom the passion, the sadness, the torment of things were present realities, not idealized abstractions. The classic, in a word, is a classic to us, but he was not a classic to himself; to himself he was a romantic, even though he may have lived in an age that did not know that word. The "classical" Beethoven of tradition is a beautiful figure; but he is not the Beethoven that Beethoven knew.

If composers were wise, they would write only nonchalant music, for that is the music that changes least in the course of the ages. A good dance tune means to the man of today precisely what it meant to his Elizabethan ancestor; but very little of the pathetic or passionate music of three hundred years ago means for us of today what it meant to the men who wrote it and the men who first heard it. We may take it that these fellows were of the same flesh and blood as ourselves, that they felt an emotion like that of love at least as keenly as we do, and that their love music was, to them, as passionate as our love music is to us. But their love music is not passionate to us; were it not for the words, we should not even know, in many cases, that passion was at the root of the music; time has thinned the blood of their songs and paled their colors. We sing or listen to these songs today calmly, detachedly, as we might look at some rusted old sword. It was not thus that Romeo sang and Juliet listened. For us, this music is classical music; but the men who wrote it and the men who sang it, the men who lived hard and drank deep and fought for places in the pit at the Globe to see the latest play of Shakespeare or Marlowe, these men were to themselves romantics, not classics.

Let us come down to a later age. There is virtually no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express love as we feel it; and we may be sure that it is only a matter of time for the most passionate of the romantic love music to come to seem as unreal, as remote, as the love music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries does to us. Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" (from "Paris and Helen") was, we may safely say, conceived by him, and accepted by his singers and his hearers, as a cry from a heart hot with the realities of things. To us it is something remote, shadowy, almost ghostly; we admire the beautiful turns of the melody, but no modern hearer of it has ever struck his breast and said, "Yes, this is love as I feel it, and as, I know, Paris felt it for Helen." We can understand a Tristan and an Isolde, feeling as they do, crashing to ruin themselves and dragging others with them. We can still understand Schubert's Gretchen swooning at the memory of Faust's kiss. But by no effort of the imagination can we conceive of a man and woman who felt only as Gluck's Paris and Helen feel entailing destruction upon themselves and the world.

At Gluck, we may be pretty sure, saw

Herald Mar 31

ORCHESTRA PLAYS NINTH SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Students in Voice Parts

For the spring concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Smphony orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux produced Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in honor of the 100th anniversary of its first performance, preceded by the Fidelio overture. The voice parts of the last movement were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and Marie Sundelius, soprano Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. The demand for seats was so great, as everybody knows, that a repetition of the concert was promptly arranged for the evening, and the house was immediately sold out.

There is a fund in Vienna that provides for an annual performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Philharmonic orchestra. The bequest, piously meant, can scarcely have been judicious. If we had the Ninth Symphony, or any other symphony, as a matter of course, in Boston every year, there would hardly be the gala spirit to be felt yesterday in the air. One did not walk far on Huntington avenue without recognizing there was something unusual forward. There were throngs hurrying briskly toward Symphony hall, many persons with scores in their hands, and old people who had heard the symphony many times, and young people who had never heard the chorus at all, alike seemed astir with excitement. Expectancy gave way to enthusiasm when Mr. Monteux came in to face a crowded hall, and the enthusiasm grew livelier and livelier till the end, when Mr. Monteux, and Dr. Davison (whom Mr. Monteux summoned to share the applause) were greeted with acclaim that lasted long.

Such enthusiasm could never be if we heard the Ninth Symphony every year. It cannot exist for any work, however great, we hear too often. Since enthusiasm that rouses is the breath of life of musical performance, as routine is the canker that finally kills, why not withdraw from the current repertory certain classic works and let them rest unheard until, quasi-novelties, they can be studied and heard anew with something of the freshness that comes from unfamiliarity?

Of the performance yesterday there is room to say little. The applause grew warmer after each movement, till, at the close of the adagio, Mr. Monteux had the orchestra rise to share it. The chorus covered themselves and Dr. Davison with glory. Not once did they falter or lose the pitch even on cruelly high notes unmercifully held, nor did they let their bright, youthful tone quality suffer. With stirring spirit, too, they sang, the spirit of Schiller's poem —when or where, one may ask, has this trying music been more successfully sung?

R. R. G.

Globe Mar 31

TWO PERFORMANCES OF CHORAL SYMPHONY

Masterpiece's Centennial Fittingly Honored

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the aid of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and four solo singers, gave two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony yesterday afternoon and evening. Symphony Hall was crowded to capacity for both concerts, which had been sold out weeks in advance.

The pension fund for retired members of the orchestra must have profited by a large sum, since the entire proceeds were for that purpose, and expenses were few. Pierre Monteux, who conducted, was applauded with exceptional warmth. Never before has he given here so brilliant an interpretation of a great classic symphony.

The centennial anniversary of the first performance of the Ninth Symphony, which occurred at Vienna May 7, 1824, was fittingly honored. If the Choral Symphony could be repeated during music week, May 4 to 10, considerable dignity would be added to the rather variegated schedule now proposed.

The Ninth Symphony stands alone. No other work by Beethoven and nothing written before or since by another composer has close imaginative kinship with it. Only the romantic lyricism of the adagio recalls other Beethoven slow movements. The first movement is the most perfectly constructed and the noblest of all symphony first movements. The scherzo is the most amazing scherzo yet composed.

The choral finale, with its agonizing effort to express the inexpressible, is like a torso by Michelangelo. It is almost unsingable, scattered and ejaculatory. The moods shift in it from the blithe comradeship of the tenor solo to the intense awe of the choral setting of the words, "O'er the stars rise His pavilions."

Those to whom music offers a world in itself where "all is order and beauty" will prefer the instrumental movements of this symphony to its finale. But Beethoven chose to prefix to Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which is the text of that finale, a recapitulation of the chief themes of the instrumental movements, followed by the baritone recitative, "Friends, not these tones, but let us sing together of human fellowship."

His impulse was ethical, not primarily esthetic. In his own life there had been far too much pain and solitude. He would in this, his most ambitious work, exalt joy and human brotherhood. To this aim he consciously sacrifices the unity, the formal perfection of the first three movements. Imperfect as this finale is, one feels it as among the few great triumphs of human imagination.

Mr Monteux conducted with sedulous endeavor to follow the broad outlines of the work. He sought to make its emotional meaning clear and poignant to every hearer. His self-effacing skill and pains contributed notably to a memorable performance. With the overture to "Fidelio," prefixed to the symphony, he was also unusually successful.

The chorus, trained by Mr Davison, who shared in the applause at the end, made a valiant and impressive attempt to cope with music that in its original key is nearly unsingable. The soloists, Mmes Sundelius and Squire, and Messrs Stratton and Patton, whose parts are even more mercilessly written for voices, also did as well as could be expected. The audience was obviously deeply impressed and enthusiastic in its admiration of both music and performers.

P. R.

Trans Mar 29

Symphony

SYMPHONY RENEWED, UNUSUAL SPANIARD, DOUBLE CONTRASTS

MR. MONTEUX FALLS SHORT WITH CHAIKOVSKY

Tame and Pallid Performance of "The Pathetic" — Chabrier Glorified, Heroic and Wagnerian — An American Comes and Goes—De Falla for Discovery and Acquired Taste—Sobriety, Simplicity, Directness

ONCE more, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the proof stood clear. Not for all conductors is Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." Of old, Dr. Muck fell far short of it. In the present Mr. Monteux draws no nearer. Probably the truth is that it exacts a particular temperament, a particular method in the enhancing and imparting director. For by ample token "The Pathetic" bids conductor and orchestra lay on and spare not. There is no record of Chaikovsky's own way with it in the concert-hall; but by many an internal evidence he relied much upon the revelation and the emphasis of performance. Recall the unforgettable melody for the entrance and progress of which nearly the whole orchestra is stilled; which recurs at the end of the First Movement; which for an instant re-crosses the Finale. Obviously, it is melody to be intensified to the utmost—voice of wistful longing and haunting regret, voice as well of sheer musical beauty. Too obviously Mr. Monteux prepared the entrance. Far too, tamely he and the orchestra set to the singing. Too slow had been his pace, too thin-spread his tone through the sombre beginning of the Symphony. Once clear of the songful theme, to no frenzy did he mount with the tortured Chaikovsky flailing the air of memory.

The March Movement aside, as deficient and disappointing was Mr. Monteux's version of the remainder of the Symphony. As his pace was too slow in the first division, so in the second it was too fast, and "the waltz that never waltzes" went syncopated way, untroubled by gnawing mood, unpursued by vague but carking dread. Even in the March-Scherzo, energetic and rhythmic as he was, the conductor fell far short of the frenetic mounting and re-mounting of the music, of the agonizing vehemence that should ceaselessly drive and sharpen and modulate. No black despair mantled the Finale, no pang of oblivion pierced it; the celebrated clash of the cymbals was as the whisper, not the crack, of doom. It is hard to recall any music that under Mr. Monteux's hand has sounded so attenuated, pale and relatively insignificant.

If Dr. Muck, as the saying was, "got all the accents wrong," Mr. Monteux missed most of them altogether. In both instances source and cause, explanation and excuse are one and the same: lack of temperamental sympathy, want of emotional understanding. In the "Pathetic Symphony" the full-fraught conductor must saturate himself with Chaikovsky haunted, obsessed, frenzied, by dread consumed and overwhelmed. Then he must wring out every measure; pierce with every pause or transition; cut to the quick with accent or modulation; drain dry each climax. More than beat must spur performance. Music for the Mengelbergs, the Schnéevoigts, the Kusevitzkys, is "The Pathetic." Of another mind and mettle are the Mucks and the Monteuxs; while as abounding and susceptible an instrument as the Boston Orchestra will no more than answer to him that plays upon it.

For worse consequence, "The Pathetic" played but tamely, seems to upturn the maundering and self-pitying Chaikovsky, not the Chaikovsky who could recollect longing and regret in music of beauty, who could recall dread and desolation in music of power. The throat may tighten at each return of that songful theme; the heart slow as it unfolds, since out of its beauty springs a universal emotion. The checked beat of the second movement, the thud, thud, thud of the interposing drum, may seem the eclipse and doom of human desire. But unless the conductor thus wills and accomplishes, Chaikovsky merely whines and tortures himself in public, pricked with a perverse pleasure.

Frenzy in the march must charge and charge again at the closing walls of oblivion, or else it is the mere tonal surge and rhythmical excitement that the audience clapped and clapped again yesterday. To an oblivion of ecstasy Wagner wrote the music, when Tristan and Isolde sing and the orchestra sounds across the garden. To an oblivion of annihilation Chaikovsky wrote the music in the Finale of "The Pathetic"—if only the conductor will release the voice and the passion. Otherwise Chaikovsky "glooms" and postures, without measure, as one who would dispense an earful. Penetrated and transmitted, "The Pathetic" is music to haunt the mind and sway the heart at each re-hearing. Skimmed and merely polished, it invites the contempt of those who profess to believe it the drool of dread, the auto-intoxication of sentimental hysterics.

The surprise, disappointment and disillusion over Mr. Monteux's version of the Symphony seemed the keener beside his veritable glorification, at the end of the concert, of Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The piece is cut to Wagnerian pattern after the manner of enthralled composers in the Parisian eighties. It does not imitate specifically. Rather it takes over a method and pursues a style; while throughout and to this day, Chabrier's own fervors whip and heat it. Left to itself, it is still effective and effulgent theatre-music. In detachment, Mr. Monteux contemplated Chaikovsky of "The Pathetic"; whereas quick of mind and warm of heart, he embraced Chabrier of "Gwendoline." The introduction to the overture smote and clanged with Viking swords. The end chanted full-throated the anthem of Valhalla. Between rose and fell measures of longing, measures of fate. Again the moral is written. Unless a music be impregnable masterpiece, by virtue or shortcoming performance may make or mar it. From Mr. Monteux's loins [illegible] this epical Chabrier.

Sobrieties

Manuel de Falla

Spanish Composer, New to the Symphony Concerts

(From Messrs. Chesters' "Miniature Essa

parra's grave and mordant opera, "La Habanera."

Soberly, compactly, sparingly, de Falla writes, as one who is no tonal spendthrift, who has assorted, assimilated, selected. He is neither academic nor impressionistic, of the oldest or of the newest fashion. Out of himself, out of Spanish store, out of the materia musica common to our time, he weaves his measures. He writes with a sensitive mind and hand upon harmonies, timbres, modulations, rhythms and contours. He seems to prefer direct expression by simple means. Above all, he is instinct with gravity of feeling, imagery, expression, transforming to his own nature, subduing to his individual will, whatever he may choose from the common musical stock of Spain.

Thus, these "impressions" gathered on the slopes above Grenada or on Cordovan mountainside are no night-pieces, lustrous and perfumed, pulsing with the sound and stir of life, after the manner of Debussy's "Iberia." No more are they ornate and ardent rhapsodies for orchestra and piano displayfully mated and parted. Rather, they are music of sensations remembered—calm and solitude and stillness; the rhythmic energy of distant dance drawing nearer and larger; the luminous darkness enfolding flower and shrub and fountain, the throb and mystery of southern nights. Poignant is the mood, with all de Falla's gravity. Often it generates a sober beauty within and upon the music. Always grace of motion informs and animates it. To the instrumental voices de Falla adds the timbre of the piano; to the pattern its garlands and arabesques. With discernment Mr. Monteux and Mr. Gebhard caught the mood and the quality. With skill they kept the balance.

H. T. P.

the pathetic or passionate music of three hundred years ago means for us of today what it meant to the men who wrote it and the men who first heard it. We may take it that these fellows were of the same flesh and blood as ourselves, that they felt an emotion like that of love at least as keenly as we do, and that their love music was, to them, as passionate as our love music is to us. But their love music is not passionate to us; were it not for the words, we should not even know, in many cases, that passion was at the root of the music; time has thinned the blood of their songs and paled their colors. We sing or listen to these songs today calmly, detachedly, as we might look at some rusted old sword. It was not thus that Romeo sang and Juliet listened. For us, this music is classical music; but the men who wrote it and the men who sang it, the men who lived hard and drank deep and fought for places in the pit at the Globe to see the latest play of Shakspeare or Marlowe, these men were to themselves romantics, not classics.

Let us come down to a later age. There is virtually no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express no love music anterior to that of the romantic period that seems to us to express love as we feel it; and we may be sure that it is only a matter of time for the most passionate of the romantic love music to come to seem as unreal, as remote, as the love music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries does to us. Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" (from "Paris and Helen") was, we may safely say, conceived by him, and accepted by his singers and his hearers, as a cry from a heart hot with the realities of things. To us it is something remote, shadowy, almost ghostly; we admire the beautiful turns of the melody, but no modern hear[illegible] it has ever [illegible] said, "Yes, this is love as I feel it, and as, I know, Paris felt it for Helen." We can understand a Tristan and an Isolde, feeling as they do, crashing to ruin themselves and dragging others with them. We can still understand Schubert's Gretchen swooning at the memory of Faust's kiss. But by no effort of the imagination can we conceive of a man and woman who felt only as Gluck's Paris and Helen feel bringing destruction upon themselves and the world.

Yet Gluck, we may be pretty sure, saw his Paris and Helen thus, and so did his audience. Young lovers in that audience saw themselves in this Paris and this Helen, just as young lovers of twenty years ago saw themselves in Schumann's songs. We today see only bloodless wraiths in Gluck's hero and heroine, and it can hardly be doubted that in another generation or two the love music of Schumann will seem as ghostly—a mere historical curiosity like Caccini's "Amarilli," sweet to the ear, but raising no storm in the soul. A generation or two after that, the blood will be out of Wolf's passion; the tempest of passion in the "Geh', Geliebter, geh' jetzt" or the "Erstes Liebeslied eines Mädchens" will be like the sighing of a ghostly wind in a ghostly garden. And, marvellously enduring as is the nervous vitality of "Tristan," that too, sooner or later, will charm the imagination without quickening the pulse or raising the emotional temperature—it will go the way of "Amarilli," and "Caro mio ben," and "Bist du bei mir," and the love songs of Handel and "O del mio dolce ardor."

All music, in fact, without a performer of genius, or, when we read the score for ourselves, without full imaginative sympathy on our part, is merely the filament without the current—or rather a network of filaments. The network may have a beauty and an interest of its own, the beauty of a fine pattern; but without the current it does not glow, and if we are going to suppose that it did not glow for the old composer who made it we are committing ourselves to the very doubtful proposition that the human heart and the human nerves in those days were different things from the heart and nerves of today.

Continued on Page Eleven

WARM BLOOD

Continued from Page Eight

Romain Rolland has made the profound suggestion that a good deal of Palestrina's music, especially in the motets and responses, is essentially dramatic; these pieces are "drames intimes." "Only those who have never read these works," says Rolland, "can believe that music owed its dramatic expressiveness to the literary efforts of the archæologists at the end of the sixteenth century." Few people can now hear, or want to hear, anything dramatic in Palestrina; but, we today probably hear in his music some things he did not hear, and fail to hear other things that to him were vital. So, too, with the dramatic impression that other ancient music sometimes yields. For once the tissue is not mere cold filament, but filament raised to something like its original incandescence.

And now to return to our point of departure. If we accept Stendhal's dictum that every classic was a romantic in its own day, have we not to revise our own opinion as to what constitutes a "classical" reading of an old piece? I put it forward not as a paradox, but as a sober theory, that of the two performances we have recently had of the Ninth Symphony, Weingartner's was the fanciful roman[illegible] and Koussevitzky's both the true romantic and the classical. And this for reasons that may perhaps seem, at first sight, a little paradoxical. Beethoven's music, we know, was torn from him in convulsions; and any reading that turns the volcano in eruption that his soul was when writing such a work as the Ninth Symphony into a smooth and placid green hillock seems to me a wrong reading. Weingartner, the supposed "classical" conductor, in fact romanticizes Beethoven. He sees him not as he was, but in a diminishing perspective, with all his violent passions softened by time, his big muscles no longer in tension. Weingartner's classicism is t[illegible] in reality, only a fictitious romanticism.

Koussevitzky sees Beethoven very much, we may be sure, as Beethoven felt when he wrote the Symphony. Koussevitzky's, that is to say, is the genuine "classical" reading, because it sees the classic as the classic saw himself. But as the classic saw himself as a romantic, this genuine classicism of performance, in contrast with the fictitious classicism of German tradition, makes of the Ninth Symphony in 1924 what it was in 1824—a contemporary work, a romantic, but a living romantic, not the embalmed romantic tradition. Pass the right electric current through the classic filament and we get romantic light and heat that the classic himself would recognize as his own.

MONDAY TRANSCRIPT
Iron and Steel News

almost unsingable, scattered and ejaculatory. The moods shift in it from the blithe comradeship of the tenor solo to the intense awe of the choral setting of the words, "O'er the stars rise His pavilions."

Those to whom music offers a world in itself where "all is order and beauty" will prefer the instrumental movements of this symphony to its finale. But Beethoven chose to prefix to Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which is the text of that finale, a recapitulation of the chief themes of the instrumental movements, followed by the baritone recitative, "Friends, not these tones, but let us sing together of human fellowship."

His impulse was ethical, not primarily esthetic. In his own life there had been far too much pain and solitude. He would in this, his most ambitious work, exalt joy and human brotherhood. To this aim he consciously sacrifices the unity, the formal perfection of the first three movements. Imperfect as this finale is, one feels it as among the few great triumphs of human imagination.

Mr Monteux conducted with sedulous endeavor to follow the broad outlines of the work. He sought to make its emotional meaning clear and poignant to every hearer. His self-effacing skill and pains contributed notably to a memorable performance. With the overture to "Fidelio," prefixed to the symphony, he was also unusually successful.

The chorus, trained by Mr Davison, who shared in the applause at the end, made a valiant and impressive attempt to cope with music that in its original key is nearly unsingable. The soloists, Mmes Sundelius and Squire, and Messrs Stratton and Patton, whose parts are even more mercilessly written for voices, also did as well as could be expected. The audience was deeply impressed and enthusiastic admiration of both music and ers.

[illegible] as abounding and susceptible an instrument as the Boston Orchestra will no more than answer to him that plays upon it.

For worse consequence, "The Pathetic" played but tamely, seems to upturn the maundering and self-pitying Chaikovsky, not the Chaikovsky who could recollect longing and regret in music of beauty, who could recall dread and desolation in music of power. The throat may tighten at each return of that songful theme; the heart slow as it unfolds, since out of its beauty springs a universal emotion. The checked beat of the second movement, the thud, thud, thud of the interposing drum, may seem the eclipse and doom of human desire. But unless the conductor thus wills and accomplishes, Chaikovsky merely whines and tortures him elf in public, pricked with a perverse pleasure.

Frenzy in the march must charge and charge again at the closing walls of oblivion, or else it is the mere tonal surge and rhythmical excitement that the audience clapped and clapped again yesterday. To an oblivion of ecstasy Wagner wrote the music, when Tristan and Isolde sing and the orchestra sounds across the garden. To an oblivion of annihilation Chaikovsky wrote the music in the Finale of "The Pathetic"—if only the conductor will release the voice and the passion. Otherwise Chaikovsky "glooms" and postures, without measure, as one who would dispense an earful. Penetrated and transmitted, "The Pathetic" is music to haunt the mind and sway the heart at each re-hearing. Skimmed and merely polished, it invites the contempt of those who profess to believe it the drool of dread, the auto-intoxication of sentimental hysterics.

The surprise, disappointment and disillusion over Mr. Monteux's version of the Symphony seemed the keener beside his veritable glorification, at the end of the concert, of Chabrier's overture to the opera, "Gwendoline." The piece is cut to Wagnerian pattern after the manner of

Sobrieties

Manuel de Falla

Spanish Composer, New to the Symphony Concerts

(From Messrs. Chesters' "Miniature Esse[illegible] and warm of heart, he embraced Chabrie[illegible] of "Gwendoline." The introduction to th[illegible] overture smote and clanged with Viking swords. The end chanted full-throated the anthem of Valhalla. Between rose and fell measures of longing, measures of fate. Again the moral is written. Unless a music be impregnable masterpiece, by virtue or shortcoming performance may make [illegible]nar it. From Mr. Monteux's loins [illegible]g this epical Chabrier.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

24 POST MAR 30

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Has Survived a Hundred Years

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Had it been practicable to postpone for 38 days the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which takes place at Symphony Hall this afternoon, that performance would have fallen upon the one hundredth anniversary of the first public hearing of this momentous composition.

In music a century is a longer period than in the other arts. Relatively few are the pieces, even among those most loudly acclaimed in their own day, that survive for a hundred years, and it would be instructive as well as interesting if we could know which of the compositions of our immediate time will be performed in 2024. Certainly it is quite safe to assume that no one of them would, to speak colloquially, "fill" an auditorium the size of Symphony Hall twice in the same day. Yet such is the reputation, or, if you will, the sheer appeal of the Ninth Symphony, that all seats for both this afternoon's and this evening's performance were sold many days ago.

Finale Long Unheard Here

Since limitations of space make it impossible to give the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony, at least with a chorus of adequate dimensions, at a regular subscription concert, it has been the practice here of late years to reserve performances of the Symphony as a whole for special concerts of one sort or another, although even thus the piece has not been heard here since the final year of Dr. Muck's term as conductor. But although some conductors are averse to performance of the three purely instrumental movements without the fourth to supplement and complete them, Mr. Monteux has no such scruples, nor for that matter has Mr. Mollenhauer, and so, as it happens, these three movements were played here last season both by the Boston Symphony and by the People's Orchestra.

It is, then, in the relatively unfamiliar finale that the interest of those who hear the symphony today chiefly centres. And it is over the worth of this finale that there has been the greatest difference of opinion among commentators on the symphony. Most musicians are agreed that the first three movements, if a little diffuse, are of the greater Beethoven, but estimates of the artistic value of the fourth range from the most extravagant praise to flat condemnation. This is not the place in which to uphold either estimate or to strike a balance between. Such personal reflections and opinions must wait until the morrow. Then will the critics have their innings; for today let each hearer of the Ninth Symphony judge in peace for himself. But some little comment on the history of the piece will scarcely be amiss.

The Symphony's Beginnings

The fact that as early as 1793 Beethoven planned, though without executing it, a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," has led some to indulge in the romantic belief that the use of this text in the Ninth Symphony was a sort of culmination of a lifelong dream and ambition. But, picturesque as this theory is, the facts of the case do not serve to support it.

According to the painstaking and apparently always accurate Thayer, Beethoven had determined the key of the Ninth Symphony (D minor) as far back as 1812, while he was still at work upon its two predecessors, but except for a hint of the chief theme of the scherzo recorded among sketches for the Violoncello Sonata, Opus 102, No. 2, apparently no sketches for the symphony were made prior to 1817. By the end of that year or the beginning of the following one, however, Beethoven had the impressive opening of the first movement well mapped out; he had formulated the theme of the scherzo, and in his sketch books of that date he makes reference to a purely instrumental finale. Also during the year he outlined a plan for the introduction of voices into the slow movement, a plan that he never carried out and one that was a far cry from the choral movement that he eventually made. Here is his quaint and characteristic memorandum as given by Thayer:

Adagio Cantique—Pious song in a symphony in the ancient modes—Lord God we praise Thee— alleluia—either alone or as introduction to a fugue. The whole 2d sinfonie might be characterized in this manner in which case the vocal parts would enter in the last movement or already in the Adagio. The violins, etc., of the orchestra to be increased tenfold in the last movement. Or the Adagio might be repeated in some manner in the last movement, in which case the vocal parts would enter gradually—in the text of the Adagio Greek myth, Cantique Ecclesiastique—in the Allegro feast of Bachus (sic).

Work on the Symphony was at this point interrupted by the composition of the last three pianoforte Sonatas and of the Mass in D, and it was not resumed until 1822. In the sketches of that year appears a tentative suggestion of the use of Schiller's Ode, yet as late as June or July he still returned to his original scheme of an instrumental Finale. But before the year was quite ended he had fully sketched the Symphony as we now know it, and he had overcome what was for a time an insuperable obstacle, namely, the effective connecting of his setting of Schiller's Ode with the music that preceeds it.

Over the fact that Beethoven introduced voices into his last Symphony, much stir has now and again been made. From this procedure, which, as we now realize, was developed almost inadvertently, Wagner formulated a theory, convenient to his own arguments, that Beethoven had in the first three movements of the Symphony carried instrumental music as far as it might go, and that hence he must thereafter resort to the union of music and words. Yet if we may believe the evidence assembled by Thayer, Beethoven was long undecided in his own mind as to whether or not his choral Finale had been a mistake; he even planned an instrumental movement to replace it. And thus Thayer sums up the situation:

That Beethoven may have had scruples touching the appropriateness of the choral finale is comprehensible enough in view of the fact that the original plan of the Symphony contemplated an instrumental close and that Beethoven labored so hard to establish arbitrarily an organic union between the ode and the first three movements; but it is not like that he gave long thought to the project of writing a new finale. He had witnessed the extraordinary demonstration of delight with which the whole had been received and he may have found it as easy as some of his commentators to believe that his device for presenting the choral finale as the logical and poetically just outcome of the preceding movements had been successful despite its obvious artificiality.

The initial performance of the Ninth Symphony was at a memorial concert planned in Beethoven's honor by the principal musicians of Vienna, which took place in the Austrian capital on May 7, 1824. Although his total deafness prevented him from actually conducting, the composer, clad in his shabby green frock coat, stood beside Herr Umlauf, the director, and indicated the time. By all accounts this performance was ragged and poorly balanced, but the music itself, though it must have sounded strange enough to that audience of a century ago, made a tremendous impression. At the end of the scherzo, according to some eye-witnesses, or, as others will have it, at the end of the whole symphony, there occurred an incident which, in the words of Sir George Grove, "must have brought the tears to many an eye in the room. The master," continues Grove, "though placed in the midst of this confluence of music, heard nothing of it all, and was not even sensible of the applause of the audience at the end of his great work, but continued standing with his back to the audience, and beating the time, till Fraulein Ungher, who had sung the contralto part, turned him, or induced him to turn round and face the people, who were still clapping their hands and giving way to the greatest demonstrations of pleasure. His turning round, and the sudden conviction thereby forced on everybody, that he had not done so before because he could not hear what was going on, acted like an electric shock on all present; and a volcanic explosion of sympathy and admiration followed, which was repeated again and again, and seemed as if it would never end."

CONCERTS TODAY

Pension Fund Concerts

At Symphony Hall this afternoon, and again this evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and by a quartet of soloists, all under the direction of Mr. Monteux, will bring to the performance the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, concerning which extended comment may be found above. Only standing-room remains for either concert.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final trip of the season to New York, and there in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will give its last concerts in that city under the leadership of Mr. Monteux. On Friday evening the orchestra will give its final Brooklyn concert.

TRANSMAR 27

ORCHESTRAL CHRONICLE

What the Public Wants

IF applause is the criterion, the Symphony Concerts of last Friday and Saturday touched the ideal. At every opportunity, the audience of the afternoon clapped to the top of its bent. As often the audience of the evening outdid it. Above the usual, Mr. Monteux was welcomed to his place. After no more than a Symphony by Haydn, the orchestra was called to its feet. At the close of Beethoven's Concerto, Mr. Flesch was pelted with plaudits. Yet that estimable violinist, excelling in this particular piece, is no Kreisler or no Heifetz. The band was neither above nor below the pitch at which, through a year past, Mr. Monteux has held it. The halo of impending departure now gilds the conductor; but otherwise, at these concerts, he was in the usual exercise of his abilities. When the composer of the novel piece of the day rises in his place or mounts to the platform, it is the custom at Symphony Hall to spray or to flood him with applause. Since Mr. Hill's second Suite of "Stevensoniana" pleased much, and since he is also "one of us," the waves ran high.

By such evidence the chosen music quite as much as the performance, was the source of this hearty mood twice prevailing. A Symphony of Haydn, especially so simple a Symphony as that of last week, gives easy pleasure. It sings steadily, transparently, amiably. No one could it ruffle, baffle or irritate. The Violin-Concerto of Beethoven has indeed lengths and also repetitions. The superlative Ludwig, like lesser composers, could not always withstand the temptation to worry his themes. Fortunately, however, the Concerto taxes patience only. Otherwise, to most listeners, it is a songful, pleasurable, soothing music. Every one likes orchestral sonorities, and they clang through the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs. Mr. Hill happens to have written his warmest and freest music parra's g

Habanera.'
Soberly, writes, as thrift, wh lected. H pressionis fashion. store, out to our tir writes wi upon ha rhythms fer direct
Above all feeling, ir to his o dividual from the Thus,
he slopes mountain and perfu stir of lif
'Iberia." ardent rh
Playful
hey are alm and mic ene earer a enfoldin
he thro Poignan gravity. within a f moti he inst timbre o ands a
Mr. Mo mood a the bala

Chu Fi

TH

After Mar 28

Monteux to Lead Tschaikowsky Symphony

FOR the first time in thirteen years, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony will be played at the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Monteux will introduce De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with Heinrich Gebhardt as piano soloist. The other numbers will be Schenck's tone poem, "In a Withered Garden," and Chabrier's "Gwendoline," overture.

PENSION FUND CONCERT SOLOISTS

The soloists for the pension fund concerts next Sunday afternoon and evening, at which Beethoven's 9th Symphony is to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Marie Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society are to join forces with Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this occasion. Only stand-

BELATED RETURN OF A SYMPHONY LONG NEGLECTED

CHAIKOVSKY'S "PATHETIC" AFTER THIRTEEN YEARS

To the Regular Concerts Mr. Monteux Restores "The Most Famous Symphony Since Beethoven"—Prelude to the Revival of Next Friday—Music and Composer, Record and Implication

IT has long been the stereotyped thing to say of Chaikovsky that he was, like James Thompson of "The City of Dreadful Night," a psychopath; that his curse was constitutional melancholia; and that, as G. W. Foote wrote of Thompson, "one peg was as good as another upon which to hang the raiment of his sorrow." The odd thing about this cliché is that it is probably true; though it is too bad that the facts should seem to give aid and comfort to that army of sentimentalists who have broken their hearts over the wretchedness of Chaikovsky as revealed, presumably, in the Pathetic Symphony. Perhaps the time may come again when we shall all be willing to agree that this too-famous symphony is among the most touching disclosures in the art of our time—a thing of moving sincerity, of a poignancy that at times is overwhelming; that is filled, in its richest moments, with a searching and unforgettable beauty. If ever music drew its breath in pain, it is in certain accessions of passionate grieving that these pages contain, when we seem to hear Chaikovsky say to us or when, as in other pages of desperate and terrible gayety, it is as if he hoped to sustain himself and us by that insupportable, that heart-breaking cry or his,

Absent thee from felicity awhile.

Death cannot spoil the Spring!

Chaikovsky dreaded with passionate protest what Sir Thomas Browne called "the iniquity of oblivion." He feared the thought of death with a shuddering and poignant terror; and into his most personal and characteristic utterance, the Pathetic Symphony, he emptied all the dark troubles of his heart—all that he knew of anguished apprehension and foreboding, of grief that is unassuageable, of consternation and despair. Chaikovsky never divulged the meaning of this singularly affecting music, but its purport is unmistakable. Its burden is the infinite sadness of human destiny and the crushing finality of death; and the hopelessness of the music is as manifest as it is unrelieved. Chaikovsky has not here incurred the calm reproach of Krishna: "Thou hast grieved for those who need no grief": for his grief is centred upon the tragic frustrations of his own life; his lamentation for the precious things of the world that he sees slipping irreclaimably from his grasp. This music is saturated with the precise emotion which moved Edgar Allan Poe when he wrote his "Dream Within a Dream."

I stand amid the roar
Of a surf-tormented s
I hold of China, to feel,

nd sensi-
nt end";
at sensi-
t is in-usic that evanescence nd death, the long
tretched out in vain,
os forever away into haunted past."

reference to the Pathetic Sym-ours in a letter from Chaikovsky brother Anatol, written Feb. 22,
This was the last year of Chaikov-sky's life—he was to live but nine months longer. "I am now wholly occupied," he wrote, "with the new work—a symphony, and it is hard for me to tear myself away from it. I believe it comes into existence as the best of all my works." The next day he wrote at greater length to Vladimir Davidov:

I must tell you how happy I am about my work. As you know, I destroyed a symphony which I had partly composed and orchestrated in the autumn. I did wisely, for it contained little that was really fine—an empty pattern of sounds without any inspiration. Just as I was starting on my journey [the visit to Paris in December, 1892] the idea came to me for a new symphony—this time with a programme, but a programme of a kind which should be an enigma to all—let them guess it who can! The work will be entitled "A Programme Symphony" (No. 6). This programme is wholly subjective. During my journey, while composing it in my mind, I wept bitterly. Now I am home again, I have settled down to sketch out the work, and it goes with such ardor that in less than four days I have completed the first movement, while the rest of the symphony is clearly outlined in my head. There will be much that is novel in this work as regards form. For instance, the finale will not be a boisterous Allegro, but an Adagio of considerable dimensions. You can imagine what joy I feel in the conviction that my day is not yet over, and that I may still accomplish much. Perhaps I may be mistaken, but it does not seem likely. Do not speak of this to anyone but Modeste.

Five weeks later Chaikovsky has got as far as the completion of sketches for the Scherzo and the Finale. This symphony, he writes confidently to Ippolitov-Ivanov, "I shall certainly not destroy!" In the following June we find him in London, undergoing the receipt of a degree from Cambridge University and "oppressed with loneliness and nostalgia." His letters home reflect his misery. To Davidov, his nephew, to whom the Pathetic is dedidcated, he writes: "Is it not strange that of my own free will I have elected to undergo this torture? What fiend can have suggested it to me? Several times during my journey yesterday I resolved to throw the whole thing up and turn tail. . . . Yesterday I suffered so much that I could neither sleep nor eat, which is very unusual for me. I suffer not only from torments which cannot be put into words (there is one place in my new symphony—the Sixth—where they seem to me adequately expressed), but from a dislike of strangers, and an indefinable terror—though of what, the devil only knows!" An indefinable terror! Is not the Sixth Symphony full of it? To his brother Modeste he wrote: "What a number of people I see, and how tired I get! In the morning I suffer a great deal from depression. . . . I have but one thought: to get it all over. . . . This is an infernal life. Not a moment's peace: perpetual agitation, dread, homesickness, fatigue." Dread, terror—always those two pursuing demons. Dread of what, terror of what? Only the unimaginative and the eupeptic will ask that question.

In August we find Chaikovsky engrossed with his new score. "I am up to my ears in the Symphony," he wrote Modeste, "the further I go, the more difficult the orchestration becomes. Twenty years ago I would have rushed it through without a second thought, and it would have turned out all right. Now I am turning coward and have lost my self-confidence. I have been sitting all day over two pages, yet they will not come out as I wish In spite of this, the music makes progress, and I would not have accomplished so much anywhere else but at nome." To Davidov he wrote twelve days later:

The Symphony is progressing. I am very well pleased with its contents, but not quite so satisfied with the orchestration. It does not realize my dreams. To me it will seem quite natural, and not in the least astonishing, if this Symphony meets with abuse, or scant appreciation at first. I cer-

my works. I loved any one of my offspring. . . .
On my word of honor, never in my life have I felt such self-satisfaction, such pride, such happiness, as in the consciousness that I am really the creator of this beautiful work.

On Oct. 19, Chaikovsky left Klin [his little country-house in the woods] to attend the memorial service for his friend Zvierev at Moscow and then to go on to Petersburg. "As the train passed the village of Frolovskoe," relates Modeste, "he pointed to the churchyard, remarking to his fellow travellers: 'I shall be buried there, and people will point out my grave as they go by.' He repeated this wish to be buried at Frolovskoe while talking to Taneiev at the memorial service. Beyond these two references to his death, prompted no doubt by the sad ceremony with which he was preoccupied, Chaikovsky does not appear to have shown any symptoms of depression or foreboding." Indeed, he told Kashkin at this time that he "never felt better or happier in his life." Speaking of the Sixth Symphony, he declared that he "had no doubt as to the first three movements," but that the last was "still a problem," and that perhaps, after the performance in Petersburg, he would destroy the Finale and replace it by another.

Chaikovsky arrived at Petersburg Oct.

Continued on Following Page

MONTEUX

Music News and Reviews

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

and garish bird, pirouetting and strutting, is distantly like the glint and flash of Taylor's careening insects amid the sun-splashed garden, and the "danse infernale" of the ogre Kastchei is comparable with the grisly effigence of Taylor's Jabberwock as it "bolies" into the scenery. This Stravinsky music was heard and reviewed of a little while ago, and the early rendition was by request. There is nothing puzzling in this score of the younger Stravinsky, and those present rejoiced in the chance to hear it again, and form still more favorable impression.

A conservative and tempered reading of Beethoven's mighty Fifth Symphony ended the excellent performance, which takes rank among the season's best.

L. W.

FIRST SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the first Sunday night Pop concert of the season at Symphony Hall tonight, offering at the same time his first Russian program. There will be special features on practically every program this week. On Tuesday night the Harvard Freshmen Glee Club will take part. The program for tonight follows:

Selection, "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds ..... Rimsky-Korsakow
Eight Popular Melodies ..... Liadow
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounov
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Hebrew Dance ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolitov-Ivanov

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

24 POST MAR 30

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Has Survived a Hundred Yea

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Had it been practicable to postpone for 38 days the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which takes place at Symphony Hall this afternoon, that performance would have fallen upon the one hundredth anniversary of the first public hearing of this momentous composition.

In music a century is a longer period than in the other arts. Relatively few are the pieces, even among those most loudly acclaimed in their own day, that survive for a hundred years, and it would be instructive as well as interesting if we could know which of the compositions of our immediate time will be performed in 2024. Certainly it is quite safe to assume that no one of them would, to speak colloquially, "fill" an auditorium the size of Symphony Hall twice in the same day. Yet such is the reputation, or, if you will, the sheer appeal of the Ninth Symphony, that all seats for both this afternoon's and this evening's performance were sold many days ago.

Finale Long Unheard Here

Since limitations of space make it impossible to give the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony, at least with a chorus of adequate dimensions, at a regular subscription concert, it has been the practice here of late years to reserve performances of the Symphony as a whole for special concerts of one sort or another, although even thus the piece has not been heard here since the final year of Dr. Muck's term as conductor. But although some conductors are averse to performance of the three purely instrumental movements without the fourth to supplement and complete them, Mr. Monteux has no such scruples, nor for that matter has Mr. Mollenhauer, and so, as it happens, these three movements were played here last season both by the Boston Symphony and by the People's Orchestra.

It is, then, in the relatively unfamiliar finale that the interest of those who hear the symphony today chiefly centres. And it is over the worth of this finale that there has been the greatest difference of opinion among commentators on the symphony. Most musicians are agreed that the first three movements, if a little diffuse, are of the greater Beethoven, but estimates of the artistic value of the fourth range from the most extravagant praise to flat condemnation. This is not the place in which to uphold either estimate or to strike a balance between. Such personal reflections and opinions must wait until the morrow. Then will the critics have their innings; for today let each hearer of the Ninth Symphony judge in peace for himself. But some little comment on the history of the piece will scarcely be amiss.

The Symphony's Beginnings

The fact that as early as 1793 Beethoven planned, though without executing it, a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," has led some to indulge in the romantic belief that the use of this text in the Ninth Symphony was a sort of culmination of a lifelong dream and ambition. But, picturesque as this theory is, the facts of the case do not serve to support it.

According to the painstaking and apparently always accurate Thayer, Beethoven had determined the key of the Ninth Symphony (D minor) as far back as 1812, while he was still at work upon its two predecessors, but except for a hint of the chief theme of the scherzo recorded among sketches for the Violoncello Sonata, Opus 102, No. 2, apparently no sketches for the symphony were made prior to 1817. By the end of that year or the beginning of the following one, however, Beethoven had the impressive opening of the first movement well mapped out; he had formulated the theme of the scherzo, and in his sketch books of that date he makes reference to a purely instrumental finale. Also during the year he outlined a plan for the introduction of voices into the slow movement, a plan that he never carried out and one that was a far cry from the choral movement that he eventually made. Here is his quaint and characteristic memorandum as given by Thayer:

> Adagio Cantique—Pious song in a symphony in the ancient modes—Lord God we praise Thee— alleluia—either alone or as introduction to a fugue. The whole 2d sinfonie might be characterized in this manner in which case the vocal parts would enter in the last movement or already in the Adagio. The violins, etc., of the orchestra to be increased tenfold in the last movement. Or the Adagio might be repeated in some manner in the last movement, in which case the vocal parts would enter gradually—in the text of the Adagio Greek myth, Cantique Ecclesiastique—in the Allegro feast of Bachus (sic).

Work on the Symphony was at this point interrupted by the composition of the last three pianoforte Sonatas and of the Mass in D, and it was not resumed until 1822. In the sketches of that year appears a tentative suggestion of the use of Schiller's Ode, yet as late as June or July he still returned to his original scheme of an instrumental Finale. But before the year was quite ended he had fully sketched the Symphony as we now know it, and he had overcome what was for a time an insuperable obstacle, namely, the effective connecting of his setting of Schiller's Ode with the music that preceeds it.

Over the fact that Beethoven introduced voices into his last Symphony, much stir has now and again been made. From this procedure, which, as we now realize, was developed almost inadvertently, Wagner formulated a theory, convenient to his own arguments, that Beethoven had in the first three movements of the Symphony carried instrumental music as far as it might go, and that hence he must thereafter resort to the union of music and words. Yet if we may believe the evidence assembled by Thayer, Beethoven was long undecided in his own mind as to whether or not his choral Finale had been a mistake; he even planned an instrumental movement to replace it. And thus Thayer sums up the situation:

> That Beethoven may have had scruples touching the appropriateness of the choral finale is comprehensible enough in view of the fact that the original plan of the Symphony contemplated an instrumental close and that Beethoven labored so hard to establish arbitrarily an organic union between the ode and the first three movements; but it is not like that he gave long thought to the project of writing a new finale. He had witnessed the extraordinary demonstration of delight with which the whole had been received and he may have found it as easy as some of his commentators to believe that his device for presenting the choral finale as the logical and poetically just outcome of the preceding movements had been successful despite its obvious artificiality.

The initial performance of the Ninth Symphony was at a memorial concert planned in Beethoven's honor by the principal musicians of Vienna, which took place in the Austrian capital on May 7, 1824. Although his total deafness prevented him from actually conducting, the composer, clad in his shabby green frock coat, stood beside Herr Umlauf, the director, and indicated the time. By all accounts this performance was ragged and poorly balanced, but the music itself, though it must have sounded strange enough to that audience of a century ago, made a tremendous impression. At the end of the scherzo, according to some eye-witnesses, or, as others will have it, at the end of the whole symphony, there occurred an incident which, in the words of Sir George Grove, "must have brought the tears to many an eye in the room. The master," continues Grove, "though placed in the midst of this confluence of music, heard nothing of it all, and was not even sensible of the applause of the audience at the end of his great work, but continued standing with his back to the audience, and beating the time, till Fraulein Ungher, who had sung the contralto part, turned him, or induced him to turn round and face the people, who were still clapping their hands and giving way to the greatest demonstrations of pleasure. His turning round, and the sudden conviction thereby forced on everybody, that he had not done so before because he could not hear what was going on, acted like an electric shock on all present; and a volcanic explosion of sympathy and admiration followed which was repeated again and again and seemed as if it would never end."

CONCERTS TODAY

Pension Fund Concerts

At Symphony Hall this afternoon, and again this evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and by a quartet of soloists, all under the direction of Mr. Monteux, will bring to the performance the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, concerning which extended comment may be found above. Only standing-room remains for either concert.

SYMPHO

This week t chestra will season to Ne
negie Hall o
Saturday aft concerts in th ship of Mr. M
ing the orch
Brooklyn conc

TRANS MAR 24 FOLIO MAR 26

ORCHESTRAL CHRONICLE

What the Public Wants

IF applause is the criterion, the Symphony Concerts of last Friday and Saturday touched the ideal. At every opportunity, the audience of the afternoon clapped to the top of its bent. As often the audience of the evening outdid it. Above the usual, Mr. Monteux was welcomed to his place. After no more than a Symphony by Haydn, the orchestra was called to its feet. At the close of Beethoven's Concerto, Mr. Flesch was pelted with plaudits. Yet that estimable violinist, excelling in this particular piece, is no Kreisler or no Heifetz. The band was neither above nor below the pitch at which, through a year past, Mr. Monteux has held it. The halo of impending departure now gilds the conductor; but otherwise, at these concerts, he was in the usual exercise of his abilities. When the composer of the novel piece of the day rises in his place or mounts to the platform, it is the custom at Symphony Hall to spray or to flood him with applause. Since Mr. Hill's second Suite of "Stevensoniana" pleased much, and since he is also "one of us," the waves ran high.

By such evidence the chosen music quite as much as the performance, was the source of this hearty mood twice prevailing. A Symphony of Haydn, especially so simple a Symphony as that of last week, gives easy pleasure. It sings steadily, transparently, amiably. No one could it ruffle, baffle or irritate. The Violin-Concerto of Beethoven has indeed lengths and also repetitions. The superlative Ludwig, like lesser composers, could not always withstand the temptation to worry his themes. Fortunately, however, the Concerto taxes patience only. Otherwise, to most listeners, it is a songful, pleasurable, soothing music. Every one likes orchestral sonorities, and they clang through the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs. Mr. Hill happens to have written his warmest and freest music

parra's g
Habanera."
Soberly,
writes, as thrift, wh lected.
pressionis
fashion. store, out to our tin writes wi upon hi rhythms fer direc
Above all feeling, to his dividual
from the Thus,
he slopes mountain and perf
stir of li
"Iberia." ardent rh displayful they are palm and mic ener hearer a enfolding the thro Poignant gravity. within a of motio he instr timbre o
lands a
Mr. Mon mood an the bala

Adv Mar 23

Monteux to Lead Tschaikowsky Symphony

FOR the first time in thirteen years, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony will be played at the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Monteux will introduce De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," with Heinrich Gebhardt as piano soloist. The other numbers will be Schenck's tone poem, "In a Withered Garden," and Chabrier's "Gwendoline," overture.

PENSION FUND CONCERT SOLOISTS

The soloists for the pension fund concerts next Sunday afternoon and evening, at which Beethovtn's 9th Symphony is to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Marie Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society are to join forces with Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this occasion. Only stand-

BELATED RETURN OF A SYMPHONY LONG NEGLECTED

CHAIKOVSKY'S "PATHETIC" AFTER THIRTEEN YEARS

To the Regular Concerts Mr. Monteux Restores "The Most Famous Symphony Since Beethoven"—Prelude to the Revival of Next Friday—Music and Composer, Record and Implication

IT has long been the stereotyped thing to say of Chaikovsky that he was, like James Thompson of "The City of Dreadful Night," a psychopath; that his curse was constitutional melancholia; and that, as G. W. Foote wrote of Thompson, "one peg was as good as another upon which to hang the raiment of his sorrow." The odd thing about this cliché is that it is probably true; though it is too bad that the facts should seem to give aid and comfort to that army of sentimentalists who have broken their hearts over the wretchedness of Chaikovsky as revealed, presumably, in the Pathetic Symphony. Perhaps the time may come again when we shall all be willing to agree that this too-famous symphony is among the most touching disclosures in the art of our time—a thing of moving sincerity, of a poignancy that at times is overwhelming; that is filled, in its richest moments, with a searching and unforgettable beauty. If ever music drew its breath in pain, it is in certain accessions of passionate grieving that these pages contain, when we seem to hear Chaikovsky say to us or when, as in other pages of desperate and terrible gayety, it is as if he hoped to sustain himself and us by that insupportable, that heart-breaking cry or his,

> Absent thee from felicity awhile.

> Death cannot spoil the Spring!

Chaikovsky dreaded with passionate protest what Sir Thomas Browne called "the iniquity of oblivion." He feared the thought of death with a shuddering and poignant terror; and into his most personal and characteristic utterance, the Pathetic Symphony, he emptied all the dark troubles of his heart—all that he knew of anguished apprehension and foreboding, of grief that is unassuageable, of consternation and despair. Chaikovsky never divulged the meaning of this singularly affecting music, but its purport is unmistakable. Its burden is the infinite sadness of human destiny and the crushing finality of death; and the hopelessness of the music is as manifest as it is unrelieved. Chaikovsky has not here incurred the calm reproach of Krishna: "Thou hast grieved for those who need no grief"; for his grief is centred upon the tragic frustrations of his own life; his lamentation is for the precious things of the world that he sees slipping irreclaimably from his grasp. This music is saturated with the precise emotion which moved Edgar Allan Poe when he wrote his "Dream Within a Dream."

> I stand amid the roar
> Of a surf-tormented s[hore]
> I hold[ ]

[illegible] of China,
[illegible] to feel,
[illegible]nd sensi-
[illegible]nt end";
[illegible]at sensi-
[illegible]t is in-
[illegible]usic that
[illegible] evanescence
[illegible]nd death, the long
[illegible]tretched out in vain,
[illegible]es forever away into [illegible] haunted past."

[illegible] reference to the Pathetic Sym-
[illegible]curs in a letter from Chaikovsky
[illegible] brother Anatol, written Feb. 22,
[illegible] This was the last year of Chaikov-
[illegible]sky's life—he was to live but nine months
[illegible]longer. "I am now wholly occupied," he [illegible]wrote, "with the new work—a symphony,
[illegible]and it is hard for me to tear myself away
[illegible] from it. I believe it comes into existence

as the best of all my works." The next day he wrote at greater length to Vladimir Davidov:

> I must tell you how happy I am about my work. As you know, I destroyed a symphony which I had partly composed and orchestrated in the autumn. I did wisely, for it contained little that was really fine—an empty pattern of sounds without any inspiration. Just as I was starting on my journey [the visit to Paris in December, 1892] the idea came to me for a new symphony—this time with a programme, but a programme of a kind which should be an enigma to all—let them guess it who can! The work will be entitled "A Programme Symphony" (No. 6). This programme is wholly subjective. During my journey, while composing it in my mind, I wept bitterly. Now I am home again, I have settled down to sketch out the work, and it goes with such ardor that in less than four days I have completed the first movement, while the rest of the symphony is clearly outlined in my head. There will be much that is novel in this work as regards form. For instance, the finale will not be a boisterous Allegro, but an Adagio of considerable dimensions. You can imagine what joy I feel in the conviction that my day is not yet over, and that I may still accomplish much. Perhaps I may be mistaken, but it does not seem likely. Do not speak of this to anyone but Modeste.

Five weeks later Chaikovsky has got as far as the completion of sketches for the Scherzo and the Finale. This symphony, he writes confidently to Ippolitov-Ivanov, "I shall certainly not destroy!" In the following June we find him in London, undergoing the receipt of a degree from Cambridge University and "oppressed with loneliness and nostalgia." His letters home reflect his misery. To Davidov, his nephew, to whom the Pathetic is dedidcated, he writes: "Is it not strange that of my own free will I have elected to undergo this torture? What fiend can have suggested it to me? Several times during my journey yesterday I resolved to throw the whole thing up and turn tail. . . . Yesterday I suffered so much that I could neither sleep nor eat, which is very unusual for me. I suffer not only from torments which cannot be put into words (there is one place in my new symphony—the Sixth—where they seem to me adequately expressed), but from a dislike of strangers, and an indefinable terror—though of what, the devil only knows!" An indefinable terror! Is not the Sixth Symphony full of it? To his brother Modeste he wrote: "What a number of people I see, and how tired I get! In the morning I suffer a great deal from depression. . . . I have but one thought: to get it all over. . . . This is an infernal life. Not a moment's peace: perpetual agitation, dread, homesickness, fatigue." Dread, terror—always those two pursuing demons. Dread of what, terror of what? Only the unimaginative and the eupeptic will ask that question.

In August we find Chaikovsky engrossed with his new score. "I am up to my ears in the Symphony," he wrote Modeste, "the further I go, the more difficult the orchestration becomes. Twenty years ago I would have rushed it through without a second thought, and it would have turned out all right. Now I am turning coward and have lost my self-confidence. I have been sitting all day over two pages, yet they will not come out as I wish In spite of this, the music makes progress, and I would not have accomplished so much anywhere else but at home." To Davidov he wrote twelve days later:

> The Symphony is progressing. I am very well pleased with its contents, but not quite so satisfied with the orchestration. It does not realize my dreams. To me it will seem quite natural, and not in the least astonishing, if this Symphony meets with abuse, or scant appreciation at first. I cer-
> [illegible] my works. I [illegible]oved > any one of my [illegible]ofspring. . . .
> On my word [illegible] honor, never in my life have I felt such self-satisfaction, such pride, such happiness, as in the consciousness that I am really the creator of this beautiful work.

On Oct. 19, Chaikovsky left Klin [his little country-house in the woods] to attend the memorial service for his friend Zvierev at Moscow and then to go on to Petersburg. "As the train passed the village of Frolovskoe," relates Modeste, "he pointed to the churchyard, remarking to his fellow travellers: 'I shall be buried there, and people will point out my grave as they go by.' He repeated this wish to be buried at Frolovskoe while talking to Taneiev at the memorial service. Beyond these two references to his death, prompted no doubt by the sad ceremony with which he was preoccupied, Chaikovsky does not appear to have shown any symptoms of depression or foreboding." Indeed, he told Kashkin at this time that he "never felt better or happier in his life." Speaking of the Sixth Symphony, he declared that he "had no doubt as to the first three movements," but that the last was "still a problem," and that perhaps, after the performance in Petersburg, he would destroy the Finale and replace it by another.

Chaikovsky arrived at Petersburg Oct.

Continued on Following Page

MONTEUX MAR 24

Music News and Reviews

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

and garish bird, pirouetting and strutting, is distantly like the glint and flash of Taylor's careening insects mid the sun-splashed garden, and the "danse infernale" of the ogre Kastchei is comparable with the grisly effrence of Taylor's Jabberwock as it "bples" into the scenery. This Stravinsky music was heard and reviewed of a little while ago, and the early reitation was by request. There is nothi puzzling in this score of the younger Stravinsky, and those present rejoiced in the chance to hear it again, and form still more favorable impression.

A conservative and tempe reading of Beethoven's mighty Fifth Symphony ended the excellent performce, which takes rank among the seas best.

L. W.

FIRST SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the first Sunday night Pop concert of the season at Symphony Hall tonight, offering at the same time his first Russian program. There will be special features on practically every program this week. On Tuesday night the Harvard Freshmen Glee Club will take part. The program for tonight follows:

Selection, "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds ..... Rimsky-Korsakow
Eight Popular Melodies ..... Liadow
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounow
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodine
Hebrew Dance ..... Kastalsky
Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolitov-Ivanov

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Has Survived a Hundred Years

rmances of the Sym-
n for special concerts nother, although even s not been heard here ar of Dr. Muck's term
t although some cone to performance of instrumental move-
he fourth to supple-
e them, Mr. Monteux les, nor for that matnhauer, and so, as it
ree movements were season both by the
and by the People's the relatively unfa-he interest of those phony today chiefly over the worth of there has been the of opinion among he symphony. Most reed that the first f a little diffuse, are hoven, but estimates of the fourth range travagant praise to

This is not the place either estimate or between. Such per-and opinions must row. Then will the innings; for today
he Ninth Symphony himself. But some the history of the be amiss.

y's Beginnings

arly as 1793 Beetho-without executing ller's "Ode to Joy," ulge in the romantic belief that the use of this text in the Ninth Symphony was a sort of culmination of a lifelong dream and ambition. But, picturesque as this theory is, the facts of the case do not serve to support it.

According to the painstaking and apparently always accurate Thayer, Beethoven had determined the key of the Ninth Symphony (D minor) as far back as 1812, while he was still at work upon its two predecessors, but except for a hint of the chief theme of the scherzo recorded among sketches for the Violoncello Sonata, Opus 102, No. 2, apparently no sketches for the symphony were made prior to 1817. By the end of that year or the beginning of the following one, however, Beethoven had the impressive opening of the first movement well mapped out; he had formulated the theme of the scherzo, and in his sketch books of that date he makes reference to a purely instrumental finale. Also during the year he outlined a plan for the introduction of voices into the slow movement, a plan that he never carried out and one that was a far cry from the choral movement that he eventually made. Here is his quaint and characteristic memorandum as given by Thayer:

Adagio Cantique—Pious song in a symphony in the ancient modes—Lord God we praise Thee— alleluia—either alone or as introduction to a fugue. The whole 2d sinfonie might be characterized in this manner in which case the vocal parts would enter in the last movement or already in the Adagio. The violins, etc., of the orchestra to be increased tenfold in the last movement. Or the Adagio might be repeated in some manner in the last movement, in which case the vocal parts would enter gradually—in the text of the Adagio Greek myth, Cantique Ecclesiastique—in the Allegro feast of Bachus (sic).

Work on the Symphony was at this point interrupted by the composition of the last three pianoforte Sonatas and of the Mass in D, and it was not resumed until 1822. In the sketches of that year appears a tentative suggestion of the use of Schiller's Ode, yet as late as June or July he still returned to his original scheme of an instrumental Finale. But before the year was quite ended he had fully sketched the Symphony as we now know it, and he had overcome what was for a time an insuperable obstacle, namely, the effective connecting of his setting of Schiller's Ode with the music that preceeds it.

Over the fact that Beethoven introduced voices into his last Symphony, much stir has now and again been made. From this procedure, which, as we now realize, was developed almost inadvertently, Wagner formulated a theory, convenient to his own arguments, that Beethoven had in the first three movements of the Symphony carried instrumental music as far as it might go, and that hence he must thereafter resort to the union of music and words. Yet if we may believe the evidence assembled by Thayer, Beethoven was long undecided in his own mind as to whether or not his choral Finale had been a mistake; he even planned an instrumental movement to replace it. And thus Thayer sums up the situation:

That Beethoven may have had scruples touching the appropriateness of the choral finale is comprehensible enough in view of the fact that the original plan of the Symphony contemplated an instrumental close and that Beethoven labored so hard to establish arbitrarily an organic union between the ode and the first three movements; but it is not like that he gave long thought to the project of writing a new finale. He had witnessed the extraordinary demonstration of delight with which the whole had been received and he may have found it as easy as some of his commentators to believe that his device for presenting the choral finale as the logical and poetically just outcome of the preceding movements had been successful despite its obvious artificiality.

The initial performance of the Ninth Symphony was at a memorial concert planned in Beethoven's honor by the principal musicians of Vienna, which took place in the Austrian capital on May 7, 1824. Although his total deafness prevented him from actually conducting, the composer, clad in his shabby green frock coat, stood beside Herr Umlauf, the director, and indicated the time. By all accounts this performance was ragged and poorly balanced, but the music itself, though it must have sounded strange enough to that audience of a century ago, made a tremendous impression. At the end of the scherzo, according to some eye-witnesses, or, as others will have it, at the end of the whole symphony, there occurred an incident which, in the words of Sir George Grove, "must have brought the tears to many an eye in the room. The master," continues Grove, "though placed in the midst of this confluence of music, heard nothing of it all, and was not even sensible of the applause of the audience at the end of his great work, but continued standing with his back to the audience, and beating the time, till Fraulein Ungher, who had sung the contralto part, turned him, or induced him to turn round and face the people, who were still clapping their hands and giving way to the greatest demonstrations of pleasure. His turning round, and the sudden conviction thereby forced on everybody, that he had not done so before because he could not hear what was going on, acted like an electric shock on all present; and a volcanic explosion of sympathy and admiration followed, which was repeated again and again, and seemed as if it would never end."

CONCERTS TODAY

Pension Fund Concerts

At Symphony Hall this afternoon, and again this evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and by a quartet of soloists, all under the direction of Mr. Monteux, will bring to the performance the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, concerning which extended comment may be found above. Only standing-room remains for either concert.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final trip of the season to New York, and there in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will give its last concerts in that city under the leadership of Mr. Monteux. On Friday evening the orchestra will give its final Brooklyn concert.

MAR 26

Monteux Mar 12

ED RETURN A SYMPHONY LONG NEGLECTED

KY'S "PATHETIC" AFTER HIRTEEN YEARS

ular Concerts Mr. Monteux The Most Famous Symphony hoven"—Prelude to the Re-xt Friday—Music and Com-rd and Implication g been the stereotyped thing of Chaikovsky that he was, es Thompson of "The City iful Night," a psychopath; e was constitutional melan-hat, as G. W. Foote wrote of ne peg was as good as an-hich to hang the raiment of

The odd thing about this it is probably true; though that the facts should seem nd comfort to that army of who have broken their he wretchedness of Chaikov-led, presumably, in the Pa-ony. Perhaps the time may hen we shall all be willing this too-famous symphony is nost touching disclosures in ir time—a thing of moving a poignancy that at times is that is filled, in its richest a searching and unforget-If ever music drew its it is in certain accessions grieving that these pages we seem to hear Chaikovsky e from felicity awhile.

n other pages of desperate yety, it is as if he hoped self and us by that insup-heart-breaking cry or his, nnot spoil the Spring!

readed with passionate pro-Thomas Browne called "the blivion." He feared the th with a shuddering and ; and into his most per-aracteristic utterance, the hony, he emptied all the of his heart—all that he hed apprehension and fore-f that is unassuageable, of and despair. Chaikovsky the meaning of this singu-music, but its purport is Its burden is the infinite an destiny and the crush-leath; and the hopelessness as manifest as it is un-vsky has not here incurred eh of Krishna: "Thou hast e who need no grief"; for tred upon the tragic frus-own life; his lamentation ious things of the world lipping irreclaimably from s music is saturated with otion which moved Edgar n he wrote his "Dream n."

mic the roar
f-tormented air

as the best of all my works." The next day he wrote at greater length to Vladimir Davidov:

I must tell you how happy I am about my work. As you know, I destroyed a symphony which I had partly composed and orchestrated in the autumn. I did wisely, for it contained little that was really fine—an empty pattern of sounds without any inspiration. Just as I was starting on my journey [the visit to Paris in December, 1892] the idea came to me for a new symphony—this time with a programme, but a programme of a kind which should be an enigma to all—let them guess it who can! The work will be entitled "A Programme Symphony" (No. 6). This programme is wholly subjective. During my journey, while composing it in my mind, I wept bitterly. Now I am home again, I have settled down to sketch out the work, and it goes with such ardor that in less than four days I have completed the first movement, while the rest of the symphony is clearly outlined in my head. There will be much that is novel in this work as regards form. For instance, the finale will not be a boisterous Allegro, but an Adagio of considerable dimensions. You can imagine what joy I feel in the conviction that my day is not yet over, and that I may still accomplish much. Perhaps I may be mistaken, but it does not seem likely. Do not speak of this to anyone but Modeste.

Five weeks later Chaikovsky has got as far as the completion of sketches for the Scherzo and the Finale. This symphony, he writes confidently to Ippolitov-Ivanov, "I shall certainly not destroy!" In the following June we find him in London, undergoing the receipt of a degree from Cambridge University and "oppressed with loneliness and nostalgia." His letters home reflect his misery. To Davidov, his nephew, to whom the Pathetic is dedidcated, he writes: "Is it not strange that of my own free will I have elected to undergo this torture? What fiend can have suggested it to me? Several times during my journey yesterday I resolved to throw the whole thing up and turn tail. . . . Yesterday I suffered so much that I could neither sleep nor eat, which is very unusual for me. I suffer not only from torments which cannot be put into words (there is one place in my new symphony—the Sixth—where they seem to me adequately expressed), but from a dislike of strangers, and an indefinable terror—though of what, the devil only knows!" An indefinable terror! Is not the Sixth Symphony full of it? To his brother Modeste he wrote: "What a number of people I see, and how tired I get! In the morning I suffer a great deal from depression. . . . I have but one thought: to get it all over. . . . This is an infernal life. Not a moment's peace: perpetual agitation, dread, homesickness, fatigue." Dread, terror—always those two pursuing demons. Dread of what, terror of what? Only the unimaginative and the eupeptic will ask that question.

In August we find Chaikovsky engrossed with his new score. "I am up to my ears in the Symphony," he wrote Modeste, "the further I go, the more difficult the orchestration becomes. Twenty years ago I would have rushed it through without a second thought, and it would have turned out all right. Now I am turning coward and have lost my self-confidence. I have been sitting all day over two pages, yet they will not come out as I wish In spite of this, the music makes progress, and I would not have accomplished so much anywhere else but at home." To Davidov he wrote twelve days later:

The Symphony is progressing. I am very well pleased with its contents, but not quite so satisfied with the orchestration. It does not realize my dreams. To me it will seem quite natural, and not in the least astonishing, if this Symphony meets with abuse, or scant appreciation at first. I cer-

[illegible] my works. I [illegible] any one of my [illegible]. On my word [illegible] honor, never in my life have I felt such self-satisfaction, such pride, such happiness, as in the consciousness that I am really the creator of this beautiful work.

On Oct. 19, Chaikovsky left Klin [his little country-house in the woods] to attend the memorial service for his friend Zvierev at Moscow and then to go on to Petersburg. "As the train passed the village of Frolovskoe," relates Modeste, "he pointed to the churchyard, remarking to his fellow travellers: 'I shall be buried there, and people will point out my grave as they go by.' He repeated this wish to be buried at Frolovskoe while talking to Taneiev at the memorial service. Beyond these two references to his death, prompted no doubt by the sad ceremony with which he was preoccupied, Chaikovsky does not appear to have shown any symptoms of depression or foreboding." Indeed, he told Kashkin at this time that he "never felt better or happier in his life." Speaking of the Sixth Symphony, he declared that he "had no doubt as to the first three movements," but that the last was "still a problem," and that perhaps, after the performance in Petersburg, he would destroy the Finale and replace it by another.

Chaikovsky arrived at Petersburg Oct.

Continued on Following Page

[illegible] China, to feel,
nd sensi-
nt end";
at sensi-
it is in-usic that evanescence
and death, the long
tretched out in vain,
gs forever away into aunted past."

nce to the Pathetic Sym-letter from Chaikovsky natol, written Feb. 22, he last year of Chaikov-to live but nine months
w wholly occupied," he new work—a symphony, me to tear myself away
it comes into existence

Music News and Reviews

Carl Flesch Soloist With Boston Symphony

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) ..... Haydn
"Stevensoniana" Suite No. 2 ..... Hill
Concerto for Violin ..... Beethoven
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Carl Flesch was the violinist.

This program was hardly one to arouse the greatest enthusiasm, although it undoubtedly pleased the ultra-conservatives, those dwellers in a musical Stone Age, who scarcely admit Wagner's music to the symphony concerts. A Haydn symphony is all very well and we for one are not averse to hearing even two or three of them in the course of a season, but the combination of one of them and the Bethoven violin concerto on the same afternoon is not a happy one.

This concerto has long been considered as a test for a violinist. In a certain sense it is one, for any violinist who can make this music interesting or appealing must indeed possess magical qualities. So far we have discovered no one who can do this for us, at least, and we have heard a respectable number of those esteemed to be among the greatest, in this piece. None may deny the sublimity of Beethoven's genius, but this does not imply that every composition from his pen is a masterpiece. Beethoven himself, in spite of the natural admiration which composers feel for their own handiwork, on various occasions expressed himself in no uncertain terms regarding compositions which did not satisfy him as his ideals of art grew and broadened. And again, why do not violinists realize that much music has been written for their instrument in these latter years which is crying for a hearing. Only Mr. Spalding has had the courage to depart from the beaten track and his experiment may well be imitated by his brethren of the bow.

Mr. Flesch's performance was of the variety which is often called "solid." By many, such a style is considered as right and proper to be listened to, particularly by the younger generation who often demand qualities which are not good for them, just as they always demand cake and candy in the place of more nourishing food. To us, solid in this connection is synonymous with dull.

Mr. Hill, the eminent professor in Harvard University, inspired by three poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," has written agreeable although not particularly distinctive music, which he has skilfully orchestrated. The movements of this suite are severally entitled "Armies in the Fire," in march rhythm; "The Dumb Soldier," which is delicately sentimental, after the manner of MacDowell, and "Pirate Story," which brings about a brilliant close. No great depth of emotion is called for by the subject of these pieces, and none is attempted. They serve to pass a few moments agreeably, without leaving behind them a deep or lasting impression. None the less they display a certain whimsical fancy which is altogether delightful and the perfection of their workmanship cannot but arouse the sincerest respect and admiration.

and garish bird, pirouetting ad strutting, is distantly like the glint and flash of Taylor's careening insects mid the sun-splashed garden, and t "danse infernale" of the ogre Kastch is comparable with the grisly effigence of Taylor's Jabberwock as it "boles" into the scenery. This Stravinsky music was heard and reviewed o a little while ago, and the early reitation was by request. There is nothi puzzling in this score of the younger ravinsky, and those present rejoiced in chance to hear it again, and form still more favorable impression.

A conservative and tempe reading of Beethoven's mighty Fift ymphony ended the excellent performe, which takes rank among the scas best.

L. W.

FIRST SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will conduct the first Sunday night Pop concert of the season at Symphony Hall tonight, offering at the same time his first Russian program. There will be special features on practically every program this week. On Tuesday night the Harvard Freshmen Glee Club will take part. The program for tonight follows:

Selection, "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds ..... Rimsky-Korsakow
Eight Popular Melodies ..... Liadow
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Gla ovsky
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Bor
Hebrew Dance ..... K oy
Procession of the Sardar.. Ippol vanov

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

A3

A4

A5

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&D
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

E — Trans Mar 22

25

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

THE SPANIARD TO THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

His "Nights in Gardens of Spain" for the First Times in America—Triple Tone-Poem for Orchestra and Piano — The Composer and His Quality — A Word About the Piece of Tomorrow

IT has been said, and with more than a grain of truth, that there is no such thing as "nationality" in music, which is a universal language. There may be dialects in it, but they do not date from Babel.

These dialects or national idiosyncrasies arose from germ ideas that emanated from the individual minds of troubadours, skalds, minstrels, bards, minnesingers and such like. These individual expressions were passed on by rote, and striking a sympathetic chord in the imagination of a people, became immensely popular, and in the course of time subtle changes crept in, and also gave birth to new emanations. This music is called folk music, because it belongs to the past and its birth is surrounded by glamorous mists. The weak point about national folk music is this—nobody can tell you when it ceased to come forth. In centuries to come it is quite possible that airs and even certain compositions that have become popular today will be catalogued as folk-music, national music. "Yes, We Have No Bananas" and "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which were the products of individuals, may attain to these celestial and hallowed heights.

Because a troubadour created a dance measure, or a measure that suggested a dance, and became very popular centuries ago, it is today called national—when it is merely associated with a given country. Because guitars were readily accessible in Spain and because the Spaniard liked this instrument and does still, it very naturally required a good quantity of music to be written for it, and hence the so-called national Spanish idiom is influenced by this instrument's rhythmic requirements.

Unless one has in one's mind previously associated a certain musical characteristic with a given Nation, or unless one realizes that the particular turn of melody or rhythm is found in popular music of a given country, it is quite impossible to say that it is Spanish, Hindu, or Finnish as the case may be. The point is that the character of a Nation existed first and long before a bard invented a personal tune which the people's character, outlook and ideals led them whole-heartedly to admire and adopt. The whole question of nationality in music is a matter of association of ideas. A man who had never heard any Finnish folk music would not on first hearing it get anything Finnish out of it, or feel in the least degree the atmosphere of Finland.

The vaudeville public can be reminded of Spain by the appearance of a few measures of a modern tango, of Germany by the "Watch on the Rhine," of England by "Rule Britannia"—yet none of these are folk songs, but are associated with each country and are therefore called national. The serious composer, when he sets out to be national, goes deeper and digs up the "Rule Britannia" and tangos of an earlier date, in fact, is more erudite, and not so obvious and the result is not so strongly representative of the nation to the average mortal, but all the more so to the erudite listener, who can associate further into the past. [illegible] write national music of any country whose folklore he has deeply studied. Folklore appears more and more to be a convenient name for art of the past, whose creation is exceedingly lazy. Rimsky-Korsakov can be very Spanish, and so can the French Debussy with his "Soirée dans Grenade" and "Iberia," Chaikovsky can be quite Italian and Bantock very Oriental without necessarily becoming naturalized into a foreign population. The bards of the past did not consciously invent music to express their nation's joys and sufferings, but it so happened that certain qualities in their music answered to a demand that was perhaps due to there being something in them that vibrated a wave of unexpressed emotion in a whole nation. Chance and circumstance caused the bard's work to be accepted, passed down from generation to generation and imitated also. Each nation's language kept the musical setting exclusively to themselves. Composers who consciously set themselves out to be national of their own nation, as for instance the "Russian Five" run a severe risk of becoming narrow minded. They are fettered and it is doubtful whether the result is as good as it could have been had they been more eclectic. The music of Borodin, Mussorgski and Dargomijski is beginning to weary us with their endless repetition, indifferent key and harmony of Russian folk melodies. Rimsky was saved by a course of severe academic study, which caused his colleagues great apprehension, and though he remained "national" he broadened his outlook, with the result that he is far ahead of the other members of the "Five."

Manuel de Falla is something the same type. He might be called the Spanish Rimsky, having a broad reach and also the loving regard of a child, for the beautiful. One admires his work not because it is Spanish so much as because it is glorious music. The history of the Spanish school is something akin to that of the British. They both flourished in the sixteenth century, Spain with her Vittoria, both were influenced for the bad by gaudy operatic Italianism in the eighteenth century. Neither country produced a composer from that date till the recent renaissence, which might be said to have begun in the middle of the last century. The modern Spanish school owes its inception to Felipe Pedrell. Some of the most sincere and entrancing modern music has come from Spain, from the minds of Granados, whom the Germans destroyed when they torpedoed the "Sussex," Albeniz, De Falla, Turina and Salazar.

Manuel de Falla, whose "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is to be played on Friday and Saturday this week at the Symphony Concerts, was born at Cadiz, 1876. His master for composition was Pedrell. At an early age he delighted to write little piano pieces; he also wrote music for the theatre, but was rather more serious minded than the Spanish audiences cared about. It was not until 1905 that he became a public figure, when he had the satisfaction of seeing his opera, "La Vida Breve," crowned by the Academia de Belles Artes. In 1907 he went to Paris where he was befriended by Debussy and Paul Dukas. In his own words, his meeting of Debussy with whom a close friendship was made, was the turning point in his career.

He now lives in one of the most romantic spots in all Spain, in Granada. He ad-

Continued on Following Page

Twice in a Concert

Beethoven's Choral Symphony so Heard in Berlin from Buelow

NOT long ago, announcing the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Boston next Sunday, this department of The Transcript inquired whether in a hundred years it had anywhere been so heard—in two concerts; in the same city; on the same day; from the same forces. The answer is yes—and not in two concerts, afternoon and evening, as at Symphony Hall, but in one. Miss Mary A. Stowell in the following letter submits the evidence:

> "In Berlin on March 6, 1889, under the leadership of Hans von Bülow, the Philharmonic Orchestra gave a 'Döppel Aufführung' of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. As I had the good fortune to be present, I speak with personal knowledge; and can also record the fact that the second performance, or repetition, was even more remarkable than the first. Many people, like myself, heard both; but it was evident that others had arranged to give their ticket-stubs to friends at the intermission, as my neighbors for the second half of the concert were almost an entirely different set of people."

FROM THE ANCIENTS, FROM THE CLASSICS, FROM THE MODERNS

MR. MONTEUX RUNS A GAMUT OF COMPOSERS

Haydn Through a Little Symphony for an Expert Orchestra—Beethoven When He Chooses to Charm, Mr. Flesch Assisting—Mr. Hill Finds Warm Voice and a New Freedom—Wagnerian Postlude

WITH a divided mind the twentieth-century hearer listens to a Symphony by Haydn as played in these days by an able conductor and an expert orchestra. Mr. Monteux fulfilled the annual rite yesterday afternoon, choosing for revival a Symphony in C major, written for the composer's concerts in London and last heard in Boston twenty years ago. Probably eight-tenths of the audience took largest pleasure in the bright flow of Haydn's melodies and in his light-fingered, transparent workmanship. By all of his symphonies that this generation knows, he is the most dependable of composers. There was the Minuet, with a pretty tune for middle measures, that ought long since to have been caught into operetta. Perhaps it has in Vienna, where the composers of trifles may also be scholarly, and none the worse for their learning. There was the circling Finale, with two or three neat motivs lightly churned into perpetual rhythmic motion. Fancy and dexterity smiled at each other through the first movement. The second sang—not out of Bach-like depths in Bach-like glows, nor yet through Mozartean melancholies—but amiably, and with sentiment as though Haydn for the instant were pressing our collective hands and looking into our collective eyes.

There is no easier music to hear than Haydn's. He is not super-sensitive and troublous like Mozart, or stressful and striding like Bach or Handel. He pleases by his matter, which seems melodious simplicity; pleases also by his manner, since it was his habit to be a good craftsman. Yet that same music is not an easy music to write. Set this Symphony in C major beside six or eight workaday symphonies out of Haydn's own Vienna in 1790, and it soon appears that such melodies as his did not come at call; while such skill as he plied was not at every finger-tip. There must be a touch of genius in his flowing measures, since none others, except Mozart's, survive from a plenteous day. There must also be a touch of divination in those easy-going modulations and mutations; for now and again, even in 1924, they do surprise the ear. And Haydn knew full well that surface-polish is preservative against the gnawing years. Less than fair, less than true is it to dismiss him as a bon homme with a nest of tunes in his head or to set him in a concert as a symphonic lollipop. Maybe, he was genius of simplicities.

Meanwhile, the other two-tenths of the audience were preferring the orchestra to the composer. Wisely Mr. Monteux reduces it until it is not too big-voiced and heavy-footed for a slender, light-paced music. Prudently, he balances the choirs so that the strings shall have no more advantage than Haydn usually gave them. Crisply and lightly he beats out a Vivace or a Rondo. He will not smear and sentimentalize through measures of sustained song. Happily unelaborated goes his Haydn. The rest he leaves to such grace and charm of phrase and accent and euphony as the string choir gained in the Minuet, to such beauty of tone as strings and reeds and horns wove about the slower-moving song. In Haydn, crystal-clear, the orchestra, if not the audience, knows the fineness of Mr. Monteux's ear.

This sensibility in the conductor and plasticity in the orchestra was salvation—Mr. Flesch materially assisting—to Beethoven's Concerto for Violin. Of course it has been played to excess at the Symphony Concerts since to and fro will the violinists go in their treadmill of Beethoven and Brahms, Mendelssohn and Chaikovsky, Lalo and Saint-Saëns, with now and then a retreat to Bach or Mozart or a side-trip into Goldmark or Glazunov. United voices cry aloud for new Concertos, for Violin but no sooner is one written—say by Elgar or Dohnányi or Schelling or Powell—than equally united voices decline to play it. Only a new masterpiece, it seems, will content these fiddlers of mediocre Mendelssohn, mechanical Saint-Saëns and empty Glazunov. Waiting to disagree about it, they wear the stock-pieces bare, which process pleases most of these virtuosi, since as they fondly believe, they can reclothe them with their particular "personality." Many times, the innocent Beethoven, who had some "personality" of his own, has been their victim. They have stifled him in elaborate mechanics; inflated him with "interpretation" given him every voice but his own.

Once within memory, Beethoven's Concerto escaped this fate—and the audience boredom—when Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck played it. Again yesterday it was as fortunate at the hands of Mr. Flesch and Mr. Monteux. Plainly, they were of one mind as to the substance and the style of the music—that it ran lightly in mellifluous song or adroit pattern-weaving; that it was designed to charm rather than impress; that it was music of artifice and fancy, not music of emotion and imagery; that the voice of the violin should thread and gleam across the voices of the orchestral background. An intimate music, a music for virtuosi, a music of all the graces and all the refinements is this Concerto. Light-toned, low-voiced, in endless shadings and euphonies, in phrases suavely moulded, in transitions finely sung [illegible] kept his orchestra. He declined to "whip up" the final Rondo till it snapped; embroidered, not stenciled, the abounding figures of the first movement; neither strained nor thickened the orchestral voices in the slow song.

Like-tempered was Mr. Flesch. His tone was silken, lustrous, fine-textured, sensitive, free from technical flaw, poised unerringly to the music. He knew grace of contour and gradient; caught the play of figure and arabesque; made ornament seem fancy and modulation impulse; wove his measures in luminous and everchanging pattern. Here sentiment colored his playing. There light rhythmic verve animated it. Again it charmed by undulation and shimmer—the fine motion, the bright reflection, of Beethoven so composing. The cadenzas were as added graces. Best of all neither conductor nor violinist overdid this elegance, this sensibility. Only in the repetitions of the Finale did the Concerto begin to cloy. Of a truth and of a verity, there are other ways with music than Mr. Schnéevoigt's — and Beethoven could also write virtuoso-pieces.

The novel music of the day was Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's Second Suite of "Stevensoniana"—no semi-failure according to precedent with sequels; rather, surprising revelation of new powers and new freedoms in the composer. Again Mr. Hill has found imaginative prompting in verses of "A Child's Garden"—from "Armies in the Fire," phantom troops in the red flame, phantom cities, fallen, in the graying embers; from "The Dumb Soldier," who buried in the turf of spring by summertime knew—and kept—many a secret of nature; from "Pirate Story" of voyaging in the basket over the meadow with the cattle for bold buccaneers. Again Mr. Hill has written with exceeding choiceness and aptness of method and means. He is not only studious, for example, of instrumental timbres; with them he is also piquant upon the ear and pricking to the imagination. By predilection and practice, he shuns the easy and apparent modulation, the convenient harmonic background. Yet in this "Stevensoniana" he neither over-labors his matter or over-subtilizes his manner. Now and again, he inclines to Ravel-like, even to "modernistic," procedures; yet he uses them in his own way. His music of the past has achieved line as well as color, integrity as well as suggestion.

The shortcoming has been an appreciable dryness of mood and expression. Imagination there was, but it never quite warmed. Zest there was, but it never cut quite free. There were signs of heat and of emancipation in the first Suite of "Stevensoniana." Now, in the second, they stand fulfilled. Not within recollection has Mr. Hill written with such gusto as in the music from "Pirate Story." His invention is fertile; his means leap to his hand. Merry-paced is the music, rocking to the gayety of the verse. Heartily the periods unfold, exuberant are the rhythms; the instrumental timbres ring; mock-merry is the catastrophe.

For once hear Mr. Hill in high spirits. Hear him also in fine intensity of mood and beauty of expression. The child-like fancies of "The Dumb Soldier" are but suggestion to him for music of > the starry hours.

> And the springing of the flowers;
> And the fairy things that pass
> In the forests of the grass.

Mute was the soldier; of these secrets and of the tell-tale talk of bee and butterfly and bird. Mr. Hill speaks out in measures that shimmer with this visioning; stir with the mystery through which it would pierce, quiver with the prompting wistfulness, echo with the haunting regret. Behind his imagination enkindled and attuned. It seeks and it gains outlet in the music; while fineness of texture and precision of means only deepen the mood, heighten the suggestion, draw closer the beauty. For once Mr. Hill has seen and known, warmed and written; whereas in the music from "Armies in the Fire," he is still at his studious contriving and resourceful suggestion. With reason, an audience, plentiful in applause for conductor and violinist, for Symphony and Concerto, redoubled for him its clapping. Given a Bostonian modernist, properly placed, and Symphony Hall of a Friday afternoon would probably ring with plaudits.

The after-piece was the music that Wagner set at the beginning of the third act of "Die Walküre" for Wotan's daughters, warrior maids, riding the tempests. For the hundredth time it silenced those who doubt his elemental might and magnificence, the flood of his invention, the sweep of his powers. It affirmed as well, by no means incidentally, the ability of Mr. Monteux to drive an orchestra.

H. T. P.

By report of the programme-book at the Symphony concert of yesterday the fund to meet the operating deficit for the musical year, 1923-24, now stands at $81,648.34. In the last fortnight, Miss Mary Appleton, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Helen Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay Frost, Mrs. H. M. Hauser of Washington, Mrs. George Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Ratshesky and Mrs. Henry H. Sherman have together added $430 to it.

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

Continued from Preceding Page

mired Debussy's "Soirées dans Grenade" because he saw in it a fairy-like dream of home. His principal works include two ballets, "El amor Brujo" (The Wizard Lover) and the "Three Cornered Hat"; an opera, above mentioned, "La Vida Breve"; "The Nights in the Gardens of Spain," first performed in Madrid, 1916 a Fantasia for pianoforte (1919); "El Retablo de Maese Pedro." 1921, "Master Peter's Puppet Show" being a work for voices and orchestra and dealing with an incident in the second part of "Don Quixote," the greatest romance ever penned, and that by his countryman, Cervantes; recently he has written a Concerto for Clavicembalo (or Pianoforte), flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and 'cello. He became world famous after the performances of "The Three Cornered Hat," by the Diaghilef Russian Ballet at the Alhambra Theatre, London.

The "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is sub-titled—"Symphonic Impressions," but though each of the three movements have a descriptive title the work is nearer to absolute music than to programme, as nearly all his instrumental work is. It is almost a pianoforte concerto, for it is scored for quite a modest orchestra, which includes the piano as a very substantial part of it.

The first movement is called "At the Généralife." The Généralife is a palace, and was the summer residence of Moorish kings. A kind of colonade, surrounds it, through the mauresque arches of which can be seen a wonderful garden, bedecked with myrtle, cypress and orange groves; bedizened with terraces, grottos and fountains. The second movement is headed "Distant Dancing," the third "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." These last two movements are played without break.

The whole work is in three-four measure, and it is amazing what ingenious rhythms the composer plays with; the work, although bearing one general time signature never shows the least sign of monotony. The first movement bears the signature of six-eight, although most of the movement is virtually in three-four.

The guitar is responsible for all the amazing rhythms that are associated with Spanish music. It is per se a rhythmic instrument. One chief characteristic of the Spanish rhythm is the use of three-four measure as six-eight and the reverse as de Falla uses it in the "Nights." Both time signatures demand six-eighth notes to the measure, and all depends on the accent as to which is being used. The guitar is to the Spaniard a medium of artistic expression as much as the piano is to us.

One is apt to regard it as a piece of stage furniture, or at most in much the same light as the accordion, concertina, banjo or other popular instruments. The saxophone is a thorough Philistine beside the dulcet guitar. It is a very significant fact that when de Falla was asked by the Révue Musicale to contribute something to "Le Tombeau de Claude Debussy," he wrote from out his heart a piece for the guitar—"Homanaje," wherein he gave complete vent to his grief at the loss of a loved one.

He spends many summer evenings with a friend in a "garden" discoursing music by Scarlatti, Albeniz and Coranados, arranged for guitar. One reads of an occasion when the babbling fountain had to be quietened by wrapping a towel round the jetties.

To appreciate de Falla's music to the full one must try to mentally familiarize oneself with the sights, and sounds that daily surround him and one will realize the best that is in these Symphonic Impressions. The Spaniards delight in the cool of the evening when they can resort to the lovely gardens after the flaming sun has gone down and left a sanctuaried calm over the day's "dead sanctities," and all is as the peace that surpasseth all understanding. A few take their guitars and woo sweet music out of the mystery that reigns supreme and the rhapsody is complete.

It is such experiences as these that gave birth to the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," wherein impressions of majestic calm, langorous dances, and lively revelling are revealed. When this work was played in London with de Falla at the piano, it won such profuse and unexpected applause, that the composer "could not make out how those stiff phlegmatic Englishmen managed to be so genuinely enthusiastic over music and his own into the bargain." Passionate beauty and clearness of design and above all sincerity will win the Bostonian likewise. Be it added and stressed that de Falla, like Sibelius the Finn, never uses any definite existing folk song, unless specifically justified, he creates the folk atmosphere without quoting. Intangible suggestions of Fandangos, Malaqueñas, Sequidillas, Polos, Soleares and other dances appear in the beautiful tapestry of this music.

An admiring writer has said: "It is the spirit rather than the letter of his

Trans Mar 22

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

THE SPANIARD TO THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

His "Nights in Gardens of Spain" for the First Times in America—Triple Tone-Poem for Orchestra and Piano — The Composer and His Quality — A Word About the Piece of Tomorrow

IT has been said, and with more than a grain of truth, that there is no such thing as "nationality" in music, which is a universal language. There may be dialects in it, but they do not date from Babel.

These dialects or national idiosyncrasies arose from germ ideas that emanated from the individual minds of troubadours, skalds, minstrels, bards, minnesingers and such like. These individual expressions were passed on by rote, and striking a sympathetic chord in the imagination of a people, became immensely popular, and in the course of time subtle changes crept in, and also gave birth to new emanations. This music is called folk music, because it belongs to the past and its birth is surrounded by glamorous mists. The weak point about national folk music is this—nobody can tell you when it ceased to come forth. In centuries to come it is quite possible that airs and even certain compositions that have become popular today will be catalogued as folk-music, national music. "Yes, We Have No Bananas" and "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which were the products of individuals, may attain to these celestial and hallowed heights.

Because a troubadour created a dance measure, or a measure that suggested a dance, and became very popular centuries ago, it is today called national—when it is merely associated with a given country. Because guitars were readily accessible in Spain and because the Spaniard liked this instrument and does still, it very naturally required a good quantity of music to be written for it, and hence the so-called national Spanish idiom is influenced by this instrument's rhythmic requirements.

Unless one has in one's mind previously associated a certain musical characteristic with a given Nation, or unless one realizes that the particular turn of melody or rhythm is found in popular music of a given country, it is quite impossible to say that it is Spanish, Hindu, or Finnish as the case may be. The point is that the character of a Nation existed first and long before a bard invented a personal tune which the people's character, outlook and ideals led them whole-heartedly to admire and adopt. The whole question of nationality in music is a matter of association of ideas. A man who had never heard any Finnish folk music would not on first hearing it get anything Finnish out of it, or feel in the least degree the atmosphere of Finland.

The vaudeville public can be reminded of Spain by the appearance of a few measures of a modern tango, of Germany by the "Watch on the Rhine," of England by "Rule Britannia"—yet none of these are folk songs, but are associated with each country and are therefore called national. The serious composer, when he sets out to be national, goes deeper and digs up the "Rule Britannia" and tangos of an earlier date, in fact, is more erudite, and not so obvious and the result is not so strongly representative of the nation to the average mortal, but all the more so to the erudite listener, who can associate further into the past and write national music of any country whose folklore he has deeply studied. Folklore appears more and more to be a convenient name for art of the past, whose creation is exceedingly lazy. Rimsky-Korsakov can be very Spanish, and so can the French Debussy with his "Soirée dans Grenade" and "Iberia," Chaikovsky can be quite Italian and Bantock very Oriental without necessarily becoming naturalized into a foreign population. The bards of the past did not consciously invent music to express their nation's joys and sufferings, but it so happened that certain qualities in their music answered to a demand that was perhaps due to there being something in them that vibrated a wave of unexpressed emotion in a whole nation. Chance and circumstance caused the bard's work to be accepted, passed down from generation to generation and imitated also. Each nation's language kept the musical setting exclusively to themselves. Composers who consciously set themselves out to be national of their own nation, as for instance the "Russian Five" run a severe risk of becoming narrow minded. They are fettered and it is doubtful whether the result is as good as it could have been had they been more eclectic. The music of Borodin, Mussorgski and Dargomijski is beginning to weary us with their endless repetition, indifferent key and harmony of Russian folk melodies. Rimsky was saved by a course of severe academic study, which caused his colleagues great apprehension, and though he remained "national" he broadened his outlook, with the result that he is far ahead of the other members of the "Five."

Manuel de Falla is something the same type. He might be called the Spanish Rimsky, having a broad reach and also the loving regard of a child, for the beautiful. One admires his work not because it is Spanish so much as because it is glorious music. The history of the Spanish school is something akin to that of the British. They both flourished in the sixteenth century, Spain with her Vittoria, both were influenced for the bad by gaudy operatic Italianism in the eighteenth century. Neither country produced a composer from that date till the recent renaissence, which might be said to have begun in the middle of the last century. The modern Spanish school owes its inception to Felipe Pedrell. Some of the most sincere and entrancing modern music has come from Spain, from the minds of Granados, whom the Germans destroyed when they torpedoed the "Sussex," Albeniz, De Falla, Tur[illegible] Galeg[illegible]

Twice in a Concert

Beethoven's Choral Symphony so Heard in Berlin from Buelow

NOT long ago, announcing the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Boston next Sunday, this department of The Transcript inquired whether in a hundred years it had anywhere been so heard—in two concerts; in the same city; on the same day; from the same forces. The answer is yes—and not in two concerts, afternoon and evening, as at Symphony Hall, but in one. Miss Mary A. Stowell in the following letter submits the evidence:

"In Berlin on March 6, 1889, under the leadership of Hans von Bülow, the Philharmonic Orchestra gave a 'Döppel Aufführung' of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. As I had the good fortune to be present, I speak with personal knowledge; and can also record the fact that the second performance, or repetition, was even more remarkable than the first. Many people, like myself, heard both; but it was evident that others had arranged to give their ticket-stubs to friends at the intermission, as my neighbors for the second half of the concert were almost an entirely different set of people."

FROM THE ANCIENTS, FROM THE CLASSICS, FROM THE MODERNS

MR. MONTEUX RUNS A GAMUT OF COMPOSERS

Haydn Through a Little Symphony for an Expert Orchestra—Beethoven When He Chooses to Charm, Mr. Flesch Assisting—Mr. Hill Finds Warm Voice and a New Freedom—Wagnerian Postlude

WITH a divided mind the twentieth-century hearer listens to a Symphony by Haydn as played in these days by an able conductor and an expert orchestra. Mr. Monteux fulfilled the annual rite yesterday afternoon, choosing for revival a Symphony in C major, written for the composer's concerts in London and last heard in Boston twenty years ago. Probably eight-tenths of the audience took largest pleasure in the bright flow of Haydn's melodies and in his light-fingered, transparent workmanship. By all of his symphonies that this generation knows, he is the most dependable of composers. There was the Minuet, with a pretty tune for middle measures, that ought long since to have been caught into operetta. Perhaps it has in Vienna, where the composers of trifles may also be scholarly, and none the worse for their learning. There was the circling Finale, with two or three neat motivs lightly churned into perpetual rhythmic motion. Fancy and dexterity smiled at each other through the first movement. The second sang—not out of Bach-like depths in Bach-like glows, nor yet through Mozartean melancholies—but amiably, and with sentiment as though Haydn for the instant were pressing our collective hands and looking into our collective eyes.

There is no easier music to hear than Haydn's. He is not super-sensitive and troublous like Mozart, or stressful and striding like Bach or Handel. He pleases by his matter, which seems melodious simplicity; pleases also by his manner, since it was his habit to be a good craftsman. Yet that same music is not an easy music to write. Set this Symphony in C major beside six or eight workaday symphonies out of Haydn's own Vienna in 1790, and it soon appears that such melodies as his did not come at call; while such skill as he plied was not at every finger-tip. There must be a touch of genius in his flowing measures, since none others, except Mozart's, survive from a plenteous day. There must also be a touch of divination in those easy-going modulations and mutations; for now and again, even in 1924, they do surprise the ear. And Haydn knew full well that surface-polish is preservative against the gnawing years. Less than fair, less than true is it to dismiss him as a bon homme with a nest of tunes in his head or to set him in a concert as a symphonic lollipop. Maybe, he was genius of simplicities.

Meanwhile, the other two-tenths of the audience were preferring the orchestra to the composer. Wisely Mr. Monteux reduces it until it is not too big-voiced and heavy-footed for a slender, light-paced music. Prudently, he balances the choirs so that the strings shall have no more advantage than Haydn usually gave them. Crisply and lightly he beats out a Vivace or a Rondo. He will not smear and sentimentalize through measures of sustained song. Happily unelaborated goes his Haydn. The rest he leaves to such grace and charm of phrase and accent and euphony as the string choir gained in the Minuet, to such beauty of tone as strings and reeds and horns wove about the slower-moving song. In Haydn, crystal-clear, the orchestra, if not the audience, knows the fineness of Mr. Monteux's ear.

This sensibility in the conductor and plasticity in the orchestra was salvation—Mr. Flesch materially assisting—to Beethoven's Concerto for Violin. Of course it has been played to excess at the Symphony Concerts since to and fro will the violinists go in their treadmill of Beethoven and Brahms, Mendelssohn and Chaikovsky, Lalo and Saint-Saëns, with now and then a retreat to Bach or Mozart or a side-trip into Goldmark or Glazunov. United voices cry aloud for new Concertos, for Violin but no sooner is one written—say by Elgar or Dohnányi or Schelling or Powell—than equally united voices decline to play it. Only a new masterpiece, it seems, will content these fiddlers of mediocre Mendelssohn, mechanical Saint-Saëns and empty Glazunov. Waiting to disagree about it, they wear the stock-pieces bare, which process pleases most of these virtuosi, since as they fondly believe, they can reclothe them with their [illegible] Many times the mired Debussy's "Soirées dans Grenade" because he saw in it a fairy-like dream of home. His principal works include two ballets, "El amor Brujo" (The Wizard Lover) and the "Three Cornered Hat"; an opera, above mentioned, "La Vida Breve"; "The Nights in the Gardens of Spain," first performed in Madrid, 1916 a Fantasia for pianoforte (1919); "El Retablo de Maese Pedro." 1921, "Master Peter's Puppet Show" being a work for voices and orchestra and dealing with an incident in the second part of "Don Quixote," the greatest romance ever penned, and that by his countryman, Cervantes; recently he has written a Concerto for Clavicembalo (or Pianoforte), flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and 'cello. He became world famous after the performances of "The Three Cornered Hat," by the Diaghilef Russian Ballet at the Alhambra Theatre, London.

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

Continued from Preceding Page

The "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is sub-titled—"Symphonic Impressions," but though each of the three movements have a descriptive title the work is nearer to absolute music than to programme, as nearly all his instrumental work is. It is almost a pianoforte concerto, for it is scored for quite a modest orchestra, which includes the piano as a very substantial part of it.

The first movement is called "At the Généralife." The Généralife is a palace, and was the summer residence of Moorish kings. A kind of colonade, surrounds it, through the mauresque arches of which can be seen a wonderful garden, bedecked with myrtle, cypress and orange groves; bedizened with terraces, grottos and fountains. The second movement is headed "Distant Dancing," the third "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." These last two movements are played without break.

The whole work is in three-four measure, and it is amazing what ingenious rhythms the composer plays with; the work, although bearing one general time signature never shows the least sign of monotony. The first movement bears the signature of six-eight, although most of the movement is virtually in three-four.

The guitar is responsible for all the amazing rhythms that are associated with Spanish music. It is per se a rhythmic instrument. One chief characteristic of the Spanish rhythm is the use of three-four measure as six-eight and the reverse as de Falla uses it in the "Nights." Both time signatures demand six-eighth notes to the measure, and all depends on the accent as to which is being used. The guitar is to the Spaniard a medium of artistic expression as much as the piano is to us.

One is apt to regard it as a piece of stage furniture, or at most in much the same light as the accordion, concertina, banjo or other popular instruments. The saxophone is a thorough Philistine beside the dulcet guitar. It is a very significant fact that when de Falla was asked by the Révue Musicale to contribute something to "Le Tombeau de Claude Debussy," he wrote from out his heart a piece for the guitar—"Homanaje," wherein he gave complete vent to his grief at the loss of a loved one.

He spends many summer evenings with a friend in a "garden" discoursing music by Scarlatti, Albeniz and Coranados, arranged for guitar. One reads of an occasion when the babbling fountain had to be quietened by wrapping a towel round the jetties.

To appreciate de Falla's music to the full one must try to mentally familiarize oneself with the sights, and sounds that daily surround him and one will realize the best that is in these Symphonic Impressions. The Spaniards delight in the cool of the evening when they can resort to the lovely gardens after the flaming sun has gone down and left a sanctuaried calm over the day's "dead sanctities," and all is as the peace that surpasseth all understanding. A few take their guitars and woo sweet music out of the mystery that reigns supreme and the rhapsody is complete.

It is such experiences as these that gave birth to the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," wherein impressions of majestic calm, langorous dances, and lively revelling are revealed. When this work was played in London with de Falla at the piano, it won such profuse and unexpected applause, that the composer "could not make out how those stiff phlegmatic Englishmen managed to be so genuinely enthusiastic over music and his own into the bargain." Passionate beauty and clearness of design and above all sincerity will win the Bostonian likewise. Be it added and stressed that de Falla, like Sibelius the Finn, never uses any definite existing folk song, unless specifically justified, he creates the folk atmosphere without quoting. Intangible suggestions of Fandangos, Malaqueñas, Sequidillas, Polos, Soleares and other dances appear in the beautiful tapestry of this music.

An admiring writer has said: "It is the spirit rather than the letter of his country's music that he renders, and his language is more properly described as expressive and evocative than as descriptive or formalistic. This combination of nationality (sic) and personality gives to his music a complex character that makes it more difficult to grasp than a certain surface picturesqueness might lead one to think, but it is precisely this difficulty which makes it doubly interesting and imparts to it a lasting solid value beyond its immediate sensuous fascination that must strike every hearer."

To conclude—the interesting themes, the beauty and originality of the orchestration, the passionate seriousness and sincerity of the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" make it one of the most memorable and outstanding works for pianoforte and orchestra which have been written and heard of recent years, and give de Falla a well deserved place in the list of Spanish composers headed by Vittoria, four centuries ago, and crowned by Grandaos in our own day. And whether or not there is anything really nationally inherent in a country's music, this "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" could not have been written with such superb and masterly touch by anyone but a Spaniard of Spain, and we shall, with Walter de la Mare.

Hear her strange lutes on the green banks.
Ring loud with the grief and delight
Of the dim-silked, dark-haired musicians
In the brooding silence of night.

L. V. P.

Richard

Harvard Graduate and Foreign Co[illegible]

RUMORS of the split in the Russian Soviet ranks, presaging the collapse of Bolshevism, were confirmed on the arrival in Boston of Richard Eaton, foreign correspondent and author and a Harvard graduate, who was imprisoned and sentenced to death in Moscow on a charge of espionage, while conducting a special investigation of conditions in Russia for the London Daily Mail, Le Matin and La Nation Belge.

Mr. Eaton will reveal facts he unearthed concerning Russia's plight, which have not been allowed to appear in censored news despatches, in a lecture in Jordan Hall, Sunday, March 30. He will be in-

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

E

TRANS Mar 22.

25

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

THE SPANIARD TO THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

His "Nights in Gardens of Spain" for the First Times in America—Triple Tone-Poem for Orchestra and Piano — The Composer and His Quality — A Word About the Piece of Tomorrow

IT has been said, and with more than a grain of truth, that there is no such thing as "nationality" in music, which is a universal language. There may be dialects in it, but they do not date from Babel.

These dialects or national idiosyncrasies arose from germ ideas that emanated from the individual minds of troubadours, skalds, minstrels, bards, minnesingers and such like. These individual expressions were passed on by rote, and striking a sympathetic chord in the imagination of a people, became immensely popular, and in the course of time subtle changes crept in, and also gave birth to new emanations. This music is called folk music, because it belongs to the past and its birth is surrounded by glamorous mists. The weak point about national folk music is this—nobody can tell you when it ceased to come forth. In centuries to come it is quite possible that airs and even certain compositions that have become popular today will be catalogued as folk-music, national music. "Yes, We Have No Bananas" and "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which were the products of individuals, may attain to these celestial and hallowed heights.

Because a troubadour created a dance measure, or a measure that suggested a dance, and became very popular centuries ago, it is today called national—when it is merely associated with a given country. Because guitars were readily accessible in Spain and because the Spaniard liked this instrument and does still, it very naturally required a good quantity of music to be written for it, and hence the so-called national Spanish idiom is influenced by this instrument's rhythmic requirements.

Unless one has in one's mind previously associated a certain musical characteristic with a given Nation, or unless one realizes that the particular turn of melody or rhythm is found in popular music of a given country, it is quite impossible to say that it is Spanish, Hindu, or Finnish as the case may be. The point is that the character of a Nation existed first and long before a bard invented a personal tune which the people's character, outlook and ideals led them whole-heartedly to admire and adopt. The whole question of nationality in music is a matter of association of ideas. A man who had never heard any Finnish folk music would not on first hearing it get anything Finnish out of it, or feel in the least degree the atmosphere of Finland.

The vaudeville public can be reminded of Spain by the appearance of a few measures of a modern tango, of Germany by the "Watch on the Rhine," of England by "Rule Britannia"—yet none of these are folk songs, but are associated with each country and are therefore called national. The serious composer, when he sets out to be national, goes deeper and digs up the "Rule Britannia" and tangos of an earlier date, in fact, is more erudite, and not so obvious and the result is not so strongly representative of the nation to the average mortal, but all the more so to the erudite listener, who can associate further into the past. [illegible] write national music of any country whose folklore he has deeply studied. Folklore appears more and more to be a convenient name for art of the past, whose creation is exceedingly lazy. Rimsky-Korsakov can be very Spanish, and so can the French Debussy with his "Soirée dans Grenade" and "Iberia," Chaikovsky can be quite Italian and Bantock very Oriental without necessarily becoming naturalized into a foreign population. The bards of the past did not consciously invent music to express their nation's joys and sufferings, but it so happened that certain qualities in their music answered to a demand that was perhaps due to there being something in them that vibrated a wave of unexpressed emotion in a whole nation. Chance and circumstance caused the bard's work to be accepted, passed down from generation to generation and imitated also. Each nation's language kept the musical setting exclusively to themselves. Composers who consciously set themselves out to be national of their own nation, as for instance the "Russian Five" run a severe risk of becoming narrow minded. They are fettered and it is doubtful whether the result is as good as it could have been had they been more eclectic. The music of Borodin, Mussorgski and Dargomijski is beginning to weary us with their endless repetition, indifferent key and harmony of Russian folk melodies. Rimsky was saved by a course of severe academic study, which caused his colleagues great apprehension, and though he remained "national" he broadened his outlook, with the result that he is far ahead of the other members of the "Five."

Manuel de Falla is something the same type. He might be called the Spanish Rimsky, having a broad reach and also the loving regard of a child, for the beautiful. One admires his work not because it is Spanish so much as because it is glorious music. The history of the Spanish school is something akin to that of the British. They both flourished in the sixteenth century, Spain with her Vittoria, both were influenced for the bad by gaudy operatic Italianism in the eighteenth century. Neither country produced a composer from that date till the recent renaissence, which might be said to have begun in the middle of the last century. The modern Spanish school owes its inception to Felipe Pedrell. Some of the most sincere and entrancing modern music has come from Spain, from the minds of Granados, whom the Germans destroyed when they torpedoed the "Sussex," Albeniz, De Falla, Turina and Salazar.

Manuel de Falla, whose "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is to be played on Friday and Saturday this week at the Symphony Concerts, was born at Cadiz, 1876. His master for composition was Pedrell. At an early age he delighted to write little piano pieces; he also wrote music for the theatre, but was rather more serious minded than the Spanish audiences cared about. It was not until 1905 that he became a public figure, when he had the satisfaction of seeing his opera, "La Vida Breve," crowned by the Academia de Belles Artes. In 1907 he went to Paris where he was befriended by Debussy and Paul Dukas. In his own words, his meeting of Debussy with whom a close friendship was made, was the turning point in his career.

He now lives in one of the most romantic spots in all Spain, in Granada. He ad-

Continued on Following Page

Twice in a Concert

Beethoven's Choral Symphony so Heard in Berlin from Buelow

NOT long ago, announcing the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Boston next Sunday, this department of The Transcript inquired whether in a hundred years it had anywhere been so heard—in two concerts; in the same city; on the same day; from the same forces. The answer is yes—and not in two concerts, afternoon and evening, as at Symphony Hall, but in one. Miss Mary A. Stowell in the following letter submits the evidence:

"In Berlin on March 6, 1889, under the leadership of Hans von Bülow, the Philharmonic Orchestra gave a 'Döppel Aufführung' of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. As I had the good fortune to be present, I speak with personal knowledge; and can also record the fact that the second performance, or repetition, was even more remarkable than the first. Many people, like myself, heard both; but it was evident that others had arranged to give their ticket-stubs to friends at the intermission, as my neighbors for the second half of the concert were almost an entirely different set of people."

FROM THE ANCIENTS, FROM THE CLASSICS, FROM THE MODERNS

MR. MONTEUX RUNS A GAMUT OF COMPOSERS

Haydn Through a Little Symphony for an Expert Orchestra—Beethoven When He Chooses to Charm, Mr. Flesch Assisting—Mr. Hill Finds Warm Voice and a New Freedom—Wagnerian Postlude

WITH a divided mind the twentieth-century hearer listens to a Symphony by Haydn as played in these days by an able conductor and an expert orchestra. Mr. Monteux fulfilled the annual rite yesterday afternoon, choosing for revival a Symphony in C major, written for the composer's concerts in London and last heard in Boston twenty years ago. Probably eight-tenths of the audience took largest pleasure in the bright flow of Haydn's melodies and in his light-fingered, transparent workmanship. By all of his symphonies that this generation knows, he is the most dependable of composers. There was the Minuet, with a pretty tune for middle measures, that ought long since to have been caught into operetta. Perhaps it has in Vienna, where the composers of trifles may also be scholarly, and none the worse for their learning. There was the circling Finale, with two or three neat motivs lightly churned into perpetual rhythmic motion. Fancy and dexterity smiled at each other through the first movement. The second sang—not out of Bach-like depths in Bach-like glows, nor yet through Mozartean melancholies—but amiably, and with sentiment as though Haydn for the instant were pressing our collective hands and looking into our collective eyes.

There is no easier music to hear than Haydn's. He is not super-sensitive and troublous like Mozart, or stressful and striding like Bach or Handel. He pleases by his matter, which seems melodious simplicity; pleases also by his manner, since it was his habit to be a good craftsman. Yet that same music is not an easy music to write. Set this Symphony in C major beside six or eight workaday symphonies out of Haydn's own Vienna in 1790, and it soon appears that such melodies as his did not come at call; while such skill as he plied was not at every finger-tip. There must be a touch of genius in his flowing measures, since none others, except Mozart's, survive from a plenteous day. There must also be a touch of divination in those easy-going modulations and mutations; for now and again, even in 1924, they do surprise the ear. And Haydn knew full well that surface-polish is preservative against the gnawing years. Less than fair, less than true is it to dismiss him as a bon homme with a nest of tunes in his head or to set him in a concert as a symphonic lollipop. Maybe, he was genius of simplicities.

Meanwhile, the other two-tenths of the audience were preferring the orchestra to the composer. Wisely Mr. Monteux reduces it until it is not too big-voiced and heavy-footed for a slender, light-paced music. Prudently, he balances the choirs so that the strings shall have no more advantage than Haydn usually gave them. Crisply and lightly he beats out a Vivace or a Rondo. He will not smear and sentimentalize through measures of sustained song. Happily unelaborated goes his Haydn. The rest he leaves to such grace and charm of phrase and accent and euphony as the string choir gained in the Minuet, to such beauty of tone as strings and reeds and horns wove about the slower-moving song. In Haydn, crystal-clear, the orchestra, if not the audience, knows the fineness of Mr. Monteux's ear.

This sensibility in the conductor and plasticity in the orchestra was salvation—Mr. Flesch materially assisting—to Beethoven's Concerto [redacted] Violin. Of course it has been played to excess at the Symphony Concerts since to and fro will the violinists go in their treadmill of Beethoven and Brahms, Mendelssohn and Chaikovsky, Lalo and Saint-Saëns, with now and then a retreat to Bach or Mozart or a side-trip into Goldmark or Glazunov. United voices cry aloud for new Concertos, for Violin but no sooner is one written—say by Elgar or Dohnányi or Schelling or Powell—than equally united voices decline to play it. Only a new masterpiece, it seems, will content these fiddlers of mediocre Mendelssohn, mechanical Saint-Saëns and empty Glazunov. Waiting to disagree about it, they wear the stock-pieces bare, which process pleases most of these virtuosi, since as they fondly believe, they can reclothe them with their particular "personality." Many times, the innocent Beethoven, who had some "personality" of his own, has been their victim. They have stifled him in elaborate mechanics; inflated him with "interpretation" given him every voice but his own.

Once within memory, Beethoven's Concerto escaped this fate—and the audience boredom—when Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck played it. Again yesterday it was as fortunate at the hands of Mr. Flesch and Mr. Monteux. Plainly, they were of one mind as to the substance and the style of the music—that it ran lightly in mellifluous song or adroit pattern-weaving; that it was designed to charm rather than impress; that it was music of artifice and fancy, not music of emotion and imagery; that the voice of the violin should thread and gleam across the voices of the orchestral background. An intimate music, a music for virtuosi, a music of all the graces and all the refinements is this Concerto. Light-toned, low-voiced, in endless shadings and euphonies, in phrases suavely moulded, in transitions [illegible] orchestra. He declined to "whip up" the final Rondo till it snapped; embroid- has written with exceeding choiceness and aptness of method and means. He is not only studious, for example, of instrumental timbres; with them he is also piquant upon the ear and pricking to the imagination. By predilection and practice, he shuns the easy and apparent modulation, the convenient harmonic background. Yet in this "Stevensoniana" he neither over-labors his matter or over-subtilizes his manner. Now and again, he inclines to Ravel-like, even to "modernistic," procedures; yet he uses them in his own way. His music of the past has achieved line as well as color, integrity as well as suggestion.

The shortcoming has been an appreciable dryness of mood and expression. Imagination there was, but it never quite warmed. Zest there was, but it never cut quite free. There were signs of heat and of emancipation in the first Suite of "Stevensoniana." Now, in the second, they stand fulfilled. Not within recollection has Mr. Hill written [illegible] as in the music from timbres ring; mock-merry is the catastrophe.

For once hear Mr. Hill in high spirits. Hear him also in fine intensity of mood and beauty of expression. The child-like fancies of "The Dumb Soldier" are but suggestion to him for music of > the starry hours.

> And the springing of the flowers;
> And the fairy things that pass
> In the forests of the grass.

Mute was the soldier; of these secrets and of the tell-tale talk of bee and butterfly and bird. Mr. Hill speaks out in measures that shimmer with this visioning; stir with the mystery through which it would pierce, quiver with the prompting wistfulness, echo with the haunting regret. Behind his imagination enkindled and attuned, it seeks and it gains outlet in the music; while fineness of texture and precision of means only deepen the mood, heighten the suggestion, draw closer the beauty. For once mired Debussy's "Soirèes dans Grenade" because he saw in it a fairy-like dream of home. His principal works include two ballets, "El amor Brujo" (The Wizard Lover) and the "Three Cornered Hat"; an opera, above mentioned, "La Vida Breve"; "The Nights in the Gardens of Spain," first performed in Madrid, 1916 a Fantasia for pianoforte (1919); "El Retablo de Maese Pedro." 1921, "Master Peter's Puppet Show" being a work for voices and orchestra and dealing with an incident in the second part of "Don Quixote," the greatest romance ever penned, and that by his countryman, Cervantes; recently he has written a Concerto for Clavicembalo (or pianoforte), flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and 'cello. He became world famous after the performances of "The Three Cornered Hat," by the Diaghilef Russian Ballet at the Alhambra Theatre, London.

PIERRE MONTEUX AGAIN PRESENTS MANUEL DE FALLA

Continued from Preceding Page

The "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is sub-titled—"Symphonic Impressions," but though each of the three movements have a descriptive title the work is nearer to absolute music than to programme, as nearly all his instrumental work is. It is almost a pianoforte concerto, for it is scored for quite a modest orchestra, which includes the piano as a very substantial part of it.

The first movement is called "At the Généralife." The Généralife is a palace, and was the summer residence of Moorish kings. A kind of colonade, surrounds it, through the mauresque arches of which can be seen a wonderful garden, bedecked with myrtle, cypress and orange groves; bedizened with terraces, grottos and fountains. The second movement is headed "Distant Dancing," the third "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." These last two movements are played without break.

The whole work is in three-four measure, and it is amazing what ingenious rhythms the composer plays with; the work, although bearing one general time signature never shows the least sign of monotony. The first movement bears the signature of six-eight, although most of the movement is virtually in three-four.

The guitar is responsible for all the amazing rhythms that are associated with Spanish music. It is per se a rhythmic instrument. One chief characteristic of the Spanish rhythm is the use of three-four measure as six-eight and the reverse as de Falla uses it in the "Nights." Both time signatures demand six-eighth notes to the measure, and all depends on the accent as to which is being used. The guitar is to the Spaniard a medium of artistic expression as much as the piano is to us.

One is apt to regard it as a piece of stage furniture, or at most in much the same light as the accordion, concertina, banjo or other popular instruments. The saxophone is a thorough Philistine beside the dulcet guitar. It is a very significant fact that when de Falla was asked by the Révue Musicale to contribute something to "Le Tombeau de Claude Debussy," he wrote from out his heart a piece for the guitar—"Homanaje," wherein he gave complete vent to his grief at the loss of a loved one.

He spends many summer evenings with a friend in a "garden" discoursing music by Scarlatti, Albeniz and Coranados, arranged for guitar. One reads of an occasion when the babbling fountain had to be quietened by wrapping a towel round the jetties.

To appreciate de Falla's music to the full one must try to mentally familiarize oneself with the sights, and sounds that daily surround him and one will realize the best that is in these Symphonic Impressions. The Spaniards delight in the cool of the evening when they can resort to the lovely gardens after the flaming sun has gone down and left a sanctuaried calm over the day's "dead sanctities," and all is as the peace that surpasseth all understanding. A few take their guitars and woo sweet music out of the mystery that reigns supreme and the rhapsody is complete.

It is such experiences as these that gave birth to the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," wherein impressions of majestic calm, langorous dances, and lively revelling are revealed. When this work was played in London with de Falla at the piano, it won such profuse and unexpected applause, that the composer "could not make out how those stiff phlegmatic Englishmen managed to be so genuinely enthusiastic over music and his own into the bargain." Passionate beauty and clearness of design and above all sincerity will win the Bostonian likewise. Be it added and stressed that de Falla, like Sibelius the Finn, never uses any definite existing folk song, unless specifically justified, he creates the folk atmosphere without quoting. Intang'ble suggestions of Fandangos, Malaqueñas, Sequidillas, Polos, Soleares and other dances appear in the beautiful tapestry of this music.

An admiring writer has said: "It is the spirit rather than the letter of his arose from germ ideas that emanated from the individual minds of troubadours, skalds, minstrels, bards, minnesingers and such like. These individual expressions were passed on by rote, and striking a sympathetic chord in the imagination of a people, became immensely popular, and in the course of time subtle changes crept in, and also gave birth to new emanations. This music is called folk music, because it belongs to the past and its birth is surrounded by glamorous mists. The weak point about national folk music is this—nobody can tell you when it ceased to come forth. In centuries to come it is quite possible that airs and even certain compositions that have become popular today will be catalogued as folk-music, national music. "Yes, We Have No Bananas" and "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which were the products of individuals, may attain to these celestial and hallowed heights.

Because a troubadour created a dance measure, or a measure that suggested a dance, and became very popular centuries ago, it is today called national—when it is merely associated with a given country. Because guitars were readily accessible in Spain and because the Spaniard liked this instrument and does still, it very naturally required a good quantity of music to be written for it, and hence the so-called national Spanish idiom is influenced by this instrument's rhythmic requirements.

Unless one has in one's mind previously associated a certain musical characteristic with a given Nation, or unless one realizes that the particular turn of melody or rhythm is found in popular music of a given country, it is quite impossible to say that it is Spanish, Hindu, or Finnish as the case may be. The point is that the character of a Nation existed first and long before a bard invented a personal tune which the people's character, outlook, and ideals led them whole-heartedly to admire and adopt. The whole question of nationality in music is a matter of association of ideas. A man who had never heard any Finnish folk music would not on first hearing it get anything Finnish out of it, or feel in the least degree the atmosphere of Finland.

The vaudeville public can be reminded of Spain by the appearance of a few measures of a modern tango, of Germany by the "Watch on the Rhine," of England by "Rule Britannia"—yet none of these are folk songs, but are associated with each country and are therefore called national. The serious composer, when he sets out to be national, goes deeper and digs up the "Rule Britannia" and tangos of an earlier date, in fact, is more erudite, and not so obvious and the result is not so strongly representative of the nation to the average mortal, but all the more so to the erudite listener, who can associate further into the past.

write national music of any country whose folklore he has deeply studied. Folklore appears more and more to be a convenient name for art of the past, whose creation is exceedingly lazy. Rimsky-Korsakov can be very Spanish, and so can the French Debussy with his "Soirée dans Grenade" and "Iberia," Chaikovsky can be quite Italian and Bantock very Oriental without necessarily becoming naturalized into a foreign population. The bards of the past did not consciously invent music to express their nation's joys and sufferings, but it so happened that certain qualities in their music answered to a demand that was perhaps due to there being something in them that vibrated a wave of unexpressed emotion in a whole nation. Chance and circumstance caused the bard's work to be accepted, passed down from generation to generation and imitated also. Each nation's language kept the musical setting exclusively to themselves. Composers who consciously set themselves out to be national of their own nation, as for instance the "Russian Five" run a severe risk of becoming narrow minded. They are fettered and it is doubtful whether the result is as good as it could have been had they been more eclectic. The music of Borodin, Mussorgski and Dargomijski is beginning to weary us with their endless repetition, indifferent key and harmony of Russian folk melodies. Rimsky was saved by a course of severe academic study, which caused his colleagues great apprehension, and though he remained "national" he broadened his outlook, with the result that he is far ahead of the other members of the "Five."

Manuel de Falla is something the same type. He might be called the Spanish Rimsky, having a broad reach and also the loving regard of a child, for the beautiful. One admires his work not because it is Spanish so much as because it is glorious music. The history of the Spanish school is something akin to that of the British. They both flourished in the sixteenth century, Spain with her Vittoria, both were influenced for the bad by gaudy operatic Italianism in the eighteenth century. Neither country produced a composer from that date till the recent renaissence, which might be said to have begun in the middle of the last century. The modern Spanish school owes its inception to Felipe Pedrell. Some of the most sincere and entrancing modern music has come from Spain, from the minds of Granados, whom the Germans destroyed when they torpedoed the "Sussex," Albeniz, De Falla, Turina and Salazar.

Manuel de Falla, whose "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is to be played on Friday and Saturday this week at the Symphony Concerts, was born at Cadiz, 1876. His master for composition was Pedrell. At an early age he delighted to write little piano pieces; he also wrote music for the theatre, but was rather more serious minded than the Spanish audiences cared about. It was not until 1905 that he became a public figure, when he had the satisfaction of seeing his opera, "La Vida Breve," crowned by the Academia de Belles Artes. In 1907 he went to Paris where he was befriended by Debussy and Paul Dukas. In his own words, his meeting of Debussy with whom a close friendship was made, was the turning point in his career.

He now lives in one of the most romantic spots in all Spain, in Granada. He ad-

Continued on Following Page

Twice in a Concert

Beethoven's Choral Symphony so Heard in Berlin from Buelow

NOT long ago, announcing the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Boston next Sunday, this department of The Transcript inquired whether in a hundred years it had anywhere been so heard—in two concerts; in the same city; on the same day; from the same forces. The answer is yes—and not in two concerts, afternoon and evening, as at Symphony Hall, but in one. Miss Mary A. Stowell in the following letter submits the evidence:

> "In Berlin on March 6, 1889, under the leadership of Hans von Bülow, the Philharmonic Orchestra gave a 'Döppel Aufführung' of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. As I had the good fortune to be present, I speak with personal knowledge; and can also record the fact that the second performance, or repetition, was even more remarkable than the first. Many people, like myself, heard both; but it was evident that others had arranged to give their ticket-stubs to friends at the intermission, as my neighbors for the second half of the concert were almost an entirely different set of people."

...orchestra. He declined to "whip up" the final Rondo till it snapped; embroidered, not stenciled, the abounding figures of the first movement; neither strained nor thickened the orchestral voices in the slow song.

Like-tempered was Mr. Flesch. His tone was silken, lustrous, fine-textured, sensitive, free from technical flaw, poised unerringly to the music. He knew grace of contour and gradient; caught the play of figure and arabesque; made ornament seem fancy and modulation impulse; wove his measures in luminous and everchanging pattern. Here sentiment colored his playing. There light rhythmic verve animated it. Again it charmed by undulation and shimmer—the fine motion, the bright reflection, of Beethoven so composing. The cadenzas were as added graces. Best of all neither conductor nor violinist overdid this elegance, this sensibility. Only in the repetitions of the Finale did the Concerto begin to cloy. Of a truth and of a verity, there are other ways with music than Mr. Schnéevoigt's — and Beethoven could also write virtuoso-pieces.

The novel music of the day was Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's Second Suite of "Stevensoniana"—no semi-failure according to precedent with sequels; rather, surprising revelation of new powers and new freedoms in the composer. Again Mr. Hill has found imaginative prompting in verses of "A Child's Garden"—from "Armies in the Fire," phantom troops in the red flame, phantom cities, fallen, in the graying embers; from "The Dumb Soldier," who buried in the turf of spring by summertime knew—and kept—many a secret of nature; from "Pirate Story" of voyaging in the basket over the meadow with the cattle for bold buccaneers. Again Mr. Hill

...concerts in London and last ...heard in Boston twenty years ago. Probably eight-tenths of the audience took largest pleasure in the bright flow of Haydn's melodies and in his light-fingered, transparent workmanship. By all of his symphonies that this generation knows, he is the most dependable of composers. There was the Minuet, with a pretty tune for middle measures, that ought long since to have been caught into operetta. Perhaps it has in Vienna, where the composers of trifles may also be scholarly, and none the worse for their learning. There was the circling Finale, with two or three neat motivs lightly churned into perpetual rhythmic motion. Fancy and dexterity smiled at each other through the first movement. The second sang—not out of Bach-like depths in Bach-like glows, nor yet through Mozartean melancholies—but amiably, and with sentiment as though Haydn for the instant were pressing our collective hands and looking into our collective eyes.

There is no easier music to hear than Haydn's. He is not super-sensitive and troublous like Mozart, or stressful and striding like Bach or Handel. He pleases by his matter, which seems melodious simplicity; pleases also by his manner, since it was his habit to be a good craftsman. Yet that same music is not an easy music to write. Set this Symphony in C major beside six or eight workaday symphonies out of Haydn's own Vienna in 1790, and it soon appears that such melodies as his did not come at call; while such skill as he plied was not at every finger-tip. There must be a touch of genius in his flowing measures, since none others, except Mozart's, survive from a plenteous day. There must also be a touch of divination in those easy-going modulations and mutations; for now and again, even in 1924, they do surprise the ear. And Haydn knew full well that surface-polish is preservative against the gnawing years. Less than fair, less than true is it to dismiss him as a bon homme with a nest of tunes in his head or to set him in a concert as a symphonic lollipop. Maybe, he was genius of simplicities.

Meanwhile, the other two-tenths of the audience were preferring the orchestra to the composer. Wisely Mr. Monteux reduces it until it is not too big-voiced and heavy-footed for a slender, light-paced music. Prudently, he balances the choirs so that the strings shall have no more advantage than Haydn usually gave them. Crisply and lightly he beats out a Vivace or a Rondo. He will not smear and sentimentalize through measures of sustained song. Happily unelaborated goes his Haydn. The rest he leaves to such grace and charm of phrase and accent and euphony as the string choir gained in the Minuet, to such beauty of tone as strings and reeds and horns wove about the slower-moving song. In Haydn, crystal-clear, the orchestra, if not the audience, knows the fineness of Mr. Monteux's ear.

This sensibility in the conductor and plasticity in the orchestra was salvation—Mr. Flesch materially assisting—to Beethoven's Concerto [redacted] Violin. Of course it has been played to excess at the Symphony Concerts since to and fro will the violinists go in their treadmill of Beethoven and Brahms, Mendelssohn and Chaikovsky, Lalo and Saint-Saëns, with now and then a retreat to Bach or Mozart or a side-trip into Goldmark or Glazunov. United voices cry aloud for new Concertos, for Violin but no sooner is one written—say by Elgar or Dohnányi or Schelling or Powell—than equally united voices decline to play it. Only a new masterpiece, it seems, will content these fiddlers of mediocre Mendelssohn, mechanical Saint-Saëns and empty Glazunov. Waiting to disagree about it, they wear the stock-pieces bare, which process pleases most of these virtuosi, since as they fondly believe, they can reclothe them with their particular "personality." Many times, the innocent Beethoven, who had some "personality" of his own, has been their victim. They have stifled him in elaborate mechanics; inflated him with "interpretation" given him every voice but his own.

Once within memory, Beethoven's Concerto escaped this fate—and the audience boredom—when Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck played it. Again yesterday it was as fortunate at the hands of Mr. Flesch and Mr. Monteux. Plainly, they were of one mind as to the substance and the style of the music—that it ran lightly in mellifluous song or adroit pattern-weaving; that it was designed to charm rather than impress; that it was music of artifice and fancy, not music of emotion and imagery; that the voice of the violin should thread and gleam across the voices of the orchestral background. An intimate music, a music for virtuosi, a music of all the graces and all the refinements is this Concerto. Light-toned, low-voiced, in endless shadings and euphonies, in phrases suavely moulded, in transitions [illegible]

"Pirate Story." His invention is fertile; his means leap to his hand. Merry-paced is the music, rocking to the gayety of the verse. Heartily the periods unfold, exuberant are the rhythms; the instrumental sub-titled—"Symphonic Impressions," but though each of the three movements have a descriptive title the work is nearer to absolute music than to programme, as nearly all his instrumental work is. It is almost a pianoforte concerto, for it is scored for quite a modest orchestra, which includes the piano as a very substantial part of it.

The first movement is called "At the Généralife." The Généralife is a palace, and was the summer residence of Moorish kings. A kind of colonade, surrounds it, through the mauresque arches of which can be seen a wonderful garden, bedecked with myrtle, cypress and orange groves; bedizened with terraces, grottos and fountains. The second movement is headed "Distant Dancing," the third "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." These last two movements are played without break.

The whole work is in three-four measure, and it is amazing what ingenious rhythms the composer plays with; the work, although bearing one general time signature never shows the least sign of monotony. The first movement bears the signature of six-eight, although most of the movement is virtually in three-four.

The guitar is responsible for all the amazing rhythms that are associated with Spanish music. It is per se a rhythmic instrument. One chief characteristic of the Spanish rhythm is the use of three-four measure as six-eight and the reverse as de Falla uses it in the "Nights." Both time signatures demand six-eighth notes to the measure, and all depends on the accent as to which is being used. The guitar is to the Spaniard a medium of artistic expression as much as the piano is to us.

One is apt to regard it as a piece of stage furniture, or at most in much the same light as the accordion, concertina, banjo or other popular instruments. The saxophone is a thorough Philistine beside the dulcet guitar. It is a very significant fact that when de Falla was asked by the Révue Musicale to contribute something to "Le Tombeau de Claude Debussy," he wrote from out his heart a piece for the guitar—"Homanaje," wherein he gave complete vent to his grief at the loss of a loved one.

He spends many summer evenings with a friend in a "garden" discoursing music by Scarlatti, Albeniz and Coranados, arranged for guitar. One reads of an occasion when the babbling fountain had to be quietened by wrapping a towel round the jetties.

To appreciate de Falla's music to the full one must try to mentally familiarize oneself with the sights, and sounds that daily surround him and one will realize the best that is in these Symphonic Impressions. The Spaniards delight in the cool of the evening when they can resort to the lovely gardens after the flaming sun has gone down and left a sanctuaried calm over the day's "dead sanctities," and all is as the peace that surpasseth all understanding. A few take their guitars and woo sweet music out of the mystery that reigns supreme and the rhapsody is complete.

It is such experiences as these that gave birth to the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," wherein impressions of majestic calm, langorous dances, and lively revelling are revealed. When this work was played in London with de Falla at the piano, it won such profuse and unexpected applause, that the composer "could not make out how those stiff phlegmatic Englishmen managed to be so genuinely enthusiastic over music and his own into the bargain." Passionate beauty and clearness of design and above all sincerity will win the Bostonian likewise. Be it added and stressed that de Falla, like Sibelius the Finn, never uses any definite existing folk song, unless specifically justified, he creates the folk atmosphere without quoting. Intang'ble suggestions of Fandangos, Malaqueñas, Sequidillas, Polos, Soleares and other dances appear in the beautiful tapestry of this music.

An admiring writer has said: "It is the spirit rather than the letter of his

...has written with exceeding choiceness and aptness of method and means. He is not only studious, for example, of instrumental timbres; with them he is also piquant upon the ear and pricking to the imagination. By predilection and practice, he shuns the easy and apparent modulation, the convenient harmonic background. Yet in this "Stevensoniana" he neither over-labors his matter or over-subtilizes his manner. Now and again, he inclines to Ravel-like, even to "modernistic," procedures; yet he uses them in his own way. His music of the past has achieved line as well as color, integrity as well as suggestion.

The shortcoming has been an appreciable dryness of mood and expression. Imagination there was, but it never quite warmed. Zest there was, but it never cut quite free. There were signs of heat and of emancipation in the first Suite of "Stevensoniana." Now, in the second, they stand fulfilled. Not within recollection has Mr. Hill written with such purity as in the music from

...timbres ring; mock-merry is the catastrophe.

For once hear Mr. Hill in high spirits. Hear him also in fine intensity of mood and beauty of expression. The child-like fancies of "The Dumb Soldier" are but suggestion to him for music of > the starry hours.

> And the sprihging of the flowers;
> And the fairy things that pass
> In the forests of the grass.

Mute was the soldier; of these secrets and of the tell-tale talk of bee and butterfly and bird. Mr. Hill speaks out in measures that shimmer with this visioning; stir with the mystery through which it would pierce, quiver with the prompting wistfulness, echo with the haunting regret. Behind his imagination enkindled and attuned. It seeks and it gains outlet in the music; while fineness of texture and precision of means only deepen the mood, heighten the suggestion, draw closer the beauty. For once

...Hill has seen and known, warmed and ...ritten; whereas in the music from "Armies ...the Fire," he is still at his studious contriving and resourceful suggestion. With reason, an audience, plentiful in applause for conductor and violinist, for Symphony and Concerto, redoubled for him its clapping. Given a Bostonian modernist, properly placed, and Symphony Hall of a Friday afternoon would probably ring with plaudits.

The after-piece was the music that Wagner set at the beginning of the third act of "Die Walküre" for Wotan's daughters, warrior maids, riding the tempests. For the hundredth time it silenced those who doubt his elemental might and magnificence, the flood of his invention, the sweep of his powers. It affirmed as well, by no means incidentally, the ability of Mr. Monteux to drive an orchestra.

H. T. P.

By report of the programme-book at the Symphony concert of yesterday the fund to meet the operating deficit for the musical year, 1923-24, now stands at $81,648.34. In the last fortnight, Miss Mary Appleton, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Helen Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay Frost, Mrs. H. M. Hauser of Washington, Mrs. George Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Ratshesky and Mrs. Henry H. Sherman have together added $430 to it.

Herld MAR22

To-day Boston Symphony Plays and Sigrid Onegin Appears at Verdandi Chorus Recital.—Jascha Heifetz Will Give Concert Here Next Month.

This afternoon offers two concerts; one by the Boston Symphony at the Albee Theatre under the auspices of the Providence Music League, when the performance is for industrial people only, and the second by the Verdandi chorus at the Strand Theatre, when Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. In addition, to-night a grand opera concert will be heard at Elks Auditorium.

* * *

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted by Jean Bedetti, the violoncello virtuoso, who will appear as soloist in Saint Saens's concerto for that instrument. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," the Nocture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the second and third movement from Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"

Pierre Monteux

Directs Boston Symphony at Albee This Afternoon

Symphony No. 6, namely, the movement in 5-4 rhythm and the "March" movement, and finally Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

* * *

Herld MAR23

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the first time in thirteen years Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 will be played at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This symphony will open the 20th concert at Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Monteux will introduce De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Heinrich Gebbard will be the pianist for this composition. The other numbers will be Schenck's poem for orchestra, "In a Withered Garden," and Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." The pieces by Schenk and De Falla will be played here for the first time.

NINTH SYMPHONY

The soloists for the Pension Fund Concert, at which Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Marie Sundelius, soprano; Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will join forces with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct. Only standing room is left for the afternoon performance (March 30 at 3:30) and the evening performance (March 30 at 8:30) in Symphony Hall.

The programs of the first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881-82) were conspicuous in the music of Beethoven. In this season Mr. Henschel performed the nine symphonies in numerical order, together with the more important overtures and concertos. The Ninth Symphony constituted the closing program in the spring. Early in the season an announcement of a spring performance of this symphony invited subscribers to apply for the chorus. Mr. Henschel likewise performed the Ninth Symphony in the springs of 1883 and 1884. The Ninth Symphony entire was performed four times under Gericke, once under Nikisch, three times under Fiedler. It was last performed and repeated in 1917, with Dr. Muck conductor.

Adv April 6

Rosenthal Will Be Symphony Soloist

FEATURES of the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the appearance as soloist of Moriz Rosenthal, the celebrated pianist, and the repetition of Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre du Printemps," the orchestral sensation of the season.

Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March" are other features.

Herld Mar 23

FLESCH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Violinist Gives Polished Interpretation of Beethoven Concerto

ORCHESTRA PLAYS "STEVENSONIANA"

By PHILLIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Carl Flesch was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony C major (B. and H. No. 7); Hill, "Stevensoniana," Suite No. 2, after poems from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses"; Beethoven, concerto for violin; Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries.

A few years ago Mr. Hill composed a Suite inspired by four poems in Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses." The Suite was played in Boston, after it had been brought out in New York.

In 1921 Mr. Hill wrote music suggested by Stevenson's "Armies in the Fire." The next year saw the composition of music for "The Dumb Soldier" and "Pirate Story." Walter Damrosch brought out this Second Suite in New York on March 25, 1923. The performance yesterday was the first in Boston.

Mr. Hill says in a modest note published in the program book: "These little pieces, although attempting to reflect the mood of Stevenson's verses are not primarily descriptive music." No, these pieces are fortunately not descriptive, nor are they panoramic. Mr. Hill says, they are expressive of moods. One might find them just as interesting if they had no title, and the hearers were allowed to imagine at will.

And if the hearer were inclined to be hypercritical, having read "Armies in the Fire," he might find the armies in the music formidable rather than phantom.

This Suite contains many delightful pages. Like Mr. Deems Taylor, whose "Alice Through the Looking Glass" was heard here not long ago, Mr. Hill is not afraid to write melodiously and in the frankest manner. Nor is he afraid to write in a way to please the general public. His music, however, is not stuffed with commonplaces, the platitudes that are sure to win applause. His harmonic schemes are modern without being wilfully forced; his instrumentation is ingenious, it has color, it is refined, but not super-refined. A musician would at once acknowledge the technical skill lightly, not pedantically displayed. There are pages which at once suggest the innocent faith of child-life, for there are still unsophisticated children, and one hopes that many still believe in Santa Claus, fairies, giants and the benevolent if sometimes too generous stork. The second section in "Armies in the Fire" has the appropriately child-like quality charming in its unaffected simplicity; somewhat in the MacDowell mood, the MacDowell of the smaller and more intimate piano pieces..

Mr. Hill, who was present, must have been as pleased with the performance as the audience with his music. Mr. Monteux had prepared the performance with his customary care, and the orchestra was eloquent.

It was a pleasure to hear a symphony by Hadyn that was not too familiar, the one played yesterday had not been performed at these concerts for 20 years. This is passing strange for it is one of the most grateful of the many. How beautifully the adagio and the trio of the minuet were played! And here the exquisite taste of Mr. Monteux and the euphony of the orchestra were fully revealed.

"The Ride of the Valkyries" as a concert piece has somewhat aged. Even in a performance of the opera. The chief interest today is in seeing how the ride is scenically managed.

A day may come when some violinist will have the courage to make liberal cuts in the first movement of Beethoven's intolerably long-winded concerto with its endless repetitions, and omit the finale with its cheap and hiccuping theme altogether. Mr. Flesch gave a calm, contemplative, polished interpretation, rather than a vital and arresting one. We were told that the cadenzas were by Leonard. Cadenzas as a rule are a nuisance. In this instance the result of the thematic recapitulation was less distressing than is often the case.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Tchaikovsky, "Pathetic Symphony; Schenck, "In a Withered Garden," (first time here); de Falla, Nights in Gardens of Spain (first time here, if not in America); Chabrier, Overture to "Gwendoline."

TRANS April 5

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

TO crown their brave adventure with Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will repeat the piece at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Many desire to hear it anew; in itself and for the impression it has made it deserves repetition; while in it conductor and band have covered themselves with glory. It will stand last on the programme. Through an hour and forty minutes Franck's Symphony, Chopin's Concerto for Piano in E minor, with Mr. Rosenthal to play the solo-part, and Berlioz's Rákjoczy March will precede it. Intending listeners may govern their attendance accordingly.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will complete the series of supplementary Symphony Concerts to the public that now regularly and pleasurably frequents them. The programme traverses Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; fragments of Wagner's music-dramas, "Siegfried" and Götterdämmerung"; a Suite for Strings by Mr. Scalero, Italian composer, now resident in New York. Mme Eva Gauthier will be the assisting singer, appearing for the first time with the orchestra and in familiar prowess. Her numbers are two Jewish Songs of Ravel and the ornate air of Rosina, "Una Voce Poco Fa," from "The Barber of Seville."

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre at Harvard conductor and band will continue their current series of concerts in Cambridge, the youthful and ambitious Miss Constance McGlinchee, once pupil hereabout, as assisting pianist. Franck's Symphony; Mr. Hill's Second Suite of "Stevensoniana" in which he excels all his previous music; Schumann's Concerto; Berlioz's "Rákóczy March" fill the programme.

In the A...

Herld Mar 29

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

Presents Two Compositions Never Before Played in This City

PROGRAM IS TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"; Schenck, poem for orchestra, "In a Withered Garden" (first time here); De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" for piano and orchestra (first performance here); Chabrier, overture to the opera "Gwendoline."

Tchaikovsky's symphony had not been performed at the subscription concerts of the orchestra since 1911. In the years 1894-1898 there were six performances. We well remember the sensation the symphony made here when Mr. Paur brought it out. When the late William Foster Apthorp described the music as "obscene," a singular word to apply to it, indignant, denunciatory letters were sent to the Evening Transcript, written by persons who, as Charles Reade once said of letter writers to newspapers, had no other waste-pipe for their intellect.

The symphony was played so much, it was so popular that it quickly staled.

Extreme modernity has in it the seeds of oblivion, and the symphony was in those days ultra-modern. Extravagantly praised it began to be underrated. Conductors and players groaned when audiences wished to hear it. Performances were perfunctory.

The performance yesterday, a most impressive one, again reminded us that this symphony is a remarkable human document. Tchaikovsky and Brahms were in constant dread of death. They might have said with Brachiano in John Webster's "White Devil":

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me;
It is a word infinitely terrible."

In his dread Tchaikovsky shrieked; Brahms whined. The fact that Tchaikovsky died a few days after the performance gave rise to legends; but he did not kill himself, he died of cholera; yet the legends enhanced in the minds of some the value of the music. They turned a deaf ear to those objecting to the "sentimentalism" of the lyrical theme in the first movement; to the "morbidness" of the finale; to the "flippancy" of the second movement. Hearing the music as Mr. Monteux read it, the "sentimentalism" was the recollection of past joys and the wild regret over the end of every man's desire; the "flippancy" was tragically ironical in its desperate gaiety; the finale was a profoundly emotional lamentation, not only over the dead, but for all awaiting the inevitable summons.

It has been said that French musicians dislike Tchaikovsky's music; that they object to his direct appeals, the lack of subtlety, the repetitions, the raucous eloquence. Be this as it may, no conductor here has given so eloquent and sympathetic a performance of this symphony as the one heard yesterday.

Mr. Schenck's "In a Withered Garden" was entered in competition for a prize offered by the Chicago North Shore Festival Association in 1922. It then obtained an honorable mention. Mr. Schenck says that he endeavored to depict a mood rather than to tell a definite story. "If there were any tale to tell, the section in mazurka tempo would be 'the moonlight dance of the insects, animals, fairies and hobgoblins in the withered garden.'" We heard this tone poem twice in Evanston and again yesterday. The mazurka section is the least interesting portion of the work. The preceding pages and the finale, a recurrence of the opening measures, have poetic ideas finely expressed in an individual manner.

De Falla's Suite was disappointing, in view of the rhapsodic praise awarded it by foreign critics. There are three movements: "At Generalife," "Far-Off Dance" and "In the Gardens of the Sierra of Cordova." The second movement, based on a tango rhythm, suggests Spain, but the "gardens" might be in any country, in New England say, with box-trimmed paths, a summer house with narrow seats and slugs, and a garden pump, with a green scum on the water in its tank. It is a curious fact that Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, Leparra, Frenchmen all, have brought Spain musically nearer to us than any Spaniard whose orchestral compositions have been played here. We do not name Bizet, for "Carmen," brilliant as it is, is anything but Spanish. De Falla is apparently more national in his songs and piano pieces than when he writes for the orchestra. The piano in these "Nocturnes" is really only one of the instruments. Mr. Gebhard is at home with modern music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no symphony concerts next week. The program for April 11, 12, will be as follows: Franck, Symphony, D minor; Chopin, Concerto, E minor, for piano (Moritz Rosenthal, pianist); Berlios, The Rakoczy March. Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" will be played as an extra number after the regular program.

Monitor April 12

Trans April 3

279

The Next Conductor of the 'B.S.O.'

By HERBERT ANTCLIFFE

London, March 14

THE banal description of "lightning conductor" has often been applied to Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season commencing next September. This is not because he takes the music at a quicker rate than other conductors, or because his movements are of a more startling character, so much as because his engagements are so many and in such widespread an area that he is extremely difficult to catch.

My own experience of catching him for this interview is typical. He was supposed to be staying in England for a time conducting the London Symphony Orchestra, but the necessity of frequent visits to France made it impossible for him to give me an appointment except after a concert. He greeted me cordially as he came off the platform and before we had time to sit down his agent had asked him to speak to someone else "for a moment." The moment passed into several, while the agent and M. Koussevitzky's secretary were holding back people who had no immediate business with him. Outside the room, I knew, for I had had to pass through their ranks, were several score people with programs, autograph books and fountain pens, waiting more or less patiently for the time when he should be able to sign his name under those of other celebrities.

Speaks Little English

"Parlez-vous Anglais, Monsieur Koussevitzky?" I asked. "Non, Monsieur." "Pas du tout?" "A little, but I prefer Russian." So, in French, with some Russian, translated by the conductor's secretary, the conversation was carried on.

First of all he expressed his intense pleasure at the prospect of visiting America, and particularly of conducting there so fine and famous an orchestra. He had long wished to go to the New World, but there had been various difficulties, most of them concerned with artistic matters or with his engagements in Europe that had prevented him from getting over previously, and now he was hoping to give his very best to a people who he knew would appreciate it.

As one looked at him after a long and elaborate program, at the end of a strenuous season, and observed in him the same enthusiasm for his work and the same charm of manner as if he were just ready for the work instead of finishing it, there could be no question of his giving to the utmost of his ability. He is of a type that finds it impossible to give anything else. It is this which made possible the splendid series of concerts he gave when first he took up conducting for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen, to whom he had to take music and musicians by boat down the lonely rivers of Russia. It is this that makes and keeps him famous the world over today.

His Aims in Boston

But he would tell me something of his ideas with regard to a season of orchestral music, some of which, if not all, he hoped to be able to put into practice at Boston. Primarily his aim in accepting the offer to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have a body of players under his regular control whom he can mold to his own artistic feelings, and with the Boston players, who have the reputation here of being the finest orchestra in the world, he feels he will have this. Ever since the Russian revolution, which resulted in the disbandment of his own orchestra, he has been looking for something of the kind that would come up to his ideals, and he thinks he has now found it. It is only by having at his disposal such an orchestra that an artist can produce his most satisfying work, and with him all other aims are subservient to this.

It was a mistake, said Mr. Koussevitzky, to imagine that he was a modernist in any exclusive sense. A glance at his programs with the London Symphony Orchestra for the present season, which included two symphonies of Beethoven, one of Hadyn, one of Brahms, one of Boccherini and one of Tschaikowsky was sufficient to contradict this idea. In Boston he would continue his work of giving his own conceptions of the classics, for he believed that every artist should have his individual and personal interpretation of these works.

Nevertheless, he thinks that modern music must not be ignored or omitted from programs; for, apart from the question of providing proper openings for the stream of current art, it is only by keeping up with the work of contemporary writers that an interpreter can give the best readings of the classics. Speaking of modern composers, he thought that at the present moment there were many highly talented musicians, France and England perhaps just now holding the lead, though other countries were not lacking in creative talent. As to America, he hopes that a more intimate association will result in his finding that the few works known in Europe are but the adumbration of bright galaxy of compositions which have remained in their own country.

Drawn from Photograph © Florence Van Damm, New York

Serge Koussevitzky

Mr. Koussevitzky reiterated several times, because of some misapprehension that has arisen, that he is not out for propaganda, either on behalf of any nation or school of composers or for financial purposes. He considers that the classics are the established basis of musical beauty, and that at the same time music cannot stand still. The modernists who have something to say and say it in a worthy manner must be heard alongside the classics, for they are the classics of tomorrow. And it is for the exercise of his own artistic feelings in both of them that he is accepting the post in Boston. In other words, he is an artist who is seeking the finest instrument and the best circumstances for the expression of his art, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston audiences he is sanguine that he has found them.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

In His Own Image

A REVIEW, written by Mr. Ernest Newman for The Sunday Times of London, gives a clearer notion of Mr. Kusevitzky's independence and freshness as conductor than any comment about him lately printed in Europe. It concerns the recent concert in which he lead the London Symphony Orchestra through Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, and other pieces. Mr. Newman has indeed long admired Mr. Kusevitzky. Even so, his article is one to whet anticipation next autumn in Boston. It runs:

> Kusevitzky's tempi in "Don Juan" struck everyone as much slower than the normal. The explanation probably is that Kusevitzky, consciously or unconsciously, dramatizes the women in the symphonic poem; that is to say, instead of showing us the Countess and Donna Anna in Strauss's description of them, he makes them speak in their own persons. They become stage-charcaters, and employ, in order to reveal their emotions fully to the audience, all the conscious art of the singer, drawing the last ounce of expressiveness out of their phrases. This concentration on themselves, as it were, necessarily makes them adopt a slower pace than a conductor who is only concerned with an external description of them would allow them. It is true, then, that these sections were taken so slowly as to put the piece as a whole a little out of shape, but we were compensated by the exceptional beauty and poignancy of the music for the Countess and Donna Anna—a beauty and a poignancy that managed to make themselves felt even through the poor playing of the orchestra. Equally remarkable, in another way, was the fire of the characteristic music of the Don.
>
> It was probably the orchestra's difficulty in adapting its pre-established notions to the novel tempi of Kusevitzky that made it play so badly. It might have been a completely different orchestra that, later in the evening, gave us so magnificent a performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony. Kusevitzky achieved the miracle of proving that Brahms's melodic line can be inflected with the utmost delicacy without losing any forthright strength. The blend of power and tenderness in the slow movement was particularly moving; while in the third movement the slight ungainliness of gait that is the very essence of the music here was preserved in spite of the unusual vivacity of the phrasing. And in the finale Kusevitzky, without doing any damage to the grand structural lines of the movement, gave each of the variations an unusually well-defined physiognomy of its own. Altogether, the performance, though departing in many points from what the true-blue Brahmin would regard as "the Brahms tradition," was as remarkable a one as I have ever heard of the music.

Pub

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Pierre Monteux bade a last farewell to his Thursday evening audiences last night in Carnegie Hall. Judging from the storm of applause that greeted him upon his first appearance on the platform, after every pause in the playing, and after the concert, New York has—a little late—learned to appreciate his very real excellence and is sorry to see him go.

Mr. Monteux's penultimate program was well chosen and met with emphatic approval from his hearers, although upon an occasion less charged with goodwill it might not have caused so much excitement. Its most completely satisfactory portion was possibly the performance of the third "Leonore" overture that began it, a vivid one, full of beautiful color and dramatic breadth.

One should perhaps be grateful to Moritz Rosenthal, who was the soloist of the evening, for playing a concerto that had not been worn out with incessant repetitions. He chose Chopin's second, in E minor, which sounded almost like a novelty. Unfortunately, however, the neglect of this particular concerto is not so inexplicable after one has heard it.

Chopin was emphatically not a composer for the orchestra, and the E minor concerto sometimes sounds as if the composer had first conceived it as a sonata and later, discovering that the piece was supposed to be played with orchestra, had written in just enough instrumental accompaniment to prevent the band's going out to have a smoke. The net result is a long piano solo, generally played against a perfunctory background of sustained string harmony, with occasional interruptions, "tutti," restating what the piano has just said or predicting what he is about to say.

Nor is the music itself very good Chopin. The slow movement has moments of great beauty, although much of it is sentimental, and there is a stirring march passage in the first that is effective. But the closing rondo, concerning which Chopin himself wrote, "The Rondo for my concerto is not yet finished, because the right inspired mood has always been wanting," was apparently finished without bothering to wait for the right inspired mood.

Mr. Rosenthal played the concerto with authority and dazzling brilliance, and was mightily applauded for it. The concert closed with Franck's D minor symphony, which managed to sound disturbingly threadbare in places, despite the heartening combination of meticulous detail and feeling for structure that Mr.

Trans April 3

Incidents and Prospects

For the few Symphony Concerts remaining to him, Mr. Monteux has at least two novel pieces in hand. One is Mr. Schelling's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," now going the round of orchestras in America. The other is sea-music, lately written by Mr. Converse.

When Mme. Gauthier sings for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in Symphony Hall, she will be heard in widely different numbers—Ravel's settings of two Jewish Poems and the ornate and sportive air of Rosina, "Una Voce Poco Fa," in Rossini's "Barber of Seville."

It is pleasure to report that the profits of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra from the two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony last Sunday are, in round figures, nearly $7000. It is long since it has had such a gain for its beneficent treasury.

Trans April 4

Programmes in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of next week, on April 18 and 19, Mr. Monteux announces two novel pieces. From manuscript, conductor and orchestra will play a tone-poem by Mr. Converse, "Song of the Sea," suggested by verse of Walt Whitman. Once before, with "The Mystic Trumpeter," the poet stirred the composer to some of the best of his music-making. The other new number is "The Victory Ball," Mr. Schelling's fantasia that has already gone the round of symphony concerts in the United States. Again verses stirred the composer—a poem by Alfred Noyes in which he sets face to face the mob of such a party and the ghosts of dead soldiers whom—he chooses to believe—were "idealists" in the late war. Mr. Schelling is dyed yet more deeply with this contrast, and out of a full and disillusioned heart writes a bitter music. A fox-trot sounds. The shades shiver. For routine pieces, the programme promises Rimsky-Korsakov's overture of churchly prides and pomps, "Russian Easter," and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. As assisting singer, Mme. Onegin will be heard in air from Mozart's opera, "Titus," and in two songs by Strauss.

By arrangement

28

NY Her April 6

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Cesar Franck at Carnegie Hall

"I shall go on with them as soon as I get better," said Cesar Franck on his deathbed, thinking of the uncompleted "Magnificat" versicles—"or else," he added in a lower tone, "perhaps God will let me finish them in His eternity to come."

In another man the remark might have been the semi-mechanical repetition of a pious formula; but for Cesar Franck the words unquestionably corresponded to a deep and intense conviction of the spirit. Romain Rolland, who knew Franck well—"well enough to love him," as he says, "and to catch a glimpse of the beauty and serenity of his soul"—has told us how remarkable was the completeness and assurance of Franck's religious faith: a faith which knew no doubts, which was the mainspring of his life. Yet M. Rolland thinks that perhaps there was more trouble in the depths of his heart than the valiant serenity of Franck's exterior would have led one to believe, and he warns us particularly in the case of the D minor Symphony to beware of seeking in it only the expression of a devout and rapturous exaltation.

* * *

It is less, one fancies, because of the quality of its musical tissue than because of that which the music conveys to us that one returns to Franck's symphony without satiety. We heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and again we were impressed by the discrepancy between the elevation and fineness of its emotional substance and the more than occasional triteness and inferiority of its musical expression. The meditations of Franck, the mystical rhapsodist, touch us again and again by their sincerity and their exaltation; and at certain happily inspired moments his tonal embodiment of them achieves a noble distinction of contour and gesture—as in the concluding nine measures of the first movement, where the ancient device of imitation lifts the music to a magnificent peroration.

* * *

But Franck does not seem to have realized when he was speaking like a seer and a poet and when he was repeating glib banalities. He did not always know whether the garment he had donned and was wearing with such innocent unconsciousness was a singing robe or a second-hand overcoat. His singing robes were woven of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls—how gorgeous the texture of his music is at its best, as in a few rare pages of the Symphony! And how shabby and thin and lusterless it is in many and many another page, when Père Franck is seen praying fervently in a threadbare ulster—a hand-me-down from the wardrobe of the Wagner-Liszt household. And sometimes the music is not even warmed-over Wagner or Liszt; sometimes it is poor Franck in his most anæmic condition, shivering forlornly in a bath-robe—as in that incredibly trivial third theme of the first movement, uttered fortissimo by the violins and woodwind in F major, with pathetic confidence and satisfaction, as if the composer were convinced beyond argument that he had come upon a very jewel of inspiration!

* * *

Mr. Monteux's performance of the work last night was rather a merciless one; for it lingered with misguided affection over some of Franck's most sugary sentimentalities—as in the plaintive song of the violins in the slow introduction—and passed too lightly and casually over those great moments in which Franck stopped weeping maudlin chromatic tears like an impotent Tristan, straightened his shoulders, drew himself up to his full height, faced the morning sun, and realized that he himself, as Omar so hearteningly remarked, was Heaven and Hell. The sun is reflected in his face, in the splendid beauty that irradiates the final measures of the Symphony's first movement, and we could not help wishing that Mr. Monteux had encouraged his brilliant orchestra to blaze forth there in all its potential magnificence.

* * *

Between the Symphony, which ended Mr. Monteux's program, and the third "Leonore" Overture, which began it, came Mr. Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, with Chopin's E minor piano concerto for his vehicle. The long opening tutti was benignly curtailed; yet this concerto is still too long, and the first movement especially is an almost unmitigated bore. Nor are the other two movements first-rate or even second-rate Chopin. Mr. Rosenthal played them as well, doubtless, as any one could—he played, indeed, quite marvelously at times, and was fervently applauded and frequently recalled.

Trans April 6

Ballade of the Symphony Spinster

Igor Stravinsky's Tone-Poem, "The Rite of Spring," Is Repeated at the Symphony Concerts Today and Tomorrow, "By General Request."

MATHILDA wrinkles her worried brow,
And finds her a place where she may recline.
A really respectable, ancient frau,
She marks the end of a noble line.
She calls for the salts and the iodine
And sniffs them both till her head is light,
And calls for a thimble of tonic wine—
They're playing Stravinsky again tonight!

There's no peace left in existence now,
And naught for her but to sit and pine
For the days when music could paint somehow
The melody sweet of a love divine,
The Danube Blue and the Rolling Rhine
In tones sincere with a rhythm bright.
Instead (cold shivers assail her spine)
They're playing Stravinsky again tonight!

She swears she'll never again endow
This band that once was so superfine,
That now must wail like a fretful cow,
Cheered on by these Bacchic modern swine
While bassoons snarl and while oboes whine.
It's all confusing, disgusting quite.
The world, it's plain, is in swift decline—
They're playing Stravinsky again tonight.

ENVOI

Sir, will you grant this wish of mine?
Emblazoned in gold on a field of white,
Paint me a large ecstatic sign:
"They're playing Stravinsky again tonight!"

C. B. D.

NY Post April 14

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concerts—Rosenthal Plays Chopin

FORTY YEARS AGO Moritz Rosenthal enchanted the Viennese public with his piano playing, just as he did a New York audience last night in Carnegie Hall, when he performed Chopin's E minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was playing in which technical display was subordinated to style, taste, and the purely musical aspects of the case. Possibly the fact that Rosenthal (who is a native of Poland) studied the piano at the Lemberg Conservatory with Mikuli, who was a pupil of Chopin, gave his reading of the concerto a special touch of authority. But that was not needed; Mr. Rosenthal is a musician, who is pretty sure to do the right thing always. It was not always so; I remember the time when he would take the bit between his teeth and run away with the music. Tempi passati. Needless to add that the audience showed its appreciation last night of his spirited playing to the full.

M. Monteux and his players sailed in the safe waters of Beethoven's third "Lenora" and the classical Cesar Frank symphony. And thus ended the forty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, so far as the Thursday nights are concerned. Tomorrow afternoon Pierre Monteux will appear here for the last time as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, which he has once more brought to a state approaching perfection. His place will be taken, as is now known for certain, by the Russian double-bass virtuoso and virtuoso conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will preside over the New York concerts of this orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on November 27, 29; January 1, 3, 29, 31; March 12, 14, and April 9, 11—ten in all, five on Thursday nights, the others on Saturday afternoons.

Following is a list of the works performed in its afternoon concerts in New York by the Boston Orchestra during the season just ending: Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral"; Bliss, a color symphony; Brahms, tragic overture; Debussy, symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian"; Dukas, "La Peri: Poeme Danse"; De Falla, noches en los jardines de Sspana, piano solo, Heinrich Gebhardt; Handel, concerto grosso No. 6, in G minor; Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello, soloist, Jean Bedetti; Liszt, "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Alexander Siloti; Mahler, symphony in D major, No. 1; Mozart, violin concerto in E flat (K 268), soloist, Jacques Thibaud; Ravel, Daphnis and Chloe (suite No. 1); Respighi, old dances and airs for the lue (freely arranged); Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120; Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," op. 43; Smetana, overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Sold Bride"); Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), a picture of Pagan Russia; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

The Thursday evening programs included the following:

Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Chopin, concerto in E minor for pianoforte and orchestra, soloist, Moriz Rosenthal; Franck, symphony in D minor; Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem, op. 33; Liszt, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo"; Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute," symphony in C major; Schubert, songs with orchestra, soloist, Sigrid Onegin; Sibelius, symphony in E minor, concerto in D minor for violin and orchestra, soloist, Richard Bourgin; Strauss, Dance of Salome, Symphonia Domestica; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps"; Wagner, scene, "Just God!" from "Rienzi," soloist, Sigrid Onegin; prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a Siegfried Idyl, Isolde's Narrative (Act I), "Tristan and Isolde," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer; Bacchanale, "Tannhauser," Ride of the Valkyries (Act III), "Die Walkure"; Waldweben (Act II), "Siegfried"; Brunnhilde's Immolation Scene and Close, "Gotterdammerung," soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

HENRY T. FINCK.

Her Mar 30

CONCERTS

NINTH SYMPHONY

This afternoon at 3:30 and this evening at 8:30 in Symphony hall the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will give two pension fund concerts, performing Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony, introduced by the overture to "Fidelio."

For the symphony the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison, and these soloists: Marie Sundelius, soprano; Marjorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. [illegible] is available.

Globe Mar 29

NOVELTIES HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tone Poems by Schenck and de Falla Played

Two tone poems new to Boston were played at yesterday's Symphony concert, both suggested by gardens, Manuel de Falla's nocturnes for orchestra and piano, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain"; and "In a Withered Garden," by Elliott Schenck, a middle aged composer now resident in New York. Neither novelty made a sensation. Mr Schenck's music was better received than de Falla's. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part in the Spanish piece. It is so exacting that one was surprised not to find him listed as "soloist" in the programs.

"In a Withered Garden" won for Elliott Schenck honorable mention in a contest for a prize of $1000 offered three years ago by the Chicago North Shore Festival Association for the best symphonic work by an American composer. It has been played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The composer disclaims any intention of telling a definite story, using the phrase "depicting of mood" which Beethoven used about the "Pastoral" Symphony to describe his intention. There are two connected movements, an adagio, and a lively mazurka-like dance.

Mr Schenck's music does convey a mood, that of a foggy Autumn twilight in dark country lanes. It shows genuine imaginative power. The themes are not banal, the music does not sound like an echo of any man's style. There is, however, a lack of cumulative power. The piece seemed curiously episodic, without continuity, largely because of the choppy phrases and periods. The rapid movement was too obviously composed at the piano and orchestrated afterward by main strength.

Much of the scoring would gain by excisions and by changes in instrumentation. It is a pity the composer has had so few chances to hear his music performed by an orchestra. One not born a Berlioz cannot learn so difficult a thing as scoring a piece for full orchestra, without extended practical experience. But the same could be said about nearly every American composer. Mr Schenck's harmonies are his strongest point. They are not ultra modern, but are neither commonplace nor obviously derivative in color.

To those who have regarded de Falla as one of the most interesting of living composers his nocturnes came as a disappointment. He has striven for the sort of delicacy and glamour that Debussy's nocturnes for orchestra so marvellously exemplify. He has not been so stupid as to try to use Debussy's personal musical idiom, except those parts of it that are common property. But unles yesterday's performance belied him de Falla has failed in these pieces to do what he attempted. They are too carefully written, fine as much of the craftsmanship in them is, and not deeply enough felt.

De Falla can write brilliantly, originally, piquantly when he chooses. But with him everything ought to be in bright colors. These nocturnes are as though a painter with the temperament and style of Rubens had tried to paint like Puvis de Chavannes. It is possible, however, that a less matter of fact performance than yesterday's seemed would make this music more engrossing to the listener.

In Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the audience enjoyed the third movement greatly, probably because of its insistent rhythmic figure. The rest of this once absurbly-overrated piece made no particular impression on the majority, if applause is any indication. Both this symphony and Chabrier's incredibly trivial and bombastic overture to "Gwendoline" played yesterday do not deserve inclusion on the programs of the regular symphony concerts.

There are no concerts next Friday and Saturday, as the orchestra will be in New York.

P. R.

Trans Mar 29.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

TWICE in one day, at a concert tomorrow afternoon and at a concert tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be heard from the Symphony Orchestra; a chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, schooled by Dr. Davison; with Mmes Sundelius and Squires, Messrs. Stratton and Patton for solo quartet—all under Mr. Monteux conducting. Since 1917 the Choral Symphony has not been heard in Boston. Now it returns to mark the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of the music in Vienna, May 9, 1824. Once more an overflowing public rises to a festal occasion and sees this final Symphony of Beethoven above all the rest. Only standing room remains for either concert. Beethoven's overture to his opera, "Fidelio," will begin both.

World Mar 30

Monteux Takes Farewell.

Pierre Monteux will take his farewell of New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the closing pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Moriz Rosenthal, who will appear with the orchestra in Chopin's E minor concerto. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture will open the concert and Franck's Symphony in D minor will close it.

Features of the matinee program will be Scriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," (which is divided into three sections, as follows: Struggle—Sensuous Pleasures—Divine Activity), and a new score by De Falla, the Spanish composer, called "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," of which the movements are entitled: "At General Life," "Far-off Dance," "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Cordoba." The piano part will be played by Heinrich Gebhard. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in G minor and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

A feature of M. Monteux's closing spring concerts in Boston will be two performances of Beethoven's Choral Symphony in Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening. M. Monteux will close his season and his term in Boston on May 3, and shortly thereafter will sail for France to meet various engagements.

Trans Mar 30

PIERRE

Globe Mar 22

FLESCH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hill's "Stevensoniana" Is Warmly Applauded

Carl Flesch, remembered by some from his previous appearance as soloist in 1914, reappeared at the Symphony concert yesterday and gave an individual and compelling interpretation of the Beethoven concerto. The only novelty was the first performance at these concerts of Prof E. B. Hill's second "Stevensoniana" suite, purporting to illustrate poems from "A Child's Garden of Verse." The applause both for Mr Flesch and for Mr Hill's piece was hearty.

"Stevensoniana" is really a little suite with three movements. It is scored for full orchestra with an ingenuity sometimes too self-conscious. The music is what some sentimental adults think children ought to like. Although most children would no doubt prefer a more exciting piece, such as Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," Mr Hill's amiable little suite will ingratiate itself with a large portion of the public. He has exploited a rather slender and dubious vein of fantasy with considerable musical craftsmanship.

The symphony by Haydn in C major, had not been played here since 1904. Its minuet is unsurpassed by any 18th century symphony except Mozart's "Jupiter." The finale is a rondo which to many of the over-serious would seem scandalously lively for the Symphony concerts if written by an unknown. The other two movements are less remarkable.

The audience plainly was glad to hear the Haydn, coming near the end of a season in which classics have been slighted in favor of people like Dvorak and Tchaikowsky. Mr Monteux conducted it with an energy that was not always well directed. Finesse of style, though less needed in Haydn than in Mozart, cannot well be disregarded by any conductor undertaking to direct 18th century classics.

The Beethoven concerto, thrice familiar as it is to regular attendants at Symphony concerts, remains the best number yet produced for solo violin and orchestra. Mr Flesch not merely executed several difficult cadenzas with marked taste as well as with the skill one has come to take for granted from violinists; he also played the whole piece as though it meant a good deal to him. He is plainly a musician of eminence, no mere fiddler.

The first movement seemed rather sluggish in pace and a bit sentimentalized. The departure of Mr Neumann from the orchestra was again bitterly regretted by at least one listener. The affect of the magical taps on the kettle drum with which this concerto begins, was lost yesterday.

Perhaps memory of what must have been as perfect a performance of this concerto as has ever been given colored one's impression. Kreisler played it here under Dr Muck in 1915. The slow movement went the best yesterday. Mr Flesch played marvellously well the passage where the theme falls to the solo instrument.

The other number was a concert version of "The Ride of the Valkyries" familiar to all frequenters of the Pops, but last heard at the regular concerts about the time "Handel's Largo" was last heard there. There is a little excuse for playing at these concerts any arrangement not made or sanctioned by Wagner himself of a fragment from one of his music dramas. Dr Muck's rule that no excerpts were to be given at the regular Symphony concerts was no doubt too severe; but why lower so obviously the hard-won proud standard of the Symphony programs, a standard certainly unsurpassed and hardly equalled anywhere in the world? The performance was noisy and disjointed.

P. R.

Monitor Mar 30

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor next season for Boston Symphony Orchestra

vals at Petrograd, in between he made trips all over Europe, conducting in Scandinavia, Germany, England, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera House are regarded as the musical events of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr. Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last season conducting 10 concerts of the Scottish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France.

Monitor Mar 30

The Ninth Symphony in Boston

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the overture to "Fidelio," was presented at a Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Marie Sundelius, soprano, Marjorie Squires, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. As all seats for the concert had been sold soon after it was announced, it was repeated in the evening before another crowded house.

Although the performance yesterday was not interrupted by applause, as at the first presentation 100 years ago in Vienna, it was received with rapt attention, and was greeted at every interval with warm and prolonged clapping, to which at the end cheers were added—a rare event indeed at Symphony Hall.

No one could deny that the tribute was deserved. The orchestra was at the top of its bent, which in these days of its restored excellence is saying a great deal. Not only were the first violins stirring in tone and eloquent in phrase and dynamics, but the other strings, the wind and the percussion admirably balanced them under Mr. Monteux's baton. Exquisite in particular were the dialogues of solo flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon.

But, after all, these delights of the first three movements were as a tal that is told; we had heard them withi two years from the same musician What the audiences came to hear wa the choral movement, given for the fir time in Boston for seven years, a for the first time anywhere with t assistance of the young collegia trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davis who has raised the Harvard Glee Cl (and, incidentally, the Choral Society of Radcliffe College, the women's department of Harvard University) from the status of performers of "college songs" to that of students and interpreters of the finest choral music. Their performance quite sustained their reputation. Indeed, it is possible that this last symphonic message of Beethoven never had a more splendid interpretation. Perhaps it requires such youth not only to sustain those high passages which look impossible of execution, but to feel and convey in tones the joy and love of which Schiller sang. L. A. S.

Twentieth Program of the Boston Symphony

The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Tschaikowsky—"Pathetic" Symphony.
Schenck—"In a Withered Garden."
De Falla—"Nights in the Gardens of Spain."
Chabrier—Overture to "Gwendoline."

Never before in the last few years has a Friday afternoon audience been so enthusiastic. Now that Mr. Monteux is leaving, after having brought the orchestra to a pitch of perfection never before attained throughout its history, his weekly auditors are perhaps tardily realizing that he is one of the greatest living conductors, a conductor who does not rely on physical contortions and exaggerated gesticulation for his effects. The Boston audiences have been slow to recognize Mr. Monteux's qualities, and even now it is possible that their enthusiasm would still be somewhat restrained were it not for the fact that the New York public is beginning to acknowledge his greatness.

But there were other reasons for New York's slowness than the provincial snobbism which has influenced Boston. We of this city are often thus influenced. Pretentious in our demands that we be recognized as a discriminating musical public we are in reality so uncertain of our judgment that it is only when we are sure of the direction in which the wind is blowing that we dare express it; if indeed we are rarely capable of forming one, which is not an indisputed fact. This may be euphemistically called Bostonian reserve, but in plainer speech it is stupidity.

And so Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically applauded yesterday afternoon, when in the past he has played much greater music than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in a much superior manner. His marvelous interpretations of Beethoven have been passed over with but scant attention, and his remarkable readings of Debussy and still more modern productions and the important aid and encouragement which he has given the American composer have hardly been as yet remarked upon.

Elliott Schenck's "In a Withered Garden" is a case in point. It is most certainly a piece of music deserving of a hearing. Well constructed, imaginative, even truly poetic in many parts, it is above all the work of an American musician. If Americans must wait until they produce works of the very highest type, American music will never occupy an important place on orchestral programs. American composers must be encouraged to write music in the larger forms by the opportunities of having them played. We cannot be expected to produce masterpieces in a bound. Second, third, even tenth rate compositions must first be written and given the practical benefit of a public performance. When the American composer has thus made a gradual progress toward perfection, then and then only can he be expected to equal his foreign brethren. Mr. Monteux seems to be the only one who has had the vision to realize this, and when a summary is made of the compositions by Americans which he has had the broadmindedness to produce his name will be writ large in the history of American music.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is Spanish in coloring with a vengeance. Lalo, Debussy and Chabrier, Frenchmen, have written music in the Spanish vein which is more agreeable. The persistently Spanish character of De Falla's music is tiresome. It insists too much on the Spanish melodic twists, the Spanish rhythms. For all that it is brilliant and, it goes without saying, effective. The performance of it was a marvel of grace and poetic insight, to which Heinrich Gebhardt contributed in no small measure by his playing of the obbligato piano part.

S. M.

Mar 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

On April 11 and 12, the Symphony Orchestra will repeat Stravinsky's remarkable "Le Saore du Printemps," Franck's symphony in D minor, Chopin's piano concerto with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March" will also be played.

NINTH SYMPHONY

This afternoon and again this evening, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two pension fund concerts with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and "Fidelio" overture as the program, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloists including Marie Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton will assist.

Monitor Mar 29

29

Igor Stravinsky—A Tone Philosopher

IGOR STRAVINSKY, the Russian composer, who, as regards the American public, could hardly be counted anything but an amusing figure until a year ago, has become, with audiences of certain eastern cities, to say the least, an object of earnest contemplation the past winter. Formerly looked upon as a mere inventor of comic melodies, fantastic harmonies and ridiculous instrumental combinations for mimes to caper and pirouette to, he begins now to be considered a serious symphonic writer and perhaps even a profound orchestral thinker. Taken, when the Diaghileff Ballet introduced him to the United States in war time, as a phantom-chaser and nonsense-maker, he seems to be accepted today as one of the few persons who have an original musical message to deliver, and as one of the still fewer who are extending the technical frontiers of composition.

It matters little what brought about the change in attitude toward Stravinsky. It may have been owing to the acclaim with which the International Composers' Guild in New York produced one of his chamber music pieces early in the season, with the assistance of players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, and with that also of the Philadelphia conductor, Mr. Stokowsky. It may, again, have resulted from the skill with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra overcame the difficulty and demonstrated, at the same time, the intelligibility of his "Rite of Spring," performing the work both at home and on tour under the baton of Mr. Monteux a few weeks ago. But whatever the cause, Stravinsky is doubtless a permanent name now on American orchestral programs. Conductors who have never deigned to study his scores will be likely to include "Rite of Spring" and "Song of the Nightingale" in their baggage when they pack for the country in June. Players, in turn, who have hitherto fought shy of rehearsing his rôles, will scarcely want to come up to another season confessing that his string, wood, or brass style, as the case may be, is too much for their abilities.

To look at the situation broadly, orchestral composers of the century before Stravinsky are nearly all devoted to sentimentalism, to employ the word in its noblest meaning. Now and then, to add a touch of comedy, they pour their feelings into the mold of the scherzo. Now Strauss, Stravinsky's immediate predecessor, gets humor and irony out of this old classic fixity. He gives them an incidental function, using them by way of contrast in an instrumental narrative of a generally heroic temper. Stravinsky goes farther and makes them all-pervading. He assumes the character, in fine, of a satirist. And if he does, perchance, excite the laughter of listeners against himself to begin with, he finally causes them to join in laughter with him, and to recognize him in his true light as a tone philosopher.

—s shall prevent me from going.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916, when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production. Just look at the Symphony of Serge Taniel's called 'After Reading a Psalm.' The composer who died of hunwhich will be l...

mer. From England I will have to rush to Italy and shall conduct symphony concerts in Milan and in Rome.

"From Rome I shall proceed to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there, and in May I will have charge of the "Boris Godunov" performances at the Grand Opera in Paris. At the end of May I shall conduct my usual Spring concerts in Paris, and probably will have as a soloist the American soprano, Miss Eleanor Sawyer, who, by the way, is from Boston.

"In the Summer I shall have a vacation, which is very much needed, as this Winter has been more strenuous than usual, before leaving for the New World."

Globe Mar 22

FLESCH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hill's "Stevensoniana" Is Warmly Applauded

Carl Flesch, remembered by some from his previous appearance as soloist in 1914, reappeared at the Symphony concert yesterday and gave an individual and compelling interpretation of the Beethoven concerto. The only novelty was the first performance at these concerts of Prof E. B. Hill's second "Stevensoniana" suite, purporting to illustrate poems from "A Child's Garden of Verse." The applause both for Mr Flesch and for Mr Hill's piece was hearty.

"Stevensoniana" is really a little suite with three movements. It is scored for full orchestra with an ingenuity sometimes too self-conscious. The music is what some sentimental adults think children ought to like. Although most children would no doubt prefer a more exciting piece, such as Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," Mr Hill's amiable little suite will ingratiate itself with a large portion of the public. He has exploited a rather slender and dubious vein of fantasy with considerable musical craftsmanship.

The symphony by Haydn in C major, had not been played here since 1904. Its minuet is unsurpassed by any 18th century symphony except Mozart's "Jupiter." The finale is a rondo which to many of the over-serious would seem scandalously lively for the Symphony concerts if written by an unknown. The other two movements are less remarkable.

The audience plainly was glad to hear the Haydn, coming near the end of a season in which classics have been slighted in favor of people like Dvorak and Tchaikowsky. Mr Monteux conducted it with an energy that was not always well directed. Finesse of style, though less needed in Haydn than in Mozart, cannot well be disregarded by any conductor undertaking to direct 18th century classics.

The Beethoven concerto, thrice familiar as it is to regular attendants at Symphony concerts, remains the best number yet produced for solo violin and orchestra. Mr Flesch not merely executed several difficult cadenzas with marked taste as well as with the skill one has come to take for granted from violinists; he also played the whole piece as though it meant a good deal to him. He is plainly a musician of eminence, no mere fiddler.

The first movement seemed rather sluggish in pace and a bit sentimentalized. The departure of Mr Neumann from the orchestra was again bitterly regretted by at least one listener. The affect of the magical taps on the kettle drum with which this concerto begins, was lost yesterday.

Perhaps memory of what must have been as perfect a performance of this concerto as has ever been given colored one's impression. Kreisler played it here under Dr Muck in 1915. The slow movement went the best yesterday. Mr Flesch played marvellously well the passage where the theme falls to the solo instrument.

The other number was a concert version of "The Ride of the Valkyries" familiar to all frequenters of the Pops, but last heard at the regular concerts about the time "Handel's Largo" was last heard there. There is a little excuse for playing at these concerts any arrangement not made or sanctioned by Wagner himself of a fragment from one of his music dramas. Dr Muck's rule that no excerpts were to be given at the regular Symphony concerts was no doubt too severe; but why lower so obviously the hard-won proud standard of the Symphony programs, a standard certainly unsurpassed and hardly equalled anywhere in the world? The performance was noisy and disjointed.

P. R.

Monitor Mar 30

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor next season for Boston Symphony Orchestra

vals at Petrograd, in between he made trips all over Europe, conducting in Scandinavia, Germany, England, France, Italy, Austria and Spain.

Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, held in the Grand Opera House are regarded as the musical events of the season; they are always sure to give some new and interesting compositions. In the last years, Mr. Koussevitzky has been a guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and was last season conducting 10 concerts of the Scottish Orchestra Company. Last week he returned from Madrid, where he gave four concerts, one under the patronage of the Queen of Spain.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France.

Monitor Mar 30

The Ninth Symphony in Boston

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the overture to "Fidelio," was presented at a Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Marie Sundelius, soprano, Marjorie Squires, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, baritone. As all seats for the concert had been sold soon after it was announced, it was repeated in the evening before another crowded house.

Although the performance yesterday was not interrupted by applause, as at the first presentation 100 years ago in Vienna, it was received with rapt attention, and was greeted at every interval with warm and prolonged clapping, to which at the end cheers were added—a rare event indeed at Symphony Hall.

No one could deny that the tribute was deserved. The orchestra was at the top of its bent, which in these days of its restored excellence is saying a great deal. Not only were the first violins stirring in tone and eloquent in phrase and dynamics, but the other strings, the wind and the percussion admirably balanced them under Mr. Monteux's baton. Exquisite in particular were the dialogues of solo flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon.

But, after all, these delights of the first three movements were as a tale that is told; we had heard them within two years from the same musicians. What the audiences came to hear was the choral movement, given for the first time in Boston for seven years, and for the first time anywhere with the assistance of the young collegians trained by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, who has raised the Harvard Glee Club (and, incidentally, the Choral Society of Radcliffe College, the women's department of Harvard University) from the status of performers of "college songs" to that of students and interpreters of the finest choral music. Their performance quite sustained their reputation. Indeed, it is possible that this last symphonic message of Beethoven never had a more splendid interpretation. Perhaps it requires such youth not only to sustain those high passages which look impossible of execution, but to feel and convey in tones the joy and love of which Schiller sang. L. A. S.

Twentieth Program of the Boston Symphony

The twentieth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Tschaikowsky—"Pathetic" Symphony.
Schenck—"In a Withered Garden."
De Falla—"Nights in the Gardens of Spain."
Chabrier—Overture to "Gwendoline."

Never before in the last few years has a Friday afternoon audience been so enthusiastic. Now that Mr. Monteux is leaving, after having brought the orchestra to a pitch of perfection never before attained throughout its history, his weekly auditors are perhaps tardily realizing that he is one of the greatest living conductors, a conductor who does not rely on physical contortions and exaggerated gesticulation for his effects. The Boston audiences have been slow to recognize Mr. Monteux's qualities, and even now it is possible that their enthusiasm would still be somewhat restrained were it not for the fact that the New York public is beginning to acknowledge his greatness.

But there were other reasons for New York's slowness than the provincial snobbism which has influenced Boston. We of this city are often thus influenced. Pretentious in our demands that we be recognized as a discriminating musical public we are in reality so uncertain of our judgment that it is only when we are sure of the direction in which the wind is blowing that we dare express it; if indeed we are rarely capable of forming one, which is not an indisputed fact. This may be euphemistically called Bostonian reserve, but in plainer speech it is stupidity.

And so Mr. Monteux was enthusiastically applauded yesterday afternoon, when in the past he has played much greater music than Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in a much superior manner. His marvelous interpretations of Beethoven have been passed over with but scant attention, and his remarkable readings of Debussy and still more modern productions and the important aid and encouragement which he has given the American composer have hardly been as yet remarked upon.

Elliott Schenck's "In a Withered Garden" is a case in point. It is most certainly a piece of music deserving of a hearing. Well constructed, imaginative, even truly poetic in many parts, it is above all the work of an American musician. If Americans must wait until they produce works of the very highest type, American music will never occupy an important place on orchestral programs. American composers must be encouraged to write music in the larger forms by the opportunities of having them played. We cannot be expected to produce masterpieces in a bound. Second, third, even tenth rate compositions must first be written and given the practical benefit of a public performance. When the American composer has thus made a gradual progress toward perfection, then and then only can he be expected to equal his foreign brethren. Mr. Monteux seems to be the only one who has had the vision to realize this, and when a summary is made of the compositions by Americans which he has had the broadmindedness to produce his name will be writ large in the history of American music.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" is Spanish in coloring with a vengeance. Lalo, Debussy and Chabrier, Frenchmen, have written music in the Spanish vein which is more agreeable. The persistently Spanish character of De Falla's music is tiresome. It insists too much on the Spanish melodic twists, the Spanish rhythms. For all that it is brilliant and, it goes without saying, effective. The performance of it was a marvel of grace and poetic insight, to which Heinrich Gebhardt contributed in no small measure by his playing of the obbligato piano part.

S. M.

Mar 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

On April 11 and 12, the Symphony Orchestra will repeat Stravinsky's remarkable "Le Sacre du Printemps," Franck's symphony in D minor, Chopin's piano concerto with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March" will also be played.

H SYMPHONY

afternoon and again this in Symphony Hall, the ymphony Orchestra will o pension fund concerts with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and "Fidelio" overture as the program, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloists including Marie Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton will assist.

shall prevent me from going.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce the American public to some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916, when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production. Just look at the Symphony of Serge Taniel's called 'After Reading a Psalm.' The composer who died of hunwhich will be [illegible] mer. From England I will have to rush to Italy and shall conduct symphony concerts in Milan and in Rome.

"From Rome I shall proceed to Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra there, and in May I will have charge of the "Boris Godunov" performances at the Grand Opera in Paris. At the end of May I shall conduct my usual Spring concerts in Paris, and probably will have as a soloist the American soprano, Miss Eleanor Sawyer, who, by the way, is from Boston.

"In the Summer I shall have a vacation, which is very much needed, as this Winter has been more strenuous than usual, before leaving for the New World."

Monitor Mar 29

29

Igor Stravinsky—A Tone Philosopher

IGOR STRAVINSKY, the Russian composer, who, as regards the American public, could hardly be counted anything but an amusing figure until a year ago, has become, with audiences of certain eastern cities, to say the least, an object of earnest contemplation the past winter. Formerly looked upon as a mere inventor of comic melodies, fantastic harmonies and ridiculous instrumental combinations for mimes to caper and pirouette to, he begins now to be considered a serious symphonic writer and perhaps even a profound orchestral thinker. Taken, when the Diaghileff Ballet introduced him to the United States in war time, as a phantom-chaser and nonsense-maker, he seems to be accepted today as one of the few persons who have an original musical message to deliver, and as one of the still fewer who are extending the technical frontiers of composition.

It matters little what brought about the change in attitude toward Stravinsky. It may have been owing to the acclaim with which the International Composers' Guild in New York produced one of his chamber music pieces early in the season, with the assistance of players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, and with that also of the Philadelphia conductor, Mr. Stokowsky. It may, again, have resulted from the skill with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra overcame the difficulty and demonstrated, at the same time, the intelligibility of his "Rite of Spring," performing the work both at home and on tour under the baton of Mr. Monteux a few weeks ago. But whatever the cause, Stravinsky is doubtless a permanent name now on American orchestral programs. Conductors who have never deigned to study his scores will be likely to include "Rite of Spring" and "Song of the Nightingale" in their baggage when they pack for the country in June. Players, in turn, who have hitherto fought shy of rehearsing his rôles, will scarcely want to come up to another season confessing that his string, wood, or brass style, as the case may be, is too much for their abilities.

To look at the situation broadly, orchestral composers of the century before Stravinsky are nearly all devoted to sentimentalism, to employ the word in its noblest meaning. Now and then, to add a touch of comedy, they pour their feelings into the mold of the scherzo. Now Strauss, Stravinsky's immediate predecessor, gets humor and irony out of this old classic fixity. He gives them an incidental function, using them by way of contrast in an instrumental narrative of a generally heroic temper. Stravinsky goes farther and makes them all-pervading. He assumes the character, in fine, of a satirist. And if he does, perchance, excite the laughter of listeners against himself to begin with, he finally causes them to join in laughter with him, and to recognize him in his true light as a tone philosopher.

30 TRANS Mar 31

THE NINTH SMYPHONY TWICE HEARD IN NEW FREEDOMS AND FIRES

ORCHESTRA, CHORUS, MONTEUX, DAVISON

Five Thousand Hearers in a Single Day for Beethoven's Accepted Masterpiece—A Choir That Had Mastered and Could Wing the Music—A Band in High Mettle—Two Conductors as Leaders in the Deed—An Audience Shouts

IN April of 1824, a hundred years ago in Vienna, it was possible to read in newspapers and on play-bills that in the Kärntnerthor Theatre, at seven o'clock on the evening of May 7, a new "Grand Symphony with Solo and Chorus Voices entering in the Finale in Schiller's Ode to Joy," would be heard for the first time and that the composer, "Mr. Ludwig van Beethoven," would himself "participate in the general direction." Nevertheless, the advertisement also assured the Viennese public, "prices would remain as usual." Thus comforted and properly expectant, the audience filled the theatre. Only the royal box stood conspicuously empty, since their Majesties had but dull ears for music and small regard for "Mr. Ludwig van Beethoven," who was neither a tractable nor a deferential person. As it happened, moreover, his "Grand Symphony" won him five successive outbursts of applause—two more than it was the custom to bestow upon the imperial family; so many, indeed, that the irritated Police Commissioner bawled "Silence."

Mr. Ludwig, however, being very deaf, heard neither the shouts of the listeners nor the squeak of authority. The Symphony was ended; but there he sat in the orchestra, his head still bent over the score, his hand still beating the time, his back turned to the audience. Someone pushed him around. He saw what he could not hear—and "the sudden conviction thereby forced on everybody that he had not done so before because he could not hear what was going on, acted like an electric shock on all present, and a volcanic explosion of sympathy and admiration followed, which was repeated again and again, and seemed as if it would never end." Next day, he quarrelled with the management over the receipts, which, likewise, was much in character.

In Boston, yesterday, the two centenary performances of the "Grand Symphony" hardly generated like excitement. Yet, at the close of the second, when Mr. Monteux, descending from the conductor's platform, thrust upon it Dr. Davison as chorus-master, there were plentiful shouts; while the audience rose in tribute to them both, and beat its united palms together long and loud. By this time orchestra and choir were also on their feet joining in the plaudits. They had been many and hearty in the afternoon; but not until the evening did the end crown what for the chorus had been nearly a year of work. Since every seat in Symphony Hall was taken for either concert and since "standees" abounded at both, 5000 and more listeners heard this Ninth Symphony of Beethoven within the short space of seven hours on a single Sunday. They heard it also in a more remarkable performance of the Choral Finale than this generation in Boston or New York has known; while the three orchestral movements rose only to lesser, because more familiar, heights.

The two concerts made, indeed, one of the Pentecostal days of music, when the divine fire descends upon all concerned—and also, upon altars well-prepared—while in audiences, besides, it kindles reciprocating heats. What with "The Rite of Spring" and now the Ninth Symphony, Mr. Monteux is departing from the two cities that best know him in a sunset-blaze of red and gold. 'Tis true—and pity 'tis, 'tis true—that New York will not hear a repetition of the concerts of yesterday. For "our neighbor," the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, would exact, say $7000, to convey the forces thither and return them thence.

Remarkable beyond belief was the singing of the Choral Finale. Doubtless in the last fusing rehearsals, Mr. Monteux accomplished the plastic and reciprocating play of the orchestral, the choral and the solo parts that unified them to each other within the body and the spirit of the music. All else, however, was the work of Dr. Davison, stamping him as the transcendent director and inspirer of choral singing in these days in these parts. He assembled a choir sufficient for the intrinsic volume of the music, numerous enough to stand against and to mingle with a full symphonic orchestra. In each of the four divisions, it counted some seventy-five singers. He chose also youthful voices and youthful minds—from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. From the youthful voices he gained freshness, brightness, animation and that single quality of tone which is impossible when a choir ranges in years from the twenties to the sixties. From the youthful minds and spirits, he gained yet more desirable possessions and advantage.

Set a chorus of "old stagers" before the finale of the Ninth Symphony and they shrink from it in perturbation and alarm. Have they not "always" heard that it is "unsingable"—an instrumental, not a vocal, music? Are not these intervals, these ascents, these sustained measures, "terrible" and not to be accomplished? Fortunately, Dr. Davison's youth knew none of these fears and scruples. More fortunately still, they had the free will, the resolution and the persistence to face this music. To crown this wisdom, the director began rehearsals as long ago as last spring, renewed them in the autumn, gradually multiplied and intensified them through the winter, until he could hand to Mr. Monteux a chorus schooled as American chorus had never been schooled before, in this vard and Radcliffe do such deeds and gain such merit as they did in the Ninth Symphony and the arts of choral song, they shed no small glory upon the two colleges as seats of the arts and life. Only one possible ear could be stupidly deaf to it—the ear of a middle-aged alumnus.

So to extol the chorus and Dr. Davison is not to forget the valors of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux. Yet these, in a sense, were to be expected. Through a year or two past, the conductor has excelled in the ampler symphonies of Beethoven—in the third and the fifth, in the seventh and now in this ninth. Within them he has unfolded the magnificence of line and progress. He has summoned the puissance of melody, carving beauty in a great frieze of tone wrought before the listeners' ears. He has loosed the tumults; borne high the ecstasies; cut free the exuberance. His Beethoven has been human, vitalized, passioned, exalted—a man and a spirit in music incarnate and released. For a year past Mr. Monteux's orchestra—for it is his and no other's—has regained a many-sided beauty of voice, as various a play of power. There is no technical virtue in which it is remiss; no tonal quality in which it is at fault; no sensibility by which it is untouched; no eloquence that it may not command.

Join conductor and orchestra at this acme to the Ninth Symphony and there can be but sum of pleasure, transport, possession. Through the finale, instrumental song mounted in passion and splendor. Through the slow movement, the sensuous beauty of the singing was as light piercing to the depths of the song. Through the so-called Scherzo, the orchestra and Beethoven joined voice to prove that in rhythm and motion is the soul of music. Through the first movement recur the questing tumults, and orchestra and conductor tossed them high. There and only there was it possible to wish ampler, keener-edged, more propulsive and contrasting power. . . . So stimulated by choir and orchestra, the four solo-singers—Mmes. Sundelius and Squires, Messrs. Stratton and Patton—rose near to the heights of the "great argument" in which they shared. Shrewdly Mr. Monteux had chosen voices that could pierce or stand against the tonal mass. Practised were the quartet, fused and also inspirited. For in them also was the freedom upon which the whole performance soared.

With wisdom, the Symphony Orchestra has kept the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven a music apart. Only at intervals of years has a choir been assembled that it might be heard "in entirety" and in climax. Rarely in those intervals have the three instrumental movements been played by themselves, like the truncated marble which is yet one of the glories of Phidias. At every return of the Choral Symphony it has been made part of unusual and festal occasion. To do so is to meet and to foster the nearly universal notion that in it and in the "Solemn Mass" of those latter days, Beethoven's music rose highest and speaks fullest. Wayward, no doubt, are those of us who find the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony more than once over-written; who prefer the Fifth for the Beethoven of tumults; the Seventh for the Beethoven of rhythm; the neglected Fourth—for we will not hide our shame—for the Beethoven of musing song. Enough that the Ninth drinks deep and speaks high of all these Beethovens. There is he assembled, full-rounded—and in completeness may also be culmination.

H. T. P.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Asked but Not Answered

DID the Symphony Concerts permit interruption from the floor or the balcony, it would have been in order last Friday or Saturday to rise to what "in the halls of legislation" is called a parliamentary inquiry. "Mr. Conductor"—it might have been put—"why are such pieces as Mr. Schenck's present tone-poem played for dubious novelties when pieces of proved interest, merit and favor in the ears of the public, likewise from American composers, go unrepeated, neglected and semi-forgotten?" As presiding officer, the conductor might then have asked for a more explicit statement of the question, say with examples as well as implied admonition. Thereupon the inquirer would have reminded him of Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; Mr. Schelling's Variations, "Impressions from an Artist's Life"; Mr. Hill's First Suite of "Stevensoniana"; Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches"; sundry other numbers—all once applauded and all now overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. Furthermore, the questioner might have cited Mr. Stanley Smith's tone-poem, "Youth"; Mr. Gregory Mason's "Prelude and Fugue"; Mr. Seth Bingham's "Variations" among pieces played from American pers, yet hardly deserving performance in Symphony Hall; no sooner heard than forgotten, or only for boredom remembered.

So doing, the inquirer would have put the case against a routine of symphony concerts in the United States that steadily hardens and that none seems minded to shatter. Unless it be the merely itinerant Mengelberg or the director of some secondary orchestra in the Middle West, not a conductor now practising in America fails to foster the music of American composers. He receives it willingly; cons it with a favoring eye and ear; as often as not sets it upon his lists; spares no pains in actual performance. Yet, having once played the piece at a pair of concerts, he puts it by, yesterday, today and forever, passing to the next American manuscript upon his table. Round and round he goes in this endless succession of new American numbers. Yet very seldom will he repeat one, no matter how obvious the abiding deserts or clear and warm the liking of the public.

For consequences, scarcely a page of American music—Mr. Loeffler's and Mr. Bloch's aside—has become a standard or, even an occasional, item in our orchestral repertories. Yet, intrinsically, the suites of Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill and Mr. Chadwick—to say nothing of his better

Blake Mar 30

Every seat for both afternoon and evening performances today of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony has been sold for more than 10 days. Standing room only remains, and not much of that. This proves absolutely that there is a large potential public in this city for performances of the greatest and most severe classics by organizations of acknowledged eminence. Nobody can say that the soloists are responsible for this sell out, since none of them has ever been a great drawing card here. If Bach's B minor Mass or Passion according to Matthew, or Beethoven's Missa Solemnis were to be sung here the result would be the same. It always happens in the case of Handel's "Messiah," familiarity with which breeds contempt only in the supercilious. Would that one could hope for as great a public response to music by living composers.

Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring' is to be repeated at the end of the next Boston Symphony concerts April 11 and 12, in response to many requests. The Franck Symphony, Chopin's E minor concerto, with Rosenthal playing the solo, and Berlioz "Hungarian March" will precede Stravinskys much discussed masterpiece.

FROM A CONCERT GOER

To the Editor of The Boston Herald:

It is with warm pleasure that the writer has noted ever mounting valuation and affection among professional critics of and for the modest gentleman and great musician whose name heads this letter; but he has not happened, as yet, to see in print any like expression of regard for Mr. Monteux coming from among the audiences, that from week to week and from year to year at the Symphony concerts have more and more delighted in the growing beauty of his work. His stay with us, alas, is drawing to a close. Will you not, therefore, spare a little of your valued space to a life-long lover of good orchestral music for this appreciation of a master of his art?

I have heard the Boston Orchestra from time to time, and under its every conductor from Henschel on. Never, in my hearing, has it touched the degree of perfection as a musical instrument of power, sonority, unity and solidity; of balance, blending, purity of tone and warmth of color; of brilliancy, velocity, lightness and exquisite delicacy; in short, of technical and emotional virtuosity, that it reached, for instance, last Saturday night in Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, and weeks before in the Pastoral Symphony, in Brahms's Third and Cesar Franck's symphonies, in the wonder works of Strauss and Stravinsky, and in such charming trifles as Hill's echoes to Robert Louis Stevenson's child verses.

Yet it was but in February, 1920, that a letter from an orchestra striker, a member of the American Federation of Musicians, was printed in The Sunday Herald which said, among other things: "To assure the public that this orchestra will be carried on, and its great qualities maintained, is a statement which, unfortunately, Judge Cabot will find himself unable to substantiate. . . . To continue this orchestra as non-union means that it will be compelled to fill its ranks with students and mediocre musicians." . . .

His great instrument, as it now marvelously responds, is most unquestionably Mr. Monteux's answer to that challenge. But what can a mere listener, like myself, say without presumption of the artist who plays upon it, and of his performance?

I can testify only to my own keen enjoyment and impression, first of all, of splendid virility; then of rich warmth and color, of vital rhythm; of controlled emotion, of reserve-power; of sympathy, clarity, sense of proportion and dramatic contrast, and tempering the whole, of traditional, educated, and as it seems to me very perfect French taste.

Mr. Monteux will leave many warm friends behind him, and will hand over to his fortunate successor a very wonderful instrument. He himself, most naturally, has grown with its increasing plasticity to ever greater breadth and freedom of interpretation. Wherever he goes, he will take that growth and our good wishes with him. He is young, and has time and the world before him for yet better things.

CHARLES NORMAN FAY.

Cambridge.

Ev Herald Apr 6

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH

To the Editor of The Herald:

I could not help noticing the difference between the translation of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," used in the pension fund concert, and that used in England when I sang under Dr. Hans Richter, 15 or 16 years ago.

I cannot read the German, but for fine rhythmic English I think you will agree that the following is much better than the one used on Sunday.

CECIL R. CANNELL.

Sing then of the Heaven descended—
Daughter, of the starry realm,
Joy by love and hope attended,
Joy whose raptures overwhelm;
Joy whose magic reuniteth.
All that custom sternly parts,
Brothers all to love inviteth,
Reconciler sweet of hearts.

Ye who own life's choicest treasure,
Loyal heart and faithful friend,
Ye whose love is pain and pleasure,
Now with ours your voices blend:
Yea whoe'er mid life's delusion,
One fond heart hath called his own,
Join us, but on him confusion—
Who nor joy nor love has known.

Choicest pain and sweetest pleasure,
Bounteous nature freely gives,
Grace to just and unjust lending,
Blessing everything that lives;
Wine she gave to us, and kisses,
Joys to brighten our abode,
E'en the worm may feel life's blisses
And the seraph dwells with God.

Monitor April 12

Pierre Monteux Repeats "The Rite of Spring"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave yesterday its twenty-first Friday afternoon concert, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist and the following program:

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Chopin....Pianoforte Concerto in E minor
Berlioz .....“Rákóczy” March
Stravinsky.....“Le Sacre du Printemps”

"The Rite of Spring," which made a profound impression here and in New York last winter, was added as an extra number "by general request." The desire to hear it again, though general, evidently was not unanimous, for during the intermission that preceded Stravinsky's work a considerable number of subscribers took the opportunity to express their disapproval of it by leaving, and more departed at the pause between the two sections. Nevertheless, the great majority proved their artistic curiosity by remaining, and by applauding the performance the more heartily as their numbers diminished.

A third hearing of "The Rite of Spring" served to confirm the impression that this music is original and vital, to clarify its structure, and to make the wonder grow that Mr. Monteux and his orchestra are able to enunciate its extraordinary rhythms. In order to discern beauty in this music, it may be necessary to revise old definitions radically. It affronted the ear quite as much yesterday as when first heard. This business of writing in three tonalities at once is as upsetting to the lullaby theory of beauty as is Schönberg's atonality; but it does not leave one with the sense of chaos imparted by that Viennese. If it be granted that there is artistic beauty in adapting musical means to intellectual aim, then it is not extravagant to see this music as a work of art.

Doubtless Stravinsky profited by the program which preceded him. Either because the D minor symphony has been heard too often of late, or because Mr. Monteux missed its content in articulating its syllables, Franck yesterday seemed tedious and banal. The nobility we have associated with this music was gone, and what remained was disconcertingly near to sentimentality. As for the Berlioz march, although it was admirably played, we feel it belongs to the "Pops" and not to the subscription concerts.

Chopin was chiefly vehicle for the exquisite art of Mr. Rosenthal. This concerto in itself is not moving music. The orchestral accompaniment is dull, and the solo part is less than inspired. Nevertheless, the delicate beauty of the pianist's tone and phrasing, made audible by Mr. Monteux's discreet subordination of the orchestra, gave some of the most delightful moments of the afternoon.

L. A. S.

Ad Tra 12

ERTISer

ROSENTHAL AT THE SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," the tone picture which, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been the one outstanding sensation of the New York musical season, was given again at yesterday's Symphony matinee, but many did not wait to hear it, and those who did were pretty cool.

As an interpreter of such modernist music, Pierre Monteux is without an equal.

Moriz Rosenthal

Whether the Stravinsky music as like caviar is all a matter of taste and cultivation. The old-fashioned, who still dote on Handel and Beethoven, may not like it. But the artistic power and brilliancy of these Boston Symphony performances under Monteux has won more compliments for the orchestra than anything on the record since Mr. Muck's conductorship.

Cesar Franck's symphony, which has the place of honor on the regular program this week, is also a work which Mr. Monteux conducts with consummate success. He is happiest in French and Russian music, without a doubt. The audience was delighted with the Franck piece and gave the whole orchestra an ovation.

Moriz Rosenthal, this week's soloist, gave a brilliant performance of Chopin's E minor piano concerto. He also received something like an ovation. Berlioz's "Rokoczy March" is also on the program.

"RITES OF SPRING" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Stravinsky's Masterpiece Repeated

Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performances here and in New York earlier in the present season, was repeated as an "extra, by general request" at the end of yesterday's Symphony program. A full length concert preceded it, including the Franck symphony, Chopin's E minor concerto superbly played by Rosenthal, and Berlioz' "Hungarian March."

Yet all but 200 of the audience remained to hear the much discussed Stravinsky music again. Since most of the audience were willing to wait till 5 o'clock to hear it again, perhaps the management were unduly cautious in making the repetition an afterpiece instead of the chief item on the program. The performance was again a triumph for Mr Monteux and the orchestra.

"The Rites of Spring" is certainly the most vivid and stimulating new music heard here in a decade. If the pitch of nervous excitement to which the listener is raised is to be the test of a composer's work and genius then Stravinsky has by this music placed himself among the immortals. One may dislike "The Rites of Spring" intensely, as many no doubt do, but can anyone feel languid and neutral concerning it?

Music Is Strident

Strident and harsh as much of the piece is, one cannot accuse it of being mere noise. There is almost too obviously method in Stravinsky's madness.

A portion of the piece more considerable than one recalled from a single previous hearing of it is so mild that no doubt the youngest futurists are already denouncing it as banal. Yet in the memorable portions the piling of rhythm upon rhythm, in a counterpoint fettered by no rules of harmony, the extraordinary sonority of the more pungent dissonances, which are polyharmonic, the way in which climaxes broaden and mount from single melodic motives, combine to produce an impression upon the listener that at moments is almost overwhelming. It is by its climaxes that this music will live.

The effect of this piece upon modern music is already discernible, and as in the comparable case of "Tristan and Isolde" long ago, the effect is for the most part bad. Stravinsky has enriched the language of music, and if other people would use his idioms without trying to copy his ideas, the art would be the gainer.

Monteux Is Recalled

The applause at the close was enthusiastic, but from a minority of those present. It sufficed to recall Mr Monteux and to bring the orchestra to its feet, but after the cheers and stamping reported from New York when the orchestra repeated "Le Sacre" there the reputation of this city for coldness to novelties must have seemed sustained.

Rosenthal was warmly applauded for his playing of Chopin's E minor concerto, an early and far from a great work. The crystalline clarity and suavity of his performance suited the music. He made the slow movement tender and appealing and the finale graceful without any forcing or exaggeration. As a technician he is almost incomparable. This music made no undue demands on his imagination. The exquisite taste of his playing commended it highly.

Mr Monteux lead brilliant performances of the Franck and Berlioz numbers, which as repertory pieces need no special remark. The Stravinsky seemed less volcanic and better ordered than before, but one lost sight of the performance in the overwhelming interest of the music itself.

P. R.

ONEGIN AND SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Sigrid Onegin, the celebrated contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "The Russian Easter," in observance of Holy week. The symphony will be the Unfinished in B minor of Schubert. Two compositions will have their first hearing in Boston on this occason. The fantasy, "The Victory Ball" of Ernest Schelling, has been played and even repeated in several cities with unusual success. It is a setting of Alfred Noyes's poem in which the grim shadows of soldiers fallen in battle haunt the revelry of the ballroom. The scofe will be conducted by the composer. Frederick Converse's tone poem, "Song of the Sea," based on verses of Walt Whitman, will also be played.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "Ach mur einmal noch in Leben," from Mozart's "Titus," and two songs by Richard Strauss.

Onegin Soloist at Symphony Concerts

AT the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Madame Sigrid Onegin, the celebrated contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Pierre Monteux will open this program with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture. The symphony will be Schubert's in B minor. Two scores will have their first hearing in Boston, "The Victory Ball," a fantasia by Ernest Schelling, which is a setting of Alfred Noyes' poem of the ghosts of soldiers fallen in battle, who haunt the ballroom revels. The score will be conducted by the composer. Frederick Converse's tone poem, "Song of the Sea," based on verses of Walt Whitman, will also be played.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "Ach mur einmal noch in Leben," from Mozart's "Titus," and two songs by Richard Strauss.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux announces two novel pieces. From manuscript, conductor and orchestra will play a tone-poem by Mr. Converse, "Song of the Sea," suggested by verse of Walt Whitman. Once before, with "The Mystic Trumpeter," the poet stirred the composer to some of the best of his music-making. The other new number is "The Victory Ball," Mr. Schelling's fantasia that has already gone the round of symphony concerts in the United States. Again verses stirred the composer—a poem by Alfred Noyes in which he sets face to face the mob of such a party and the ghosts of dead soldiers whom—he chooses to believe—were "idealists" in the late war. Mr. Schelling is dyed yet more deeply with this contrast, and out of a full and disillusioned heart writes a bitter music. A fox-trot sounds. The shades shiver. For routine pieces, the programme promises Rimsky-Korsakov's overture of churchly prides and pomps, "Russian Easter," and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. As assisting singer, Mme. Onegin will be heard in an air from Mozart'r opera, "Titus," and in two songs by Strauss.

Frederick Converse's tone poem, "Song of the Sea," based on verses by Walt Whitman, and Ernest Schelling's fantasy, "The Victory Ball," that is a tonal commentary upon the poem of Alfred Noyes. The latter piece was heard last autumn from Sousa's band, but this will be its first performance in Boston in its proper orchestral guise. Between whiles Sigrid Onegin will sing an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and two songs by Richard Strauss.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Monday Evening

Monday evening in Symphony Hall Mr. Monteux will conduct the fifth and last of this special series of concerts, with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the major item on the programme. Eva Gauthier, justly celebrated for her sympathetic singing of the music of the worthier modern composers as well as of her recently much-advertised jazz, will sing with the orchestra Ravel's "Two Hebrew Poems," and in addition the florid aria, "Una voce poco fa," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." For music new to Boston there will be a Suite by the Italian Rosario Scalero, written for solo string quartet and string orchestra. And finally with excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" Mr. Monteux will bid farewell to his public of the Monday evening concerts.

In Cambridge

Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, with Constance McGlinchee as soloist, the orchestra will give the eighth of the current series of Cambridge concerts. Miss McGlinchee, a young Boston pianist, will play Schumann's Concerto; Franck's Symphony, Edward Burlingame Hill's Second Suite of "Stevensoniana" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March" make the remainder of the programme.

Subscription Concerts

At the regular subscription concerts of the week Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist. The eminent pianist, long unheard at these concerts, will play Chopin's E minor Concerto; and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" March will conclude the regular programme. As supplement will come, however, what to many will seem the most important item: Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," thus repeated in response to many and urgent requests for another hearing of this significant music.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts of this week Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "The Russian Easter," will, in observance of Holy Week, begin the programme, and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony will succeed it. Two new pieces also stand upon the programme,

---

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Efrem Zimbalist will be the soloist at this week's pair of symphony concerts, playing Tschaikovsky's Violin Concerto. An early symphony of Mozart, in C major, hitherto unheard in Boston, will begin the programme, and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" will conclude it.

The Daily Telegraph reviewed Mr. Koussevitsky's concert of March 10th in London. The program included Brahms's Fourth Symphony and Strauss's "Don Juan." "The most illuminating performance came with the symphony, the massive architecture of which showed Mr. Koussevitsky's power of building up and holding a climax far more favorably than did Strauss's symphonic poem . . . Quite apart from the fact that the orchestra had a good deal of difficulty in sorting out the conductor's complicated directions, there were several places where Mr. Koussevitsky left us wondering whether the Don was really so feverishly melodramatic a personage as he made him out to be."

Koussevitsky and Weingartner

The comparison between the readings of the Ninth Symphony by these two great conductors has been fascinating, but the temptation to set it out in detail must be resisted. Koussevitsky's version was more emotional in intention, and may possibly have actually moved some listeners' emotions more, but moved mine less. In the slow movement he lost heavily by an attempt at more "expression" than the music will bear. The Scherzo was magnificently vigorous. In the last movement the great tune entered pianissimo, and the passing crescendo at the twelfth and similar bars was not, as with Weingartner, slightly overdone. One general fault was that the wind was too little controlled, and its tone allowed to become rough. [Percy A. Scholes in The London Observer.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Monteux has set the programmes for his final pairs of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra, and to the end his liking for little known, modern and high-humored music holds firm. On Friday and Saturday of next week, he will begin with a brief and almost unknown Symphony of Mozart, in C major, numbered 200 in Köchel's catalogue. Thereafter, Mr. Zimbalist, added "assisting artist" to the list for the year, will play the solo-part in Chaikovsky's Concerto for Violin. The promised repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" fills the second half of the concert. For his final programme on Friday, May 2 and Saturday, May 3, the conductor is beyond cavil. The choser pieces are:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Suite for Orchestra, "Adventures in a Perambulator".....Carpente
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eglogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun".....Debuss
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser"

The Opportunity of Dr. Davison's Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus Renowned in a Day—The Symphony Orchestra's Need of It—Choral Masterpieces Long Neglected—Programmes in Prospect

NOW that the last note has been sounded and the last plaudit clapped, shouted or printed, the remarkable chorus assembled and practised by Dr. Davison for the centenary performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony has seemingly finished its work. Through a year, virtually, it has existed in germ or in fruition. As long, it kept zest for a relentless task that at many a toilsome moment might have seemed tedious, were it not for the visioned end. To that goal conductor and choir held firm and clear; while in month after month of rehearsal eagerness and devotion warmed such diligence. Indeed, it was as though he and they foresaw this "impossible" choral close sung as never before in American ears. Comparisons out of memory and speculation may be futile; but there is reason to believe that no British Festival Choir or even the chorus of Siegfried Ochs in old days in Berlin ever surpassed in this "Hymn to Joy" these youth of the colleges beyond the Charles.

Yet as it is, such a band of singers seems likely to part company with the Symphony Orchestra, to which it is already peer and to which it could be associate at need and beyond valuing. Worse still, in the annual flux of two collegiate communities, it may be dissolved altogether, even though the Glee Club of Harvard and the Choral Society of Radcliffe remain for twofold nucleus. The hope to the contrary is Dr. Davison's persisting intention to join his two choirs, sooner or later, in the Requiem of Brahms, with a sufficient orchestra from Symphony Hall assisting. Brahms of the Requiem is indeed no Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony; but piece and choir and Dr. Davison, each in respective quality, are enough to whet anticipation and promise rare accomplishment. After Brahms, with this Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus annually renewed from the incoming student-body, why not also Bach and more Beethoven? Boston has seldom heard the abiding masterpiece of Bach, the Mass in B minor. (Years ago The Cecilia, in prime, sang it.) It has well-nigh forgotten the "Solemn Mass" and equal masterpiece of Beethoven. Yet by every sign of last Sunday a public, twice exhausting Symphony Hall, would thrill to hear both anew. Dr. Davision holds the key and he is at the beginning still of a justly ambitious prime.

Even so, it is the trustees, the management and the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra who may well put that key within the lock. Its coöperation would be necessary to performance of Bach's Mass or his Matthew Passion-Music; essential with the Mass of Beethoven or the heaven-scaling Requiem of Berlioz. Yet in its own business, as the homely phrase goes, the Symphony Orchestra needs a chorus, massed when the occasion warrants; yielding a smaller but otherwise undiminished choir when the composer so wills. More than once Mr. Monteux has put by music that he wished to play—Debussy's Third Nocturne or Ravel's First Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"—because he had no singers at command. On occasion, he has declined novel and promising pieces—say Mr. Eichheim's new Suite of oriental numbers—because it also exacted voices. Increasingly the composers of our time tend to join them to an orchestra. There is always Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and —longissimo intervallo—certain Symphonies of Mahler. There is also Schumann's "Faust," nowadays virtually unheard, Liszt's mass and so on with the cataloguing.

The Symphony Concerts are diminished when there is not a chorus as well as an orchestra to serve them. Through a year Dr. Muck gained such a choir. Mr. Monteux had an orchestra to restore before he could ask Dr. Davison for 300 schooled singers. Mr. Kusevitzky is familiar hand with chorus and orchestra joined. Being prudent men, the Trustees have indeed to weigh income and outgo; but justifiably could they spend upon such a choir as Dr. Davison could give them from Harvard and Radcliffe. As for the distraction of those young men and maidens from "collegiate duties," the practice of the arts, begun early, has long and lasti re...ards. "We learn," said Cicero in

Cont'... Following Page

Two compositions will be performed in Boston for the first time at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening: Converse's "Song of the Sea" and Schelling's "A Victory Ball." The former has not been played before. Mr. Schelling will conduct his Fantasy, which, produced at Philadelphia, has been performed in several cities.

Mr. Converse went again to Walt Whitman for his inspiration, and chose "On the Beach at Night," which begins:

On the beach at night,
Stands a child with her father,
Watching the east, the autumn sky."

It is the sixth poem in Whitman's "Sea-Drift." The music was sketched during the winter of 1922-23 and completed last December. Mr. Converse writes of his music: "While it is no. in any sense a literal interpretation of it (Whitman's poem), it follows the spiritual and emotional sequence of the lines: beginning with words of mystery and sadness, it culminates in elation and joy. I have not attempted a realistic picture of the sea, only something of its spiritual suggestion."

Mr. Converse had already found inspiration in Whitman's verse for compositions performed here and in other cities. There is his "Mystic Trumpeter" for orchestra. (This poem of Whitman's moved George H. Clutsam to write his work for solo voices, chorus and orchestra about 20 years ago. Hamilton Harty's "Mystic Trumpeter" for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra was brought out at the Leeds (Eng.) music festival in 1913.).

And 20 years ago Mr. Converse composed his two poems, "Night" and "Day," for piano and orchestra. The motto of the former is the first line of Whitman's "A Clear Midnight": "This is thy hour, O Soul; thy free flight into the wordless." For the second, the motto is "Day full blown and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter."

Mr. Schelling wrote to Lawrence Gilman, the accomplished editor of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Program Books, when the Fantasy was produced in Philadelphia in February, 1923:

"I had come back from Europe still very much under the impression of the cataclysm, much troubled for the future, and was amazed to find that so few seemed to remember what the war really had meant, with its sacrifice of life and youth. I had wondered, when watching the seething mass of humanity at some cabaret, what our boys would think of it all, and I had a sinister vision similar to the one which made me write my '1914' Impression. I came across Alfred Noyes's poem, 'A Victory Ball,' while in this mood, and was impelled to use it as the basis for an orchestral fantasy . . . I have used two army bugle calls: the 'Call to Arms' and 'Charge,' which ominously usher in the war vision; and at the very end of the piece I have used 'Taps.' The work is a perfectly free fantasy, with, however, a certain amount of thematic development. . . . I had occasion during the war to hear the Scotch pipers, and to observe the extraordinary effect their music had on the troops; and at the end of the work I have tried to make the whole orchestra a huge bagpipe, perhaps the most pagan and primitive form of music."

The Fantasy is dedicated: "To the memory of an American soldier."

Mr. Schelling served with the United States forces overseas from October, 1917, to April, 1920. He was commissioned captain of infantry on Aug. 5, 1917, and promoted to major on Nov. 10, 1918; on Nov. 19, 1919, he received the French Legion of Honor.

Sigrid Onegin of the Metropolitan Opera will sing at these concerts for the first time. She has chosen an aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito"—she will sing it in German—an aria given to Sextus in the opera, a male impersonated by a female contralto, and Strauss's songs; "Morgen," "Muttertaendelei" and "Caecilie." Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony will be performed.

The programs for the two remaining concerts will be as follows:

Twenty-third—A little symphony, E major, by the young Mozart, to be played for the first time in Boston; Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto (Mr. Zimbalist, violinist), and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, which was heard earlier in the season.

Twenty-fourth and last—Beethoven, Symphony No. 5; Carpenter, "Adventures of a Perambulator," Debussy; "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Beyond all praise, beyond all remembered impression or recalled experience, was the outcome. The Davisonian three hundred actually sang Beethoven's measures even as he had set them down—sang them certainly, eagerly, freely, as a chorus to which they had become both familiar and inspiriting. They sang them also with every essential musical means and virtue. Precise and unanimous was their attack and release. They articulated, they phrased with a single voice, a single understanding, and a wondrous clearness. They were keen for pace, quick to rhythm. They fell short with not a modulation, gradient, pause, sustained height, as ordained by composer or conductor. Their tone was large, warm, transparent, supple, infused with that musical quality which is of the mind and the heart as well as of the voice and the ear. The jointure and the overlaying of the parts, the balance with the orchestra, were never in question or at fault. Time and again, singers and players moved as one body, both winged and welded.

In the Finale of the Ninth Symphony, most choirs labor merely to sound Beethoven's music—and then sound it in half measure. These young men of Harvard, these maidens of Radcliffe, not only sounded it to the full; but under that transmitting and inspiriting force which is Dr. Davison's genius, they loosed also Beethoven's passion and exaltation. For once this "Ode to Joy," in the ears of the imaginative listener, seemed to scale the heavens and span the world . . . Large are written two morals. Beethoven did not write an "impossible" music in this Finale. He wrote, rather, a music to fire and free a chorus of mettle, fitly and fully practised. Secondly, when Dr. Davison and this choir of Harovertures—the variations of Mr. Sch... the Oriental piece of Mr. Griffes, deserve repetition in themselves, in comparison with repeated numbers from Europeans, by the manifest interest and pleasure of the public. The American composer has proved himself worthy to be heard. Not a winter passes without fresh sealing of his deserts. Give him half a chance and three or four of him will prove, like Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Bloch, their right to a place in the established and the recurring repertory. Once more is routine abomination—and in this instance clear injustice.

H. T. P.

32

Ottawa News April 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES A WONDERFUL CONCERT RARE IN MUSICAL ANNALS HERE

Vast Crowd of Nearly 5,000 People Thrilled by the Remarkable Skill of This Foremost Organization

PIERRE MONTEUX GIVEN OVATION

Auditorium is Well Adapted for Musical Event of This Kind and the Fine Acoustics of the Large Building Are Revealed

A search in the music annals of Ottawa would have to be mighty exhaustive and cover all times to reveal records of such a wonderful concert as that given in the Auditorium last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for beyond all doubts it was as impressive a performance that one could ever anticipate hearing. For nearly half a century this extraordinary group of instrumentalists has held a foremost place among orchestras of world renown. The current season is the forty-third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, as the result of its remarkable conductor, Pierre Monteux, is now conceded to be all but without equal on the globe. That it has taken Ottawa completely by storm was amply shown by the reception accorded the players and leader by the vast audience of over 4,000 listeners who were carried past restraint of applause into cheering at the conclusion of the Wagner Overture. Time after time Pierre Monteux was recalled to the stage to acknowledge the uproariously warm acknowledgements bestowed upon him, and he was most modest in this respect for in turning to his hundred players to stand up in order that they may bear their share of the laurels, Monteux drew further cheers of admiration from the large crowd present.

Tschaikovsky's Symphony.

To do anything like justice to the beautiful Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky, not only is a perfect ensemble of proficient players necessary, but also a conductor thoroughly competent to interpret and lead such forces. In these respects the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is 100 per cent. for the playing of this fine work was one of the grandest orchestral treats to be heard in an age. So complete, musicianly and masterly was it done that a truly comprehensive writing would monopolize columns. As one of the greatest masters in symphonic composition, Tschaikovsky availed himself of almost every instrument known to incorporate all of the desired tonal effects and descriptive brilliancies. With tempo and strength graded to increase to the third and fourth movements, namely the Scherzo and Finale, one gradually and steadily devours a musical feast when hearing such a rendering as that given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Romance and emotion constitute the crux of the main construction of this work which is one of the finest bequeathed to the musical library.

Passing to the third movement, how impressive was the finesse of the many violin pizzicatos which are passed among and alternated between the several stringed section, with startling precision, yet surprising simplicity, with the beautiful theme eventually adopted by light wind instruments. In the fourth movement the effect of brass and cymbals combined with the massed playing of all can hardly be aptly described as merely impressive—it was thrilling—for it wafted the minds of the enormous audience into the planes of elevated musical wonderment. And this to the extent that at the termination of the finale, applause broke most enthusiastically, renewed and renewed as the famous conductor was forced to return and face his heated greetings.

Again, to enter into details with the object of recording proper credit for the playing of the remaining works individually could well be made the subject of a glorious musical story. One must necessarily have been among the audience to have a true idea of the splendor which characterized the playing of this orchestra. From the opening movement of the Tschaikowsky Symphony to the final bar of the Tannhauser Overture the thousands of people who attended were ever on tiptoe point of admiration and made no effort to restrain it at the termination of each number.

Pierre Monteux.

The programme given last night was of a perfect type to show what can actually be accomplished by a conductor when leading such a highly capable group of players. It also showed how supreme musical knowledge and personality in leadership count so heavily in keeping a mass of players together. Pierre Monteux unquestionably is known to be one of the greatest orchestral conductors of the age, and his world-wide reputation in this capacity was splendidly demonstrated to the thousands who turned out to hear what his unique power of leadership stands for.

Notwithstanding his heavy responsibilities, Pierre Monteux is of the affable and patient disposition. When applause and cheering rose to dizzy heights he would modestly revert to his players to come to their feet and participate. That they work with him through and through was only too obvious and accounted for the exemplary success that they achieved. It would set anyone hard at thought to grasp the key as to the phenomenal way in which he controls his men, but much lies in

Warmly Acclaimed

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herald April 19

ONEGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Music by Converse Schelling Played

Sigrid Onegin, whose phenomenal contralto voice has already made her a popular favorite here, was soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. The first performance anywhere of "Song of the Sea," a tone poem by F. S. Converse of Boston and the first performance at these concerts of Ernest Schelling's "A Victory Ball" showed Mr Monteux, as always, willing to give the American composer a chance to be heard. Each novelty was well received.

Mme Onegin's voice has the power, the beauty of tone, the wide range and the flexibility needed to make Mozart's beautiful air "Deh Per Questo Instante Solo" from "Titus" effective. Except that she used German instead of the original Italian text there was little fault to find with her singing and very much to enjoy.

Strauss' "Morgen," "Caecilie" and his less known "Muttertandelei," with orchestral accompaniments scored by the composer were her other numbers. More repose and less sentiment would have suited "Morgen" better, but the fault here was with the orchestra. These songs or at least the two first named may well outlive Strauss' other works. Mme Onegin very properly sang them in the original German. It is always a mistake to use a different text from that which the composer set.

Mr Converse's "Song of the Sea," suggested by Walt Whitman's poem, was cordially applauded. Much of the piece is sonorous and at a first hearing impressive. Yet one felt that other works by the same composer, among them his Second Symphony and "Mystic Trumpeter," are both more profound and more original in conception. In "Song of the Sea" a more frugal use of full orchestra would enhance the dramatic effects. The introductory portion of the piece has the most atmospheric color.

Ernest Schelling, best known here as a pianist, conducted an impressive performance of his fantasy, "A Victory Ball," suggested by the poem of that title by Alfred Noyes. Poet and composer alike are troubled by the strange readiness the world in general showed to forget the men who died in the war.

Mr Schelling's music has a prelude obviously suggested by the whistles and bells of the delirious dawn of Armistice Day. Then follow dance rhythms, polonaise, waltz, tango. The ball is interrupted. The bugle calls, "Call to arms" and "Charge," are sounded above the nervous mutter of drums. The music evokes phantom hosts marching over forgoten fields of battle. "Dies Irae" is heard. Then the ball goes on, but it has become a joyless bacchanale. Just before the close "Taps" is sounded off stage.

Sousa's Band first played this work in Boston last September and it then impressed the listener as extraordinarily vivid and intensely dramatic music with none of the banality one might have expected from its program. Mr Schelling has found mordant harmonies, restless rhythms, bitter tones to convey the irony of recent history, which has cut so deeply into the consciousness of most sensitive men who were young in 1914. No living American and few living Europeans have so fine a work to their credit.

Mr Monteux led excellent performances of Rimsky Korsakov's rather chaotic "Russian Easter" and of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." The B minor symphony is one of the durable satisfactions of life.

P. R.

Globe April 19

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW FANTASIA

Shelling's "Victory Ball" Played for the First Time in Boston

PROGRAM TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter"; Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Converse, "Song of the Sea," Tone poem after Walt Whitman; Schelling, "A Victory Ball." Sigrid Onegin, who sang here with the Symphony orchestra for the first time, sang "Ach nur eimal nock im Leban" from Mozart's "Titus," and three songs by Strauss: "Morgen," "Mutter taendelei" and "Caecilie." Converse's tone poem was performed for the first time. Mr. Schelling conducted his Fantasy, which was played here for the first time.

Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is one of the most impressive musical compositions that we have heard in the concert hall for many years. It sets the nerves atingling. It shakes the soul.

He did not write this Fantasia merely as a lover of grim, ironic poetry, reading Alfred Noyes's vision of dead soldiers watching the dancers, unmindful of war's horrors and the sacrifice made by young and old; he himself had served gallantly; he knew what war meant. Outraged by flippancy and frivolity, by the forgetfulness of those surviving, saved for their wanton pleasures by the death of thousands and tens of thousands, he was fired to composition by the splendid savagery, the burning invective of the poet's lines.

And Mr. Schelling wrote as an accomplished musician as well as a soldier and a patriot; wrote dramatically, tragically; not with conventionally theatrical intent and emphasis, for, terribly in earnest, blazing with indignation, he yet was faithful to art; and so this Fantasia is the more impressive. Hysterical outbursts, merely melodramatic effects, would have lessened the effect that is now overwhelming.

He did not miss the opportunity given by the poet for the contrast between riotous life and the shock and the scorn of the dead, unseen spectators. There are the vivid musical pictures of marching soldiers, the tramping toward death or victory. The Dies Irae and the Scottish bagpipes are heard; all this as in a vision that might have turned the dancers to stone. And after the great climax, skilfully led up to from rolling drums, is heard a trumpeter far off, sounding "Taps," the final tribute.

No wonder that this Fantasia is dedicated "To the memory of an American soldier."

Mr. Converse went again to Walt Whitman for his inspiration. Choosing Whitman's "On the Beach at Night" he wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation of the lines into music, nor did he endeavor to describe realistically the shatter of the sea. The spiritual contents of poems attract him; in this instance the successive moods of the child mourning the momentary disappearance of stars and planet, and then the comforting thought of immortality. So in this "Song of the Sea," a reassured, heightened, joyous spirit triumphs at last over the opening mood of sadness.

Nature gave Mme. Onegin an uncommonly beautiful voice. Art has done little for her. The more the pity. At present she is not acquainted with certain elementary and essential principles of song. It could be wished that at a Symphony concert ,a woman about to sing would come upon the stage and bear herself with dignity and grace.

The orchestra gave a superb performance of "The Russian Easter."

The concert will be repeated to-night. The program of next week is as follows: a symphony, C major, by the young Mozart, which will be heard for the first time in Boston; Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto played by Mr. Zimbalist, and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, which was performed earlier in the season.

Herald

THE POPS OPENING

The musical public of Boston ceases to be serious when April is over. Beginning with the first Monday in May, which is always the opening night of the Pops in Symphony Hall, they attune themselves to the musical season in the lighter vein. The pending season will be the 39th of the Pops, and the eighth under the leadership of Agide Jacchia. In each of his seasons the Pops have broken all previous records in attendance and general popularity. There is every sign that his eighth will be another record season. Pop concerts with special programs will be given on alternate Sunday Evenings. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor and in the Pops bar and cafe. The orchestra will number about 80. Mr. Jacchia's versatility may be seen in the opening program for May 5th, wherein is combined the gratefully familiar and the refreshingly new:—

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"..... Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..... Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie"..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"..... Puccini
Oriental Rhapsody Evening Call of the Guard
Dance of the Young people..... Glazounov
Burlesca..... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Selection, "Wildflower"... Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance No. 1..... Dvorak

Post

Serge Koussevitzky, whom Boston is to know as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra next year, has been directing the three concluding concerts of the London Symphony. A correspondent of the Musical Digest writes that while the "pure Brahmin" might object to the almost programmatic drama that Mr. Koussevitzky read into the score of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, his readings are always musical and that his "Brahms interpretations are of a very special sort." Such report can scarcely fail to fan the fires of Bostonian anticipation.

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

KOUSSEVITZKY, BY NEW REPORT FROM PRACTISED HEARER

WAYS AND WORKS OF A MANIFOLD CONDUCTOR

D. C. Parker, Able British Writer, Recounts in Musical America the Russian's Range and Prowess—The Ancients, the Classics, the Moderns — Perception, Sensibility, Devotion and Power

TO say that the best of conductors begin at the beginning may seem to many the utterance of a platitude. If it be so, the platitude is a superior one. For very few concert-goers realize how, and where, the conductor begins to exercise his authority. It is not with the opening note, as one might hastily suppose. Apart from rehearsals, of which the great public knows nothing and hears but little, there remains the magic moment when the personality of the conductor first makes its magnetic influence felt. To give an example of this is by no means difficult. The scribe has only to mention the one word, Nikisch, to bring to mind the mystery and romance it conveys. And those who, in the past, studied Nikisch's ways and methods will allow that his instinct for the right thing, as shown in a knowledge of crowd-psychology, helped him to gain his countless victories with the audiences he held spellbound. Was there not something unforgettable in that slow, measured approach to the scene of action; something that bespoke an easy confidence and a masterly assurance?

Nor is it only in the march to his stand that the conductor can impress an audience before a single note has been sounded. We know that cunning can also be exercised during the fateful moment at the end of a piece, when sound gives place to silence. It is not so generally realized that art and craft can lend the equally fateful moment at the start, when silence, yields to sound, [illegible] and enchantment. Think of those two critical junctures. . . .

You will come to see that the conductor can, and often does, impress those gathered together by making the most of them. A pause, neither too short nor too long, but enough to feed curiosity and breed the sense of mystery—this has, in the cases of great exponents, led to the early surrender of the audience and tuned the interpretation to the right spiritual key.

I thought of these and other sundry matters when lately I had the opportunity of hearing several concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who goes to Boston this fall. He proceeds to the scene of action as though he were the person in the hall least concerned about subsequent events. There is no pose, no claptrap, no fussy trick in order to attract the attention of the public. But you feel for all the modesty in demeanor and quietness of entrance, that the man will have his hand on every essential point as it arises. He faces his orchestra to attack the first item. Here he allows that sense of the value of the pause which I have just indicated. If his determination of it is instinctive, he obeys a sound impulse. If it is calculated, he has been accurate in his estimate of the effect of the pause upon his hearers. A little longer would be too long; a little less, and our mysterious sense of impending adventures would not have time to develop.

On looking over the programmes in which I heard Koussevitzky conduct, I am struck by the catholicity displayed in them. In his short story, "The Man Who Was," Rudyard Kipling contrasts the Russian as the most easterly of Western peoples and as the most westerly of Eastern. Koussevitzky is a Russian who, somehow, does not fall into either of Kipling's categories. He has played a considerable part in the musical life of his country. He was intimate with Skriabin. But these experiences, while no doubt giving him authority to speak on Russian pieces and permitting him to approach them in the proper spirit, have not been gained at the expense of narrowness of outlook, sympathy or conviction.

Strange as it may seem, Koussevitzky exhibits a special affection for ancient music of a type that might not be supposed to appeal to a Russian of these times. I remember remarkable performances of movements from a Concerto Grosso of Handel in D Minor and of a Concerto in D for small orchestra by Emanuel Bach. The son has been somewhat obscured by the overwhelming shadow of his father. This specimen of his skill and musicianship came to me as a piece of infinite refreshment. The Andante proved to be a touchingly imaginative page, and all I need says is that Koussevitzky realized the tenderness and the beauty. Then I heard him do a Concerto of Vivaldi, scored by Siloti for orchestra and organ. It is the kind of music which audiences often think deadly dull, because so many exponents cannot make it anything else. "This old pattern stuff can look after itself," might also be uttered by some performers, so perfunctory is their treatment of it. Your big man will have nothing to do with this fatal, blasting philosophy. He will see, and enforce, the human aspect. He will remember that the word Vivaldi, or whatever it may be, does not stand for a dull parchment, but for a man whose heart beat and in whose veins blood flowed. Koussevitzky can humanize the old masters. He can keep the pattern intact while evoking from the depths of them music both warmth and animation. A further demonstration of the difficult art of waking the dust of ages into life came in a performance of a set of old dances and airs for the lute, transcribed tastefully by Respighi. Whatever else may be said of him, Koussevitzky is no superior.

Of Koussevitzky's readings of "Pathetic" by Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's Symphony in E Minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's Fifth. While these symphonies can be viewed from more than one standpoint, the hearer has a perfect right to look for consistency and that vitalizing process without which the notes remain an inanimate mass. On each occasion Koussevitzky provided thrills and got highly exciting performances —and this, be it said, without resort to meretricious expedients. The "Pathetic" was transformed into a moving drama, extraordinarily wide in emotional range and overwhelming in the march movement. Brahms's Fourth Symphony never became prosy. On the finale, which, by reason of structure, presents some problems, Koussevitzky stamped his personality. The last page or two of Beethoven's Fifth swept along gloriously. Assuredly much can be done with this diatonic music if only the plain man holds the reins. As for Schubert, I thought it remarkable for the real pianissimo obtained and the subtle manner in which beautifully balanced chords were drawn from the orchestra.

All that I heard Koussevitzy do convinces me that he will have no small vogue in America. He did not lead his forces through a single piece that had not benefited from the care he bestowed upon it—a care so solicitous for the welfare of the music that it extended to the smallest detail. More than most conductors, he made me confident that he felt the music. His was no humdrum routine job, no apathetic or desultory jog-trot to the double-bar. Each time he gave the signal for attack, it seemed as though the artist in him had begun anew the endless battle for what is great and noble in his world. But if it is within Koussevitzky's power thus to reach and dwell upon the heights, the altitude is attained at the price of no blighting uniformity. His Mozart, as exemplified in "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," is authentic Mozart—and how seldom one encounters it! His "Venusberg Music" from "Tannhauser" has all the surge, lure and color which Wagner imparts. He catches the poetry which lies at the core of Bax's "Garden of Fand." And I should place conspicuous among his merits the ability to do full justice to the programme of such a piece as "Till Eulenspiegel" and the emotional scheme of such a piece as "The Poem of Ecstasy" without allowing the music to suffer thereby.

Personality counts, but it is a power which, like other powers, can be used both profitably and improfitably. Koussevitzky has it in generous measure. His heart and soul are at the end of his baton. I felt his concerts, sure that he knew the difficulties standing in the way of subtle and superior interpretation; that he was the last man in the world to take the quick and easy path which leads only to a passing notoriety with the unreflective. He realizes that without dust there can be no palm; that without devotion and concentration the triumph dare not be expected. He might well say, varying the words of a French king, "L'orchestre, c'est moi," for he makes the most of the material in his hands and welds his orchestra into one sensitive and responsive instrument. In gesture and movement he is neither reticent nor flamboyant. All he does has its significance. I see him still drawing out of the orchestra those magic strains of Wagner in that peculiar way of his, as though he coaxed them from another sphere. Without a shadow of doubt, Koussevitzky is a born conductor, who will take his place among the notable personalities to whom the American public owes so much.

[Reprinted from Musical America for April 12, 1924]

M. Stravinsky's Idea of Spring Shows and Shaws Seen in New Yor

TO THE EDITOR

For many years I have ended the week with the Symphony concert. I read in the Saturday Herald the criticism of Mr. Philip Hale and so, on Saturday night, I have an accurate opinion of the pieces and can marshall easily the appropriate emotions. I then go home feeling that I have done my duty to my city and to myself.

Unfortunately, this week Saturday the perfection have attained was rudely interrupted, as usual my Saturday night, and was told that Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was the abomination of desolation." I had already heard Stravinsky once, and doubted somewhat the accuracy of this cruel and reactionary criticism. A friend went with me who had never heard Stravinsky. Bitterly was worn out with the wicked world and felt that sweet music regarding spring might rest him.

The "Rite of Spring" "was by request," and after those who had requested it had flocked out we settled back to enjoy it. The first part deals with the usual dances which always attend the coming of spring, at least in poetry and music. I do not remember encountering such procedure in New England. In other respects this first part was wonderfully realistic. The program book, which gives me all the ideas I have with regard to music, omits to state anything about the Russian spring. I should infer, however, that the spring in Russia must be quite like our New England weather. At all events, the first part dealt with every conceivable kind of weather and often with several kinds of weather at once, and in this way reminded me completely of our own New England spring—the cold in the head.

At the intermission a woman who sits in front of me left in some agitation, but as I knew that she was a devotee of Brahms and frivolous music of that kind, she undoubtedly was endeavoring to escape the future. The rest of us remained in our seats and braced ourselves for the second part.

In the second part the main motive is that of a girl who dances herself to death. While this is not the usual way in which we in New England greet the spring, we can be quite sympathetic with it. The opening of the second part was disappointing. There were moments when the instruments played together, but at last it came a contest between the kettle-drums egged on by the cymbals, and the [illegible] thump of the entire orchestra, which reminded me of a festive [illegible] New England spring—the [illegible] past of the Ancient and Honorables in the days before we had the present [illegible] law. The noise increased as the unfortunate neared her end. My friend shouted to me and [illegible] could make out, wanted to know how long this was to last. I did not reply because I had some doubts whether my voice would carry so far, and I feared that in one of the [illegible] moments of silence my answer would cause me confusion, but I nodded encouragingly to him and I saw him rest his head upon his hand. Finally the victim danced herself to death and the Rite came to an end. On looking around I was relieved to see that the heroine of the program was the [illegible] who apparently had perished. The rest of us arose and filed out with the feeling that every true New Englander must have, at an "extra by request," that we had received more than our money's worth.

I think this music of the future might properly be developed in two ways. In the first place, the instrument makers are very far behind the modern spirit. It is true that, like every modern work, the rite demands a tam-tam, and there is also the "trap drum," vulgarly called a scratcher. But these are not adequate. What is needed are instruments that can make noise. One conductor, I think it was Gilmore, at the time of the Peace Jubilee in Boston, arranged to have cannon go off on the Common at regular intervals. This idea, thus crudely expressed, could be enriched by having instruments of that kind at irregular intervals in Symphony hall itself. If then cymbals were substituted for the strings, which, after all, are weak and colorless in these days, and fit only to express the food of love, modern composers would have an orchestra in keeping with their ideas.

I also feel that the conductor might well be [illegible] with. There were times on Saturday when Mr. Monteux, with his punches at the medicine bag, actually kept the instruments together and so marred the true effect of the music, which under such restraint could hardly express adequately the idea of a New England spring. My suggestion would be that the conductor be left out, and that each instrument, augmented by the kind I have already described, should be allowed to play fortissimo with staccato intervals of silence irregularly interspersed. Effects like these would be worth while.

In any event, my faith in Philip Hale has gone. His feeble explanation that he is really not a reactionary fails to convince me. I really do not know now what my emotions at the concert ought to be, and I am almost reduced to forming my own opinion.

JOHANNES SMITH.

Against our helpless ears to fling
Its crash, clash, cling, clang, bing, bang, bing?
And then to call it "Rite of Spring"!
The season when on joyous wing
The birds melodious carols sing
And harmony's in everything!
He who could write the "Rite of Spring,"
If I be right, by right should swing!

To the Editor of the Sunday Herald:

Apropos of "The Rite of Spring," have heard just such sounds in country, but I should set the season later in the year, say about county fair time in September.

VERMONTER.

NOVEL NUMBERS, STANDARD ITEMS, ADMIRED SINGER

VARIED FARE AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Audience and Pieces—Mr. Schelling Passionately Inarticulate in "A Victory Ball" —Mr. Converse Fails to Fill the Sonorous Void of a "Song of the Sea"—Rimsky's Tonal Pageant — Schubert's Streaming Song—Mme. Onegin in Measured Richness

A MISCELLANY of eight pieces filled a Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon that none the less was shorter than usual. Mr. Stock with his Chicago orchestra and public set the fashion for such an assemblage of snippets. Now and again Mr. Stokowski copies it for his Philadelphians. Occasionally, by way of variety, it also pleases Mr. Monteux. How his Bostonians take it is not easy to say with any certainty. He began on Friday with Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter," and hearty and general was the clapping. He proceeded with that jaunt of the Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the applause was as brief, thin and tepid as though Mr. Bliss or Monsieur Honegger had signed the music. In the whole course of twenty-two pairs of concerts, from last October onwards, it is hard to remember a number more coldly received. Orchestrally, Mr. Monteux passed next to Mr. Converse's new tone-poem, "Song of the Sea." It was hardly an impressive music. Yet long and loud were the plaudits, not to be stayed until the composer bowed pleasure and gratitude. Finally, Mr. Schelling led the band through his fantasia, "A Victory Ball"—much more enkindling and engrossing piece. More perturbed, however, than warmed seemed the audience. Between whiles, Mme. Onegin sang an air from Mozart's opera in the grand manner, "Titus," and added to it three orchestrated songs of Strauss—the familiar "Morgen" and "Cäcilie," the less known "Muttertändelei." As she observed on many a score, she was loudly clapped.

Inference from these shows of hands is curiously contradictory. Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is readily understandable and insistently emphatic—so obvious indeed that Mr. Sousa has already set it in the workaday repertory of his band. "A Victory Ball," moreover, ends in a fashion to arrest listening ears and quicken comprehending sensibilities. In contrast, Mr. Converse's tone-poem is neither lucid musical sound nor impressive tonal imagery. Yet the Bostonian composer was heaped with applause; while the visitor from New York was less generously rewarded. With honor, in their own city and in their own society are our prophets of music, especially if they be in presence at the concert containing their handiwork. Again, there was no mistaking the pleasure of the audience in the swelling pomps, rhetorical fervors and florid decoration of Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture; but Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony—of the instrumental song that abides in beauty, of the mood envied alike by poets of words and poets of tones—it passed coldly by. So doing, it was beyond understanding. Give it Stravinsky and it cries for something "melodious." Give it Strauss, and it murmurs for something suave. Set before it the ideal beauty of Schubert the songful, Schubert the gentle; and it scarcely taps its palms. There is nothing so inscrutable as "what the public wants" from the practice of the arts. Therefore, we bystanders must always be peering at it.

Neither of the new pieces contributed much to the pleasure of the day. As a romantic idealist, Mr. Schelling watched the German war finally entered it himself. Like many another American, he saw in it no renewed struggle vi et armis for political and commercial destinies and supremacies. Sincerely and quite simply he regarded it as a contest on his side for the freedoms, the integrities, the aspirations and the peace of mankind. He believed that it would exist his fellow-soldiers as he was himself exalted. He counted the dead a noble sacrifice in a cause for which he also would have lain down for his life. Inevitably he was chagrined, disillusioned, embittered, as he looked upon the outcome of this "Great War," upon the course of human nature, upon the face of the world. His mood of devotion had run deep. His subsequent mood of revolt penetrated as deeply. So possessed, so craving relief and release, he seems to have written "A Victory Ball" on a hint from garish and rough-textured rhymes by the Englishman, Alfred Noyes. In the scheme of the music, the dancers' dance crassly, commonly, brazenly, after the manner of the cabaret. A ghostly soldiery marches out of the corridors of memory upon this revel. The Last Day—day of wrath and day of judgment—sounds. The march and the dance rise and fall. To the blowing of myriad pipes, to the echo of "Taps," faint and far, the phantom host vanishes. In words this design lays hold upon the imagination. In tones, Mr. Schelling's music falls short of such illusion. His invention is neither fertile nor impressive; his procedure is expert and also dry; the contrasts that cut on paper, pass blunkly in sound. From first measure to last, "A Victory Ball" seems an inarticulate, bitter scorn, sardonic pity. The mood so possessed him as man that it constricted him as musician. He burned to speak out, and the fierceness of the flame withered his utterance. More than once in many an art men deeply stirred have the last holding. In quite different case, but equally sterile seems Mr. Converse's in his "Song of the Sea." A conception stays him. In spite of Mr. Monteux's reported cuts in the tone-poem, it contains far too many pages of purely diatonic and unarticulated music-making, nearly all in Mr. Converse's stout-bodied, thick-voiced, full-rounded fashion. He seeks the massed and the latest-hallized, timbres, of an orchestra. His harmonies are an upholstery upon the musical framework. His measures are [illegible] through square-cut periods. He prefers to affirm rather than suggest.

Now all these are the ways of good craftsmen in tones through Mr. Converse's formative years at the turn of the century, in his earlier pieces, notably in "The Mystic Trumpeter," he used them as means to individual and imaginative expression. Of late, however, they have tended to become habitual process, to be but sonorous cloak for infertile matter. The plain shortcoming of this "Song of the Sea" is scanty musical invention and dulled emotional impulse. The music, excellently made in kind, merely sounds above and around a void. The tonal patterns and progress interest neither the ear nor the mind. The rich substance and coloring evoke neither Whitman's ocular vision of lowering sky and clouded stars, nor his spiritual vision (as stupendous has it in Shakespeare's play) of "immortal longings." With all deference to Mr. Converse, a "Song of the Sea" does sound like the music of an established composer, practising that it was time to write another piece.

Yet in the whole course of the concert compensations abounded. Realism with music sit before Rimsky's "Russian Easter" and shake their heads. He repeats his themes, they observe sadly, where he should develop them. He is all for rhythm, for harmonic color, for the play of timbres. His strings whirr or sing; his wood-wind pierces; his brass trumpets. Always there is much orchestral ado. Yet to "thoughtful people"—God bless them!—it is orchestral ado about nothing. Meanwhile visions arise with music as all golden with the Overture. They see the cathedral through mists of incense. Like the stars of heaven are the lamps before the glowing altar. move priests and bishops stately, in treasury in their vestments; while before them priest or acolyte the hymns of the folk ascend; their feet resound under the arches. Or as some will have it, we hear—are do but [illegible] skin in design and color to the many hued and angular frescos with which it was custom to adorn the great churches and the great rooms of a Russia once Holy. Yet others will have the Overture wholly pagan—music of barbaric rites and splendors, a softened "Sacre." Pagan or Christian, the splendor and the fervor only the pedants may deny.

No doubt the Unfinished Symphony did sound a little tame after this magnificence. For once Schubert's writer almost briefly; whereas ear, mind and spirit must have time to adjust themselves to his gentle loveliness, his fancy, pensive and warm-hearted singing. Besides, there was another distraction. The strings, flutes, clarinets, horns, would match Schubert in bright or liquid or shadowed tones, in grace of phrase and plasticity of motion. Orchestra and composer were indeed as one; but between the two the listener was cast lamenting sensation sway. Mr. Monteux, moreover, takes the Unfinished Symphony simply. Enough for him that Schubert sings in eager or musing rapture. Unlike more formidable conductors, he descries no other passion in the music; while, being a man of taste, he will not turn it to rhetoric.

Compensation also was sight of Mme. Onegin's opulent presence and sound of her rich-voiced song. For the nonce, too, she did not over-stress that richness or overlabor the propulsive power behind. Not once did her higher tones thin or sharpen; upon the lower descended no thickening cloud. As that was she in play of projected mood and conveyed emotion; while clear sense of style directed her through each music. She sustained the long sweep of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and deepened the erotic rapture. Using half-voice, she suffused her tones with the still and animated glow of his "Morgen." The light motion, the fluid tone, the playful spirit with which she clothed "Muttertändelei" surprised in a singer usually full blown. In the air of Mozart she summoned the stately and spacious progress, the decorative elegance of his one "court opera." Again Mozart sang, but in the perivig, laces and brocades that no doubt his Sextus and his Titus wore. In her recitals Boston has heard Mme. Onegin, the favorite singer. In the Symphony Concerts it hears also the accomplished artist.

H. T. P.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Trans April 15

KOUSSEVITZKY; BY NEW REPORT FROM PRACTISED HEARER

WAYS AND WORKS OF A MANIFOLD CONDUCTOR

D. C. Parker, Able British Writer, Recounts in Musical America the Russian's Range and Prowess—The Ancients, the Classics, the Moderns — Perception, Sensibility, Devotion and Power

To say that the best of conductors begin at the beginning may seem to many the utterance of a platitude. If it be so, the platitude is a superior one. For very few concert-goers realize how, and where, the conductor begins to exercise his authority. It is not with the opening note, as one might hastily suppose. Apart from rehearsals, of which the great public knows nothing and hears but little, there remains the magic moment when the personality of the conductor first makes its magnetic influence felt. To give an example of this is by no means difficult. The scribe has only to mention the one word, Nikisch, to bring to mind the mystery and romance it conveys. And those who, in the past, studied Nikisch's ways and methods will allow that his instinct for the right thing, as shown in a knowledge of crowd-psychology, helped him to gain his countless victories with the audiences he held spellbound. Was there not something unforgettable in that slow, measured approach to the scene of action; something that bespoke an easy confidence and a masterly assurance?

Nor is it only in the march to his stand that the conductor can impress an audience before a single note has been sounded. We know that cunning can also be exercised during the fateful moment at the end of a piece, when sound gives place to silence. It is not so generally realized that art and craft can lend the equally fateful moment at the start, when silence yields to sound ... fullness ... and enchantment. Think of those two critical ju...

You will come to see that the conductor can, and often does, impress those gathered together by making the most of them. A pause, neither too short nor too long, but enough to feed curiosity and breed the sense of mystery—this has, in the cases of great exponents, led to the early surrender of the audience and tuned the interpretation to the right spiritual key.

I thought of these and other sundry matters when lately I had the opportunity of hearing several concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who goes to Boston this fall. He proceeds to the scene of action as though he were the person in the hall least concerned about subsequent events. There is no pose, no claptrap, no fussy trick in order to attract the attention of the public. But you feel, for all the modesty in demeanor and quietness of entrance, that the man will have his hand on every essential point as it arises. He faces his orchestra to attack the first item. Here he shows that sense of the value of the pause which I have just indicated. If his determination of it is instinctive, he obeys a sound impulse. If it is calculated, he has been accurate in his estimate of the effect of the pause upon his hearers. A little longer would be too long; a little less, and our mysterious sense of impending adventures would not have time to develop.

On looking over the programmes in which I heard Koussevitzky conduct, I am struck by the catholicity displayed in them. In his short story, 'The Man Who Was," Rudyard Kipling contrasts the Russian as the most easterly of Western peoples and as the most westerly of Eastern. Koussevitzky is a Russian who, somehow, does not fall into either of Kipling's categories. He has played a considerable part in the musical life of his country. He was intimate with Skriabin. But these experiences, while no doubt giving him authority to speak on Russian pieces and permitting him to approach them in the proper spirit, have not been gained at the expense of narrowness of outlook, sympathy or conviction.

Strange as it may seem, Koussevitzky exhibits a special affection for ancient music of a type that might not be supposed to appeal to a Russian of these times. I remember remarkable performances of movements from a Concerto Grosso of Handel in D Minor and of a Concerto in D for small orchestra by Emanuel Bach. The son has been somewhat obscured by the overwhelming shadow of his father. This specimen of his skill and musicianship came to me as a piece of infinite refreshment. The Andante proved to be a touchingly imaginative page, and all I need says is that Koussevitky realized the tenderness and the beauty. Then I heard him do a Concerto of Vivaldi, scored by Siloti for orchestra and organ. It is the kind of music which audiences often think deadly dull, because so many exponents cannot make it anything else. "This old pattern stuff can look after itself," might also be uttered by some performers, so perfunctory is their treatment of it. Your big man will have nothing to do with this fatal, blasting philosophy. He will see, and enber that the word Vivaldi, or whatever it may be, does not stand for a dull parchment, but for a man whose heart beat and in whose veins blood flowed. Koussevitzky can humanize the old masters. He can keep the pattern intact while evoking from the depths of the music both warmth and animation. A further demonstration of the difficult art of waking the dust of ages into life came in a performance of a set of old dances and airs for the lute, transcribed tastefully by Respighi. Whatever else may be said of him, Koussevitzky is ... superior ...

Of Koussevitzky symphonic, I had experience in Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's Symphony in E Minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's Fifth. While these symphonies can be viewed from more than one standpoint, the hearer has a perfect right to look for consistency and that vitalizing process without which the notes remain an inanimate mass. On each occasion Koussevitzky provided thrills and got highly exciting performances —and this, be it said, without resort to meretricious expedients. The "Pathetic" was transformed into a moving drama, extraordinarily wide in emotional range and overwhelming in the march movement. Brahms's Fourth Symphony never became prosy. On the finale, which, by reason of structure, presents some problems, Koussevitzky stamped his personality. The last page or two of Beethoven's Fifth swept along gloriously. Assuredly much can be done with this diatonic music if only the right man holds the reins. As for Schubert, I thought it remarkable for the real pianissimo obtained and the subtle manner in which beautifully balanced chords were drawn from the orchestra.

All that I heard Koussevitzy do convinces me that he will have no small ... in America. He did not lead his ...

Her April 20

M. Stravinsky's Idea of Spring Shows and Shaws Seen in New Yor

TO THE EDITOR

For many years I have ended the week with the Symphony concert. I read in the Saturday Herald the criticism of Mr. Philip Hale and so, on Saturday night, I have an accurate opinion of the pieces and can marshall easily the appropriate emotions. I then go home feeling that I have done my duty to my city and to myself.

Unfortunately a week ago Saturday the perfection I have attained was rudely interfered with. As usual my Saturday ... and was told that Stravinsky's "'Rite of Spring' was the abomination of desolation." I had already heard Stravinsky once, and doubted somewhat the accuracy of this cruel and reactionary ... de. A friend went with me who had never heard Stravinsky. Rite ... was worn out with the wind's work and felt that sweet music regarding spring might rest him.

The "Rite of Spring" "was by request," and after those who had requested it had flocked out we settled back to enjoy it. The first part deals with the usual dances which always attend the coming of spring, at least in poetry and music. I do not remember encountering such procedure in New England. In other respects the first part was wonderfully realistic. The program book, which gives me all the ideas I have with regard to music, omits to state anything about the Russian spring. I should infer, however, that the spring in Russia must be quite like our New England weather. At all events, the first part dealt with every conceivable kind of weather and often with several kinds of weather at once, and in this way reminded me completely of our own New England even to the cold in the head.

At the intermission a woman who sits in front of me left in some agitation, but as I knew that she was a devotee of Brahms and frivolous music of that kind, she undoubtedly was endeavoring to escape the future. The rest of us remained in our seats and braced ourselves for the second part.

In the second part the main motive is that of a girl who dances herself to death. While this is not the usual way in which we in New England greet the spring, we can be quite sympathetic with it. The opening of the second part was disappointing. There were moments when the instruments played together, but at length came a contest between the kettle-drums egged on by the cymbals, and the irregular thump of the entire orchestra, which reminded me of a festival of the New England spring—the march past of the Ancient and Honorables in the days before we had the present sumptuary law. The noise increased as the unfortunate neared her end. My friend shouted to me and, as far as I could make out, wanted to know how long this was to last. I did not reply because I had some doubts whether my voice would carry so far and I feared that in one of the rare moments of silence my answer would cause me confusion, but I nodded encouragingly to him and I saw him rest his head upon his hand. Finally the victim danced herself to death and the Rite came to an end. On looking around I was relieved to see that the heroine of the program was the only one who apparently had perished. The rest of us arose and filed out, with the feeling that every true New Englander must have, at an "extra by request," that we had received more than our money's worth.

I think this music of the future might properly be developed in two ways. In the first place, the instrument makers are very far behind the modern spirit. It is true that, like every modern work, the rite demands a tam-tam, and there is also the "rape ... ero," vulgarly called a scratcher. But these are not adequate. What is needed are instruments that can make more noise. One conductor, I think it was Gilmore, at the time of the Peace Jubilee in Boston, arranged to have cannon go off on the Common at regular intervals. This idea, thus crudely expressed, could be enriched by having instruments of that kind at irregular intervals in Symphony hall itself. If then cymbals were substituted for the strings, which, after all, are weak and colorless in these days, and fit only to express the food of love, modern composers would have an orchestra in keeping with their ideas.

I also feel that the conductor might well be dispensed with. There were times on Saturday when Mr. Monteux, with his punches at the medicine bag, actually kept the instruments together and so marred the true effect of the music, which under such restraint could hardly express adequately the idea of a New England spring. My suggestion would be that the conductor be left out, and that each instrument, augmented by the kind I have already described, should be allowed to play fortissimo with staccato intervals of silence irregularly interspersed. Effects like these would be worth while.

In any event, my faith in Philip Hale has gone. His feeble explanation that he is really not a reactionary fails to convince me. I really do not know now what my emotions at the concerts ought to be, and I am almost reduced to forming my own opinion.

JOHANNES SMITH.

Against our helpless ears to fling
Its crash, clash, cling, clang, bing, ... bing?
And then to call it "Rite of Spring"—
The season when on joyous wing
The birds melodious carols sing
And harmony's in everything!
He who could write the "Rite ... Spring,"
If I be right, by right should swing!

To the Editor of the Sunday Herald:

Apropos of "The Rite of Spring," ... have heard just such sounds in ... country, but I should set the sea... later in the year, say about cou... fair time in September.

VERMONTER.

Trans April 19

NOVEL NUMBERS, STANDARD ITEMS, ADMIRED SINGER

VARIED FARE AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Audience and Pieces—Mr. Schelling Passionately Inarticulate in "A Victory Ball" —Mr. Converse Fails to Fill the Sonorous Void of a "Song of the Sea"—Rimsky's Tonal Pageant — Schubert's Streaming Song—Mme. Onegin in Measured Richness

A MISCELLANY of eight pieces filled a Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon that none the less was shorter than usual. Mr. Stock with his Chicago orchestra and public, set the fashion for such an assemblage of snippets. Now and again Mr. Stokowski copies it for his Philadelphians. Occasionally, by way of variety, it also pleases Mr. Monteux. How his Bostonians take it is not easy to say with any certainty. He began on Friday with Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter," and hearty and general was the clapping. He proceeded with that fount of melody, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the applause was as brief, thin and tepid as though Mr. Bliss or Monsieur Honegger had signed the music. In the whole course of twenty-two pairs of concerts, from last October onwards, it is hard to remember a number more coldly received. Orchestrally, Mr. Monteux passed next to Mr. Converse's new tone-poem, "Song of the Sea." It was hardly an impressive music. Yet long and loud were the plaudits, not to be stayed until the composer bowed pleasure and gratitude. Finally, Mr. Schelling led the band through his fantasia, "A Victory Ball"—much more enkindling and engrossing piece. More perturbed, however, than warmed seemed the audience. Between whiles, Mme. Onégin sang an air from Mozart's opera in the grand manner, "Titus," and added to it three orchestrated songs of Strauss—the familiar "Morgen" and "Cäcille," the less known "Muttertändelei." As she deserved on many a score, she was loudly clapped.

Inference from these shows of hands is curiously contradictory. Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is readily understandable and insistently emphatic—so obvious indeed that Mr. Sousa has already set it in the workaday repertory of his band. "A Victory Ball," moreover, ends in a fashion to arrest listening ears and quicken comprehending sensibilities. In contrast, Mr. Converse's tone-poem is neither lucid musical sound nor impressive tonal imagery. Yet the Bostonian composer was heaped with applause; while the visitor from New York was less generously rewarded. With honor, in their own city and in their own society are our prophets of music, especially if they be in presence at the concert containing their handiwork. Again, there was no mistaking the pleasure of the audience in the swelling pomps, rhetorical fervors and florid decoration of Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture; but Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony—of the instrumental song that abides in beauty, of the moods envied alike by poets of words and poets of tones—it passed coldly by. So doing, it was beyond understanding. Give it Stravinsky and it cries for something "melodious." Give it Strauss, and it murmurs for something suave. Set before it the ideal beauty of Schubert the songful, Schubert the gentle; and it scarcely taps its palms. There is nothing so inscrutable as "what the public wants" from the practice of the arts. Therefore, we bystanders must always be peering at it.

Neither of the new pieces contributed much to the pleasure of the day. As a romantic idealist, Mr. Schelling watched the German war, finally entered it himself. Like many another American, he saw in it no renewed struggle vi et armis for political and commercial destinies and supremacies. Sincerely and quite simply he regarded it as a contest on his side for the freedoms, the integrities, the aspirations and the peace of mankind. He believed that it would exalt his fellow-soldiers as he was himself exalted. He counted the dead a noble sacrifice in a cause for which he also would have lain down his life. Inevitably he was chagrined, disillusioned, embittered, as he looked upon the outcome of this "Great War," upon the course of human nature, upon the face of the world. His mood of devotion had run deep. His subsequent mood of revolt penetrated as deeply. So possessed, so craving relief and release, he seems to have written "A Victory Ball" on a hint from garish and rough-textured rhymes by the Englishman, Alfred Noyes.

In the scheme of the music, the dancers dance crassly, commonly, brazenly, after the manner of the cabaret. A ghostly soldiery marches out of the corridors of memory upon this rout. The Dies Irae—day of wrath and day of judgment—sounds. The march and the dance rise and fall. To the blowing of myriad pipes, to the echo of "Taps," faint and far, the phantom host vanishes. In words this design lays hold upon the imagination. In tones, Mr. Schelling's music falls short of such illusion. His invention is neither fertile nor impressive; his procedure is expert and also dry; the contrasts that cut on paper, pass bluntly in sound. From first measure to last, "A Victory Ball" seems an inarticulate, unachieved piece. And the reason is not far to seek. Mr. Schelling was fain to fill his Fantasia with passionate resentment, bitter scorn, sardonic pity. The mood so possessed him as man that it constricted him as musician. He burned to speak out, and the fierceness of the flame withered his utterance. More than once in many an art men deeply stirred have been so holden.

In quite different case, but equally sterile seems Mr. Converse in his "Song of the Sea." No constriction stays him. In spite of Mr. Monteux's reported cuts in the tone-poem, it contains far too many pages of merely fluent and practised music-making nearly all in Mr. Converse's stout-bodied, thick-voiced, full-rounded fashion. He seeks the massed, not the individualized, timbres, of an orchestra. His harmonies are an upholstery upon the musical framework. His measures move in broad lines through square-cut periods. He prefers to affirm rather than suggest.

Now all these are the ways of good craftsmen in tones through Mr. Converse's formative years at the turn of the century. In his earlier pieces, notably in "The Mystic Trumpeter," he used them as means to individual and imaginative expression. Of late, however, they have tended to become habitual process, to be but sonorous cloak for infertile matter. The plain shortcoming of this "Song of the Sea" is scanty musical invention and dulled emotional impulse. The music, excellently made in kind, merely sounds above and around a void. The tonal patterns and progress interest neither the ear nor the mind. The tonal substance and coloring evoke neither Whitman's ocular vision of lowering sky and clouded stars, nor his spiritual vision (as Cleopatra has it in Shakspeare's play) of "immortal longings." With all deference to Mr. Converse, a "Song of the Sea" does sound like the music of an established composer, perceiving that it was time to write another piece.

Yet in the whole course of the concert compensations abounded. Realists with music sit before Rimsky's "Russian Easter" and shake their heads. He repeats his themes, they observe sadly, where he should develop them. He is all for rhythm, for harmonic color, for the play of timbres. His strings whirr or sing; his wood-wind pierces; his brass trumpets. Always there is much orchestral ado. Yet to "thoughtful people"—God bless them!—it is orchestral ado about nothing. Meanwhile visionaries with music are all aglow with the Overture. They see the cathedral through mists of incense. Like the stars of heaven are the tapers. Below the glowing altar move priests and bishops stately, a treasury in their vestments; while before them great lords kneel. The hymns of the folk ascend; their feet resound under the arches. Or as some will have it, we hearers do but listen to a music akin in design and color to the many hued and angular frescos with which it was custom to adorn the great churches and the great rooms of a Russia once Holy. Yet others will have the Overture wholly pagan—music of barbaric rites and splendors, a softened "Sacre." Pagan or Christian, the splendor and the fervor only the pedants may deny.

No doubt the Unfinished Symphony did sound a little tame after this magnificence. For once Schubert writes almost briefly; whereas ear, mind and spirit must have time to adjust themselves to his gentle loveliness, serene fancy, pensive and warm-hearted singing. Besides, there was another distraction. The strings, flutes, clarinets, horns, would match Schubert in bright or liquid or shadowed tones, in grace of phrase and plasticity of motion. Orchestra and composer were indeed as one: but between the two the listener was ever letting sensation sway. Mr. Monteux, moreover, takes the Unfinished Symphony simply. Enough for him that Schubert sings in eager or musing rapture. Unlike more formidable conductors, he descries no other passion in the music; while, being a man of taste, he will not turn it to rhetoric.

Compensation also was sight of Mme. Onegin's opulent presence and sound of her rich-voiced song. For the nonce, too, she did not over-stress that richness or overlabor the propulsive power behind. Not once did her higher tones thin or sharpen; upon the lower descended no thickening cloud. As just was she in play of projected mood and conveyed emotion; while clear sense of style directed her through each music. She sustained the long sweep of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and deepened the erotic rapture. Using half-voice, she suffused her tones with the still and sustained glow of his "Morgen." The light motion, the fluid tone, the playful spirit with which she clothed "Muttertändelei" surprised in a singer usually full blown. In the air of Mozart she summoned the stately and spacious progress, the decorative elegance of his one "court opera." Again Mozart sang, but in the periwig, laces and brocades that no doubt his Sextus and his Titus wore. In her recitals Boston has heard Mme. Onegin, the favorite singer. In the Symphony Concerts it hears also the accomplished artist.

H. T. P.

ered together by making the most of them. A pause, neither too short nor too long, but enough to feed curiosity and breed the sense of mystery—this has, in the cases of great exponents, led to the early surrender of the audience and tuned the interpretation to the right spiritual key.

I thought of these and other sundry matters when lately I had the opportunity of hearing several concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, who goes to Boston this fall. He proceeds to the scene of action as though he were the person in the hall least concerned about subsequent events. There is no pose, no claptrap, no fussy trick in order to attract the attention of the public. But you feel, for all the modesty in demeanor and quietness of entrance, that the man will have his hand on every essential point as it arises. He faces his orchestra to attack the first item. Here he shows that sense of the value of the pause which I have just indicated. If his determination of it is instinctive, he obeys a sound impulse. If it is calculated, he has been accurate in his estimate of the effect of the pause upon his hearers. A little longer would be too long; a little less, and our mysterious sense of impending adventures would not have time to develop.

On looking over the programmes in which I heard Koussevitzky conduct, I am struck by the catholicity displayed in them. In his short story, "The Man Who Was," Rudyard Kipling contrasts the Russian as the most easterly of Western peoples and as the most westerly of Eastern. Koussevitzky is a Russian who, somehow, does not fall into either of Kipling's categories. He has played a considerable part in the musical life of his country. He was intimate with Skriabin. But these experiences, while no doubt giving him authority to speak on Russian pieces and permitting him to approach them in the proper spirit, have not been gained at the expense of narrowness of outlook, sympathy or conviction.

Strange as it may seem, Koussevitzky exhibits a special affection for ancient music of a type that might not be supposed to appeal to a Russian of these times. I remember remarkable performances of movements from a Concerto Grosso of Handel in D Minor and of a Concerto in D for small orchestra by Emanuel Bach. The son has been somewhat obscured by the overwhelming shadow of his father. This specimen of his skill and musicianship came to me as a piece of infinite refreshment. The Andante proved to be a touchingly imaginative page, and all I need says is that Koussevitky realized the tenderness and the beauty. Then I heard him do a Concerto of Vivaldi, scored by Siloti for orchestra and organ. It is the kind of music which audiences often think deadly dull, because so many exponents cannot make it anything else. "This old pattern stuff can look after itself," might also be uttered by some performers, so perfunctory is their treatment of it. Your big man will have nothing to do with this fatal, blasting philosophy. He will see, and enforce, the human aspect. He will remember that the word Vivaldi, or whatever it may be, does not stand for a dull parchment, but for a man whose heart beat and in whose veins blood flowed. Koussevitzky can humanize the old masters. He can keep the pattern intact while evoking from the depths of the music both warmth and animation. A further demonstration of the difficult art of waking the dust of ages into life came in a performance of a set of old dances and airs for the lute, transcribed tastefully by Respighi. Whatever else may be said of him, Koussevitzky is [illegible] superior [illegible]

Of Koussevitzky symphonic, I had experience in Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony"; Brahms's Symphony in E Minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's Fifth. While these symphonies can be viewed from more than one standpoint, the hearer has a perfect right to look for consistency and that vitalizing process without which the notes remain an inanimate mass. On each occasion Koussevitzky provided thrills and got highly exciting performances—and this, be it said, without resort to meretricious expedients. The "Pathetic" was transformed into a moving drama, extraordinarily wide in emotional range and overwhelming in the march movement. Brahms's Fourth Symphony never became prosy. On the finale, which, by reason of structure, presents some problems, Koussevitzky stamped his personality. The last page or two of Beethoven's Fifth swept along gloriously. Assuredly much can be done with this diatonic music if only the right man holds the reins. As for Schubert, I thought it remarkable for the real pianissimo obtained and the subtle manner in which beautifully balanced chords were drawn from the orchestra.

All that I heard Koussevitzy do convinces me that he will have no small vogue in America. He did not lead his forces through a single piece that had not benefited from the care he bestowed upon it—a care so solicitous for the welfare of the music that it extended to the smallest detail. More than most conductors, he made me confident that he felt the music. His was no humdrum routine job, no apathetic or desultory jog-trot to the double-bar. Each time he gave the signal for attack, it seemed as though the artist in him had begun anew the endless battle for what is great and noble in his world. But if it is within Koussevitzky's power thus to reach and dwell upon the heights, the altitude is attained at the price of no blighting uniformity. His Mozart, as exemplified in "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," is authentic Mozart—and how seldom one encounters it! His "Venusberg Music" from "Tannhauser" has all the surge, lure and color which Wagner imparts. He catches the poetry which lies at the core of Bax's "Garden of Fand." And I should place conspicuous among his merits the ability to do full justice to the programme of such a piece as "Till Eulenspiegel" and the emotional scheme of such a piece as "The Poem of Ecstasy" without allowing the music to suffer thereby.

Personality counts, but it is a power which, like other powers, can be used both profitably and unprofitably. Koussevitzky has it in generous measure. His heart and soul are at the end of his baton. I left his concerts, sure that he knew the difficulties standing in the way of subtle and superior interpretation; that he was the last man in the world to take the quick and easy path which leads only to a passing notoriety with the unreflective. He realizes that without dust there can be no palm; that without devotion and concentration the triumph dare not be expected. He might well say, varying the words of a French king, "L'orchestre, c'est moi," for he makes the most of the material in his hands and welds his orchestra into one sensitive and responsive instrument. In gesture and movement he is neither reticent nor flamboyant. All he does has its significance. I see him still drawing out of the orchestra those magic strains of Wagner in that peculiar way of his, as though he coaxed them from another sphere. Without a shadow of doubt, Koussevitzky is a born conductor, who will take his place among the notable personalities to whom the American public owes so much

[Reprinted from Musical America for April 12, 1924]

In the second part the main motive is that of a girl who dances herself to death. While this is not the usual way in which we in New England greet the spring, we can be quite sympathetic with it. The opening of the second part was disappointing. There were moments when the instruments played together, but at length came a contest between the kettledrums, egged on by the cymbals, and the irregular thump of the entire orchestra, which reminded me of a festival of the New England spring—the march past of the Ancient and Honorables in the days before we had the present sumptuary law. The noise increased as the unfortunate neared her end. My friend shouted to me and, as far as I could make out, wanted to know how long this was to last. I did not reply because I had some doubts whether my voice would carry so far and I feared that in one of the rare moments of silence my answer would cause me confusion, but I nodded encouragingly to him and I saw him rest his head upon his hand. Finally the victim danced herself to death and the Rite came to an end. On looking around I was relieved to see that the heroine of the program was the only one who apparently had perished. The rest of us arose and filed out, with the feeling that every true New Englander must have, at an "extra by request," that we had received more than our money's worth.

I think this music of the future might properly be developed in two ways. In the first place, the instrument makers are very far behind the modern spirit. It is true that, like every modern work, the rite demands a tam-tam, and there is also the "rape effect," vulgarly called a scratcher. But these are not adequate. What is needed are instruments that can make more noise. One conductor, I think it was Gilmore, at the time of the Peace Jubilee in Boston, arranged to have cannon go off on the Common at regular intervals. This idea, thus crudely expressed, could be enriched by having instruments of that kind at irregular intervals in Symphony hall itself. If then cymbals were substituted for the strings, which, after all, are weak and colorless in these days, and fit only to express the food of love, modern composers would have an orchestra in keeping with their ideas.

I also feel that the conductor might well be dispensed with. There were times on Saturday when Mr. Monteux, with his punches at the medicine bag, actually kept the instruments together and so marred the true effect of the music, which under such restraint could hardly express adequately the idea of a New England spring. My suggestion would be that the conductor be left out, and that each instrument, augmented by the kind I have already described, should be allowed to play fortissimo with staccato intervals of silence irregularly interspersed. Effects like these would be worth while.

In any event, my faith in Philip Hale has gone. His feeble explanation that he is really not a reactionary fails to convince me. I really do not know now what my emotions at the concerts ought to be, and I am almost reduced to forming my own opinion.

JOHANNES SMITH.

---

grand manner, "Titus," and added to it three orchestrated songs of Strauss—the familiar "Morgen" and "Cäcilie," the less known "Muttertändelei." As she deserved on many a score, she was loudly clapped.

Inference from these shows of hands is curiously contradictory. Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is readily understandable and insistently emphatic—so obvious indeed that Mr. Sousa has already set it in the workaday repertory of his band. "A Victory Ball," moreover, ends in a fashion to arrest listening ears and quicken comprehending sensibilities. In contrast, Mr. Converse's tone-poem is neither lucid musical sound nor impressive tonal imagery. Yet the Bostonian composer was heaped with applause; while the visitor from New York was less generously rewarded. With honor, in their own city and in their own society are our prophets of music, especially if they be in presence at the concert containing their handiwork. Again, there was no mistaking the pleasure of the audience in the swelling pomps, rhetorical fervors and florid decoration of Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture; but Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony—of the instrumental song that abides in beauty, of the moods envied alike by poets of words and poets of tones—it passed coldly by. So doing, it was beyond understanding. Give it Stravinsky and it cries for something "melodi-

[illegible] deeply stirred have been so holden.

In quite different case, but equally sterile seems Mr. Converse in his "Song of the Sea." No constriction stays him. In spite of Mr. Monteux's reported outs in the tone-poem, it contains far too many pages of merely fluent and practised music-making nearly all in Mr. Converse's stout-bodied, thick-voiced, full-rounded fashion. He seeks the massed, not the individualized, timbres, of an orchestra. His harmonies are an upholstery upon the musical framework. His measures move in broad lines through square-cut periods. He prefers to affirm rather than suggest.

Now all these are the ways of good craftsmen in tones through Mr. Converse's formative years at the turn of the century. In his earlier pieces, notably in "The Mystic Trumpeter," he used them as means to individual and imaginative expression. Of late, however, they have tended to become habitual process, to be but sonorous cloak for infertile matter. The plain shortcoming of this "Song of the Sea" is scanty musical invention and dulled emotional impulse. The music, excellently made in kind, merely sounds above and around a void. The tonal patterns and progress interest neither the ear nor the mind. The tonal substance and coloring evoke neither Whitman's ocular vision of lowering sky and clouded stars, nor his spiritual vision (as Cleopatra has it in Shakspeare's play) of "immortal longings." With all deference to Mr. Converse, a "Song of the Sea" does sound like the music of an established composer, perceiving that it was time to write another piece.

Yet in the whole course of the concert compensations abounded. Realists, with music sit before Rimsky's "Russian Easter" and shake their heads. He repeats his themes, they observe sadly, where he should develop them. He is all for rhythm, for harmonic color, for the play of timbres. His strings whirr or sing; his wood-wind pierces; his brass trumpets. Always there is much orchestral ado. Yet to "thoughtful people"—God bless them!—it is orchestral ado about nothing. Meanwhile visionaries with music are all aglow with the Overture. They see the cathedral through mists of incense. Like the stars of heaven are the tapers. Below the glowing altar move priests and bishops stately, a treasury in their vestments; while before them great lords kneel. The hymns of the folk ascend; their feet resound under the arches. Or as some will have it, we hearers do but listen to a music akin in design and color to the many hued and angular frescos with which it was custom to adorn the great churches and the great rooms of a Russia once Holy. Yet others will have the Overture wholly pagan—music of barbaric rites and splendors, a softened "Sacre." Pagan or Christian, the splendor and the fervor only the pedants may deny.

No doubt the Unfinished Symphony did sound a little tame after this magnificence. For once Schubert writes almost briefly; whereas ear, mind and spirit must have time to adjust themselves to his gentle loveliness, serene fancy, pensive and warm-hearted singing. Besides, there was another distraction. The strings, flutes, clarinets, horns, would match Schubert in bright or liquid or shadowed tones, in grace of phrase and plasticity of motion. Orchestra and composer were indeed as one: but between the two the listener was ever letting sensation sway. Mr. Monteux, moreover, takes the Unfinished Symphony simply. Enough for him that Schubert sings in eager or musing rapture. Unlike more formidable conductors, he descries no other passion in the music; while, being a man of taste, he will not turn it to rhetoric.

Compensation also was sight of Mme. Onegin's opulent presence and sound of her rich-voiced song. For the nonce, too, she did not over-stress that richness or overlabor the propulsive power behind. Not once did her higher tones thin or sharpen; upon the lower descended no thickening cloud. As just was she in play of projected mood and conveyed emotion; while clear sense of style directed her through each music. She sustained the long sweep of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and deepened the erotic rapture. Using half-voice, she suffused her tones with the still and sustained glow of his "Morgen." The light motion, the fluid tone, the playful spirit with which she clothed "Muttertändelei" surprised in a singer usually full blown. In the air of Mozart she summoned the stately and spacious progress, the decorative elegance of his one "court opera." Again Mozart sang, but in the periwig, laces and brocades that no doubt his Sextus and his Titus wore. In her recitals Boston has heard Mme. Onegin, the favorite singer. In the Symphony Concerts it hears also the accomplished artist.

H. T. P.

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

TRANS April 1924

TWENTY YEARS OF RICHARD STRAUSS AND A TONE-POEM

MR. MONTEUX AGAIN SUBMITS THE "DOMESTICA"

The Composer as the Turn of the Century Imagined Him—The Composer as a New Generation Judges Him—A Just Reaction and a Reaction Overdone—Mr. Rosenfeld as Devil's Advocate

LIKE most conductors—Parisian mediocrities only excepted—Mr. Monteux takes pleasure in the music of Richard Strauss. Like most publics, the audiences of the Symphony Concerts hear it gladly. Accordingly at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will be played anew. In Boston, it had lain neglected through nearly twelve years until Mr. Monteux revived it last December. Here and elsewhere music and performance were notably well received. Therefore, by general and particular request, "The Domestica" will now be repeated. When Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra first outspread it upon Bostonian ears in 1907, it was a debated and to some a repugnant piece. "Conservatives" spoke of it with the same vehement and ludicrous resentment that of late they or their heirs and assigns have lavished upon Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"; while suburban spinsters despatched no less eager "letters to the editor" containing their mild jokes at the expense of music and programme. Now, in these nineteen-twenties, all save a few "diehards" sit in peace and pleasure before this "awful 'Sinfonia Domestica.'"

Nay, for more entertainment to the bystander, some that once extolled the tone-poem have drifted into mistrust and misliking. The hair-shirt of prudence pleasantly titillates them, and they like to say that "of course" they over-estimated Strauss and all his works. Now they would "put him in his place"—until the fashion changes. Or else, holding heads high, they prance about richly canarisoned in the "post-war" view of Strauss's music. Usually this new judgment makes way to print in the excesses of such reaction. More circumspectly and with more reason Mr. Paul Rosenfeld has set it down in a chapter of his "Musical Chronicle" as published by Messrs. Harcourt, Brace and Company. A few fragments from the chapter bear quotation.

Time has altered Strauss's music, writes Mr. Rosenfeld. In 1904, he was, in Huneker's phrase, an "anarch of art." He was a sort of musical antichrist writing forbidden and occult and world-dumbling things for strings and wind, posing the white-beard of divinity with his harmonies; initiating his audiences into satanic and wicked philosophies through tone; stirring hell-kitchen cauldrons in his fast-playing band. The very thought of the programmes of his symphonic poems made one dizzy. He proposed to set one in the boots of an archrogue; to make one experience death; dance with Nietzsche the monster-philosopher; collide as superman with the cosmic riddle; step over the prostrate crowds in the stride of the hero; lift the curtain of the alcove where married people sleep. It was like nothing so much as flying off the battlements of the tower of Babel to pursue vain war with Heaven. One knew what Huneker meant when he wrote that Strauss composed "with the pen of beyond good and evil." One saw with delicious shudders the unforgivable sin in heave over the horizon. And in performance, the music was infinitely bewildering, infinitely exciting. It went so fast, faster even than Wagner. Violins spiralled into the deeps of the firmament. The sound stepped out and stunned you.

You could never rest quite sure as to what was supposed to be happening; whether Till was upsetting the apple-carts of the market-women or making a long nose at the professors or hearing the judge pronounce sentence against him; whether Don Juan was making love to the Countess or to Anna or to Zerlinchen; whether the orchestra was painting the infancy, adolescence, or old age of the dying man. Was that religion, or was it science that was being discarded by humanity in its attempt to reconcile inhuman nature with man's metaphysical mind? Was the hero writing now "Tod und Verklärung" or "Traum durch die Dämmerung"; was the uncle saying "Just like mamma"; was the clock striking seven in the evening or seven in the morning? Were Herr and Frau Doktor Strauss combably embracing, or were they throwing the breakfast-dishes at each other's head, or pressaging their counselor's grandiose future? Positive one could never be. And when one did succeed in following the programme, sonorous and brilliant passages set everything in one glittering and chiming. The plangent trumpets in the finale of "Don Quixote" were the voice of lashing, howling, mocking disillusion. That was the iron tread of the hero as he strode over Europe with the swing of Rodin's walking man. That was the sun on the banging tympani of "Zarathustra." The singing horns and violins of Don Juan's feast painted the scene one intended some day to live. . . .

Strauss still remains a great musician but in a restricted sense of the word. The tone-poems of this child of Munich are marvelous things—for the ear only. Little has been written for orchestra that can match these rich-sounding works in pure sonority. They are fantasias of orchestral language of a brilliance that still overwhelms. It is doubtful whether any composer has better understood the instruments of the band; has had a more voluptuous feeling for the voices of brass and strings, the windy beauty of the horns, the velvet of reeds; revelled more luxuriously in those bright, high-pitched sounds. It is doubtful whether anyone has had a subtler sense of the purely orchestral possibilities, of the general range of the instruments, of the beautiful tapestry-like interplay of these sonorities. He has written passage upon passage of marvelous networks of timbres and colors, rich, savorous and dense. The great, many-stranded middle section of the Sinfonia; the shimmering, high-fluted introduction to what Mr. Deems Taylor has so cutely called the Uebermenschenwalzer; the poisonously entrancing reeds in the dance of the seven Veils which twitch us over and over again with their sheer iridescent loveliness. It is a marvelous sensuality this man possesses; a virtuosic gift for orchestration like that of D'Annunzio for prose.

Continued on Following Page

In this many-hued stream of sound, you bathe as you might bathe in a river of perfumed vapor. You issue from it neither touched nor warmed nor refreshed. The music of Strauss has very little to give the mind. You cannot listen to this music and be moved. Life is somehow not strongly in it. It stirs nothing deep in you. It nourishes no high tremulous sense of beauty. There is a sort of lusty abundance to some of it, in "Don Juan" particularly; but this, too, wears a curiously fictitious look. For, though Strauss has a marvelous sensuous gift, his gift remains a superficial thing. In spite of his wizard-like almost over the means of expression he has very few striking ideas. His material wants distinction, wants quality. There is something always a little common, a little wanting in edge and incisiveness, in his melodic line. It is Strauss to some degree; but it is also a little everybody's music. . . . To be sure, Strauss manages to clothe these plebeian generalities in most magnificent dress; to press out of them, thanks to his amazing contrapuntal technique, the last drop of emotional possibility which they contain. But one is always conscious that the musical style is loaded with foods and flagons of doubtful quality.

Moreover, the greater number of Strauss's tone-poems want form. With the exception of "Tod und Verklärung" and perhaps "Till Eulenspiegel," they seem fragmentary; he wanders through the greater number of his songs, too. No matter inner structure carries them taut from commencement to finish. Rather here, they seem a series of short breaths arbitrarily riveted together. The bow was not taut when this man set out to compose "Zarathustra" or "Don Quixote" or "Ein Heldenleben." The music begins with a triumphant impulse. But before many minutes have elapsed, one gets the sense that Strauss did not have any strong feeling of the direction in which he was going when he set out so bravely; and that the organization of the form is the result only of a secondary conception. Handsome passages do ensue—the vigil in "Don Quixote," the love-scene and the brave return of original theme in "Ein Heldenleben"; marvelously densely woven middle-section in the "Sinfonia Domestica." But as these are over, the musical Sahara returns. And at the conclusion, we have a baffled sense of having heard a number of not clearly connected fragments; the great inner satisfaction that comes with having been moved through thick to thin in an unbroken course. . . .

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Bacchanale and Rout

ERNEST SCHELLING'S fantasy for orchestra, "A Victory Ball," to be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall is the latest completed work of the composer. The composition of the music was begun in the spring of 1922 in New York, and completed in Switzerland in the following summer. The score is still in manuscript. Mr. Lawrence Gilman, writing in the programme-book of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society, quotes Mr. Schelling's own story of the genesis of the tone-poem:

". . . I had come back from Europe still very much under the impression of the cataclysm, much troubled for the future, and was amazed to find that so few seemed to remember what the war really had meant, with its sacrifice of its youth. I had wondered, when watching the seething mass of humanity at some carbaret, what our boys would think of it all, and I had a sinister vision similar to the one that made me write my '1914' Impression [in the Variations for piano and orchestra, 'Impressions from an Artist's Life']. I came across Alfred Noyes's poem, 'A Victory Ball,' while in this mood, and was impelled to use it as the basis of an orchestral fantasy.

"I have used two Army bugle-calls: the 'Call to Arms' and 'Salute to the Colors,' which ominously usher in the War Vision, and at the very end of the piece I have used 'Taps.' The work is a perfectly free fantasy, with, however, a certain amount of thematic development.

"I had occasion during the war to hear the Scotch Pipers, and to observe the extraordinary effect their music had on the troops; and at the end of the work I have tried to make the whole orchestra a huge bag-pipe, perhaps the most pagan and primitive form of music. The piece is scored for full symphonic orchestra and bears this inscription: 'To the memory of an American soldier.'"

Here are the verses of the poem by Alfred Noyes (from "The Elfin Artist and other Poems"; Stokes, 1920) which suggested Mr. Schelling's music:

The cymbals crash, and the dancers walk.
With long silk stockings and arms of chalk.
Butterfly skirts, and white breasts bare.
And shadows of dead men watching from there.

Shadows of dead men stand by the wall,
Watching the fun of the Victory Ball.
They do not reproach, because they know,
If they're forgotten, it's better so.

Under the dancing feet are the graves,
Drenched and motley, long bright waves,
Flecked by the palm-fronds, grapple and whirl
Ox-eyed matron and slim white girl.

See, there is one cold fresh from school.
Leaning the ropes as the old hands rule.
God, for a dead boy's eager and grins
As the tom-toms bang and the shimmy begins.

"What did you think we should find?" said a shade.
"When the last shot echoed and peace was made?"
"Christ," laughed the fleshless jaws of his friend.

Continued on Following Page

"I thought they'd be praying for worlds to mend."

. . . .

"Pish," said a statesman standing near.
"I'm glad they can busy their thoughts elsewhere!
We mustn't reproach 'em. They're young, you see."

"Ah," said the dead men, "so were we!"

Victory! Victory! On with the dance!
Back to the Jungle the new beasts prance!
God, how the blood runs grim by the wall,
Watching the fun of the Victory Ball.

Mr. Schelling [observes Mr. Gilman] has conceived his tone-poem as a pandemonium traversed by a vision—an apparition of troops "marching on irresistibly, inexorably. Nothing stops them; no obstacle is too terrible for them. They go between the fallen Pelion upon Ossa, to imitate Homer, were mere futility. Yet the poet remains that as the last of Strauss' symphonic poems, the negligible "Alpine Symphony" excepted, the tone-poem as a form may well be regarded as the apogee of 19th century music romanticism. . . .

Here is [illegible] more old Berlioz [illegible]-Saint-Saens [illegible] counsel less of [illegible] not to meddle. Strauss of the [illegible] orts [illegible] poem [illegible] in "Elegy Heldenleben." Strauss precious [illegible] written on so vast a scale, and [illegible] tremendous piece of autobiography has neither the "Domestica's" firmness of texture nor its richness of invention.

Lofty and Ideal

Nor has Strauss elsewhere written anything so lofty, so idealistic a vein, the objections of his detractors and the regrettable incident of the [illegible] to the contrary notwithstanding. A nowhere, it is possible to feel, has been to the same degree the piece the master-craftsman of sheer music, the wielder of stupendous polyphonic, the prodigious orchestrator and the inspired tone-poet of that which is loftiest, deepest and most persuasive in human nature.

In the "Domestica" comes pages that for idyllic loveliness have scarcely been equal in the whole of music, and pages filled to bursting with the exuberance that is the joy of living. And here must be found an expression of passion wholly removed from sensuality, and of that tenderness which only the strongest may utter.

Monteux Unfolds Its Beauties

When first he conducted the "Domestica" here, although the performance was in many ways an admirable one Mr. Monteux was, in a sense, meeting his own acquaintances with the music. The performance of yesterday, on the other hand, had naught of tentativeness; it was one of supreme assurance and excellence. As noted Mr. Monteux's penetration of the composer's plan and purpose, for the relation of all that Strauss would say, as for the incessant euphony and the amazing technical brilliancy of the orchestra's playing.

Far removed from the excitement and, if you will, the successes of Strauss was Mozart's little Symphony, composed in his 18th year, and as fresh today as on the November of 1773 when he set the date upon his manuscript. Written concisely for an orchestra that numbers only strings and a pair each of oboes, horns and bassoons, the Symphony is in Mozart's most engaging but not his most accomplished manner. Its melodies arrest the ear, its orchestration, all things considered, reveals surprising variety of color and effect, while a pure zest for writing, an infectious gaiety, pervades the whole.

A Charming Piece

A charming piece that makes a welcome addition to the orchestra's repertory, and Mr. Monteux's finishing performance may well serve as future standard.

Presumably no one ever thought ill of this innocent Symphony; but no more than 48 years ago Tchaikovsky's Concerto, which today sounds almost Mendelssohnian, was condemned by the apidulous Hanslick in terms that shame any of the reproaches now heaped upon Stravinsky. Hardly of equal merit throughout its three movements, the Concerto has today lost not only its power to provoke antagonism but, at least in certain passages, its power to interest as well. There remain, however, many compensations in the music itself, and yesterday there were more in Mr. Zimbalist's over-tonally beautiful, technically remarkable, and on the whole deeply expressive performance of it.

SYMPHONY 151 YEARS OLD HEARD

Strauss' "Domestica" Dominates Concert, However

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three pieces suffice to make the programme of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a youthful symphony indeed, hitherto unheard here: Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as the soloist; and finally the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

INTEREST IN STRAUSS

When Mr. Monteux revived the "Domestica" last December it had gone unplayed at the Symphony Concerts for more than a decade, and he is to be thanked for repeating it ere the season was gone. A score of years have passed since the first performance of the "Domestica," in Carnegie Hall, in New York, with Strauss conducting—a gift to its place in music is not yet fixed.

No longer may the "Domestica" be denied [illegible] or scandalous, nor be looked on as the first and last word in discordant [illegible] monstrous programme or his possible breach [illegible] of good taste. But so, too, is no contemporary musical work. [illegible] Strauss' work [illegible] feeling, his obvious programme, his inflated orchestra, his motives that now and then skirt the commonplace, his adherence to outmoded methods of thematic development, that many now casually dismiss as the piece, while indice of its composer's creations, as "old hat."

Strauss at His Zenith

But whether or not such procedures are valid for the composer of today, surely they were brilliantly logical means of expression at the time when Strauss employed them. Indeed, the best argument against their present-day continuance is the fact that he carried them to their utmost reasonable limit. To go beyond them were to pile Pelion upon Ossa, to imitate him were mere futility. Yet the fact remains that as the last of Strauss' symphonic poems, the negligible "Alpine Symphony" excepted, the tone-poem as a form may well be regarded as the apogee of 19th century music romanticism. . . .

Here is [illegible] more old Berlioz [illegible]-Saint-Saens [illegible] counsel less of [illegible] not to meddle. Strauss of the [illegible] orts [illegible] poem [illegible] in "Elegy Heldenleben." Strauss precious [illegible] written on so vast a scale, and [illegible] tremendous piece of autobiography has neither the "Domestica's" firmness of texture nor its richness of invention.

Lofty and Ideal

Nor has Strauss elsewhere written anything so lofty, so idealistic a vein, the objections of his detractors and the regrettable incident of the [illegible] to the contrary notwithstanding. A nowhere, it is possible to feel, has been to the same degree the piece the master-craftsman of sheer music, the wielder of stupendous polyphonic, the prodigious orchestrator and the inspired tone-poet of that which is loftiest, deepest and most persuasive in human nature.

In the "Domestica" comes pages that for idyllic loveliness have scarcely been equal in the whole of music, and pages filled to bursting with the exuberance that is the joy of living. And here must be found an expression of passion wholly removed from sensuality, and of that tenderness which only the strongest may utter.

Monteux Unfolds Its Beauties

When first he conducted the "Domestica" here, although the performance was in many ways an admirable one Mr. Monteux was, in a sense, meeting his own acquaintances with the music. The performance of yesterday, on the other hand, had naught of tentativeness; it was one of supreme assurance and excellence. As noted Mr. Monteux's penetration of the composer's plan and purpose, for the relation of all that Strauss would say, as for the incessant euphony and the amazing technical brilliancy of the orchestra's playing.

Far removed from the excitement and, if you will, the successes of Strauss was Mozart's little Symphony, composed in his 18th year, and as fresh today as on the November of 1773 when he set the date upon his manuscript. Written concisely for an orchestra that numbers only strings and a pair each of oboes, horns and bassoons, the Symphony is in Mozart's most engaging but not his most accomplished manner. Its melodies arrest the ear, its orchestration, all things considered, reveals surprising variety of color and effect, while a pure zest for writing, an infectious gaiety, pervades the whole.

A Charming Piece

A charming piece that makes a welcome addition to the orchestra's repertory, and Mr. Monteux's finishing performance may well serve as future standard.

Presumably no one ever thought ill of this innocent Symphony; but no more than 48 years ago Tchaikovsky's Concerto, which today sounds almost Mendelssohnian, was condemned by the apidulous Hanslick in terms that shame any of the reproaches now heaped upon Stravinsky. Hardly of equal merit throughout its three movements, the Concerto has today lost not only its power to provoke antagonism but, at least in certain passages, its power to interest as well. There remain, however, many compensations in the music itself, and yesterday there were more in Mr. Zimbalist's over-tonally beautiful, technically remarkable, and on the whole deeply expressive performance of it.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

The last concerts of the 43rd season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place this afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux will end his present engagement. Beethoven Symphony, C minor; Carpenter, Adventures in a Perambulator; Debussy, The Afternoon of a Faun; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Stravinsky's Masterpiece is Still Being "Received"

By RUTH OGREN

Stravinsky's extraordinary work "Le Sacre du Printemps" which is said to savor warmly of the ultra modernist music of the extreme, primier in New York created a storm of enthusiasm, and was followed by receptions varying in degrees from zero to the boiling point, is still in the course of being "received" by American audiences.

Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who gave the work its premier at Carnegie Hall some weeks ago, recently brought the work to Boston and found that again the Bostonians' views differed widely from those of hospitable New York.

Following the furore which the first performance created, many requests were received by the management for a repetition of the famous work, yet there were many dissenters, who could see nothing but brutal coarseness in the work, and with characteristic diplomacy, Monteux sought to please both factions by arranging that "Le Sacre" be performed as an extra number added to the regular concerts in Boston.

Those who shuddered at the thought of a repetition were at liberty to leave the auditorium without losing the pleasure of a full, regular concert. And many did leave. Mr. Monteux, again in diplomatic fashion, eased their leaving-taking by having the orchestra retire from the stage, and after a short intermission, the musicians returned to perform the Stravinsky work.

Once more Stravinsky's masterpiece, which met several failures in Europe dating back many years, finally to be accepted in America, stirred the auditors who remained for the performance. Again the corridors were the scenes of excited discussions between inspired enthusiasts, blank sceptics, and courageous scoffers. However, from all indications, Stravinsky's music left its inescapable impress with its gasping rythms, its pulsating force and its maddening frenzy

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

94 TRANS April 24

TWENTY YEARS OF RICHARD STRAUSS AND A TONE-POEM

MR. MONTEUX AGAIN SUBMITS THE "DOMESTICA"

The Composer as the Turn of the Century Imagined Him—The Composer as a New Generation Judges Him—A Just Reaction and a Reaction Overdone—Mr. Rosenfeld as Devil's Advocate

LIKE most conductors—Parisian mediocrities only excepted—Mr. Monteux takes pleasure in the music of Richard Strauss. Like most publics, the audiences of the Symphony Concerts hear it gladly. Accordingly at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will be played anew. In Boston, it had lain neglected through nearly twelve years until Mr. Monteux revived it last December. Here and elsewhere music and performance were notably well received. Therefore, by general and particular request, "The Domestica" will now be repeated. When Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra first outspread it upon Bostonian ears in 1907, it was a debated and to some a repugnant piece. "Conservatives" spoke of it with the same vehement and ludicrous resentment that of late they or their heirs and assigns have lavished upon Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"; while suburban spinsters despatched no less eager "letters to the editor" containing their mild jokes at the expense of music and programme. Now, in these nineteen-twenties, all save a few "die-hards" sit in peace and pleasure before this "awful 'Sinfonia Domestica.'"

Nay, for more entertainment to the bystander, some that once extolled the tone-poem have drifted into mistrust and misliking. The hair-shirt of penance pleasantly titillates them, and they like to say that "of course" they over-estimated Strauss and all his works. Now they have "put him in his place"—until the fashion changes. Or else, holding heads high, they prance about richly caparisoned in the "post-war" view of Strauss's music. Usually this new judgment makes way to print in the excesses of such reaction. More circumspectly and with more reason Mr. Paul Rosenfeld has set it down in a chapter of his "Musical Chronicle" as published by Messrs. Harcourt, Brace and Company. A few fragments from the chapter bear quotation.

Time has altered Strauss's music, writes Mr. Rosenfeld. In 1904, he was, in Huneker's phrase, an "anarch of art." He was a sort of musical antichrist writing forbidden and occult and world-tumbling things for grand orchestra; pulling the white beard of divinity with his harmonies; initiating his audiences into satanic and wicked philosophies through tone; stirring hell-kitchen cauldrons in his fast-playing band. The very thought of the programmes of his symphonic poems made one dizzy. He proposed to set one in the boots of an archrogue; to make one experience death; dance with Nietzsche the monster-philosopher; collide as superman with the cosmic riddle; step over the prostrate crowds in the stride of the hero; lift the curtain of the alcove where married people sleep. It was like nothing so much as flying off the battlements of the tower of Babel to pursue vain war with Heaven. One knew what Huneker meant when he wrote that Strauss composed "with the pen of beyond good and evil." One saw with delicious shudders the unforgivable in sin heave over the horizon. And in performance, the music was infinitely bewildering, infinitely exciting. It went so fast, faster even than Wagner. Violins spiralled into the deeps of the firmament. The sound stepped out and stunned you.

You could never rest quite sure as to what was supposed to be happening; whether Till was upsetting the apple-carts of the market-women or making a long nose at the professors or hearing the judge pronounce sentence against him; whether Don Juan was making love to the Countess or to Anna or to Zerlinchen; whether the orchestra was painting the infancy, adolescence, or old age of the dying man. Was that religion, or was it science that was being discarded by humanity in its attempt to reconcile inhuman nature with man's metaphysical mind? Was the hero writing now "Tod und Verklärung" or "Traum durch die Dämmerung"; was the uncle saying "Just like mamma"; was the clock striking seven in the evening or seven in the morning? Were Herr and Frau Doktor Strauss connubially embracing, or were they throwing the breakfast-dishes at each other's head, or presaging their youngster's grandiose future? Positive one could never be. And when one did succeed in following the programme, sonorous and brilliant passages set everything in one glittering and chiming. The plangent trumpets in the finale of "Don Quixote" were the voice of lashing, howling, mocking disillusion. That was the iron tread of the hero as he strode over Europe with the swing of Rodin's walking man. That was the sun on the banging tympani of "Zarathustra." The singing horns and violins of Don Juan's feast painted the scene one intended some day to live. . . .

Strauss still remains a great musician but in a restricted sense of the word. The tone-poems of this child of Munich are marvelous things—for the ear only. Little has been written for orchestra that can match these rich-sounding works in pure sonority. They are fantasias of orchestral language of a brilliance that still overwhelms. It is doubtful whether any composer has better understood the instruments of the band; has had a more voluptuous feeling for the voices of brass and strings, the windy beauty of the horns, the velvet of reeds; revelled more luxuriously in these bright, high-pitched sounds. It is doubtful whether anyone has had a nicer sense of the purely orchestral possibilities, of the general range of the instruments, of the beautiful tapestry-like interplay of these sonorities. He has written passage upon passage of marvelous networks of timbres and colors, rich, savorous and dense. The great, many-stranded mid-

Continued on Following Page

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Bacchanale and Rout

ERNEST SCHELLING'S fantasy for orchestra, "A Victory Ball," to be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall is the latest completed work of the composer. The composition of the music was begun in the spring of 1922 in New York, and completed in Switzerland in the following summer. The score is still in manuscript. Mr. Lawrence Gilman, writing in the programme-book of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society, quotes Mr. Schelling's own story of the genesis of the tone-poem:

". . . I had come back from Europe still very much under the impression of the cataclysm, much troubled for the future, and was amazed to find that so few seemed to remember what the war really had meant, with its sacrifice of the youth. I had wondered, when watching the seething mass of humanity at some cabaret, what our boys would think of it all, and I had a sinister vision similar to the one that made me write my '1914' Impression [in the Variations for piano and orchestra, 'Impressions from an Artist's Life']. I came across Alfred Noyes's poem, 'A Victory Ball,' while in this mood, and was impelled to use it as the basis of an orchestral fantasy.

"I have used two Army bugle-calls: the 'Call to Arms' and 'Salute to the Colors,' which ominously usher in the War Vision; and at the very end of the piece I have used 'Taps.' The work is a perfectly free fantasy, with, however, a certain amount of thematic development.

"I had occasion during the war to hear the Scotch Pipers, and to observe the extraordinary effect their music had on the troops; and at the end of the work I have tried to make the whole orchestra a huge bag-pipe, perhaps the most pagan and primitive form of music. The piece is scored for full symphonic orchestra and bears this inscription: 'To the memory of an American soldier.'"

Here are the verses of the poem by Alfred Noyes (from "The Elfin Artist and other Poems"; Stokes, 1920) which suggested Mr. Schelling's music:

The cymbals crash, and the dancers walk,
With long silk stockings and arms of chalk,
Butterfly skirts, and white breasts bare,
And shadows of dead men watching 'em there.

Shadows of dead men stand by the wall,
Watching the fun of the Victory Ball.
They do not reproach, because they know,
If they're forgotten, it's better so.

Under the dancing feet are the graves.
Dazzle and motley, in long bright waves,
Brushed by the palm-fronds, grapple and whirl
Ox-eyed matron and slim white girl.

. . . . . .

See, there is one child fresh from school.
Learning the ropes as the old hands rule.
God, how that dead boy gapes and grins
As the tom-toms bang and the shimmy begins.

"What did you think we should find," said a shade,
"When the last shot echoed and peace was made?"
"Christ," laughed the fleshless jaws of his friend,
"I thought they'd be praying for worlds to mend."

. . . . . .

"Pish," said a statesman standing near,
"I'm glad they can busy their thoughts elsewhere!
We mustn't reproach 'em. They're young, you see."
"Ah," said the dead men, "so were we!"

Victory! Victory! On with the dance!
Back to the jungle the new beasts prance!
God, how the dead men grin by the wall,
Watching the fun of the Victory Ball.

Mr. Schelling [observes Mr. Gilman] has conceived his tone-poem as a bacchanale traversed by a vision—an apparition of troops "marching on irresistibly, inexorably. Nothing stops them—not those that fall by the way, not those whose fate is written in fiery, stormy skies. On they march to victory or disaster, with—in either case—desolation, suffering, death."

The music (after a mysterious introductory section, moderato) evokes the ballroom and its heedless, swirling crowd. There is a brilliant polonaise, the rhythms of the fox-trot and tango are suggested, and Jazz is king. Then comes the dramatic and poignant interruption: the vision of the marching hosts—those valorous and forgotten dead who sacrificially "laid the world away." The approach of the ghostly legions is announced by the two trumpet-calls: the "Call to Arms" and "Salute to the Colors." We hear the "dies iræ" on the brass. The tramping of the soldiers is momentarily drowned by the tumult of the dance: the lights flare up, and we see the revellers waltzing through the mêlée. But the vision reshapes itself. The Scots and their bagpipes pass. There is a great climax, a long drum-roll, diminuendo; and then, from a distant trumpeter, "Taps."

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

The last concerts of the 43rd season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place this afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux will end his present engagement. Beethoven Symphony, C minor; Carpenter, Adventures in a Perambulator; Debussy, The Afternoon of a Faun; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Stravinsky's Masterpiece is Still Being "Received"

By RUTH OGREN

Stravinsky's extraordinary work "Le Sacre du Printemps" which is said to savor warmly of the ultra modernist music of the exceptionally cacaphonous type, which premier in New York created a storm of enthusiasm, and was followed by receptions varying in degrees from zero to the boiling point, is still in the course of being "received" by American audiences.

Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who gave the work its premier at Carnegie Hall some weeks ago, recently brought the work to Boston and found that again the Bostonians' views differed widely from those of hospitable New York.

Following the furore which the first performance created, many requests were received by the management for a repetition of the famous work, yet there were many dissenters, who could see nothing but brutal coarseness in the work, and with his characteristic diplomany, Monteux sought to please both factions by arranging that "Le Sacre" be performed as an extra number added to the regular concerts in Boston.

Those who shuddered at the thought of a repetition were at liberty to leave the auditorium without losing the pleasure of a full, regular concert. And many did leave. Mr. Monteux, again in diplomatic fashion, eased their leave-taking by having the orchestra retire from the stage, and after a short intermission, the musicians returned to perform the Stravinsky work.

Once more Stravinsky's master piece, which met several failures in Europe dating back many years, finally to be accepted in America, stirred the auditors who remained for the performance. Again the corridors were the scenes of excited discussions between inspired enthusiasts, blank sceptics, and courageous scoffers. However, from all indications, Stravinsky's music left its inescapable impress with its gasping rythms, its pulsating force and its maddening frenzy

SYMPHONY 151 YEARS OLD HEARD

Strauss' "Domestica" Dominates Concert, However

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three pieces sufficed to make the programme of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon: a youthful symphony of Mozart, hitherto unheard here; Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as the soloist; and finally the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

INTEREST IN STRAUSS

When Mr. Monteux revived the "Domestica" last December it had gone unplayed at the Syphmony Concerts for more than a decade, and he is to be thanked for repeating it ere the season was done. A score of years have passed since the first performance of the "Domestica," in Carnegie Hall, in New York, with Strauss conducting—and its place in music is not yet fixed.

No longer may the "Domestica" be deemed formidable and unintelligible, no longer is the listener apt to be discomfited by Strauss' ingenuous programme or his possible breaches of good taste. But so at variance are contemporary musical ways with Strauss' whole technical scheme, his obvious programme, his inflated orchestra, his motives that now and then skirt the commonplace, his adherence to outmoded methods of thematic development, that many now casually dismiss the piece, with other of its composer's creations, as "old hat."

Strauss at His Zenith

But whether or not such procedures are valid for the composer of today, surely they were legitimate, even logical means of expression at the time when Strauss employed them. Indeed, the best argument against their present-day continuance is the fact that he carried them to their utmost reasonable limit. To go beyond him were to pile Pelion upon Ossa, to imitate him were mere futility. Yet the fact remains that as the last of Strauss' symphonic poems, the negligible "Alpine Symphony" excepted, the "Domestica" may well be regarded as the apogee of 19th century music romanticism.

Here is [illegible] to [illegible]ors of Berlioz, Saint-Saens, counting less others, not to mention Strauss of the earlier tone poems, in "Ein Heldenleben" Strauss previously written on so vast a scale, and this vainglorious piece of autobiography has neither the "Domestica's" firmness of texture nor its richness of invention.

Lofty and Ideal

Nor has Strauss elsewhere written so lofty, so idealistic a vein, the objections of his detractors and the regrettable incident of the baby's bath to the contrary notwithstanding. Anywhere, it is possible to feel, has he been to the same degree at once the master-craftsman of sheer music, the wielder of stupendous polyphony, the prodigious orchestrator and the inspired tone-poet of that which is noblest, deepest and most persuasive in human nature.

In the "Domestica" comes pages that for idyllic loveliness have scarcely their equal in the whole of music, and pages filled to bursting with the exuberance that is the joy of living. And here may be found an expression of passion wholly removed from sensuality, and of that tenderness which only the strongest may utter.

Monteux Unfolds Its Beauties

When first he conducted the "Domestica" here, although the performance was in many ways an admirable one Mr. Monteux was, in a sense, renewing his own acquaintance with the music. The performance of yesterday on the other hand, had naught of tentativeness; it was one of supreme assurance and excellence, as notably was Mr. Monteux's penetration of the composer's plan and purpose, for his revelation of all that Strauss would say, as for the incessant euphony and the amazing technical brilliancy of the orchestra's playing.

Far removed from the excitement and, if you will, the excesses of Strauss was Mozart's little Symphony, composed in his 18th year, and as fresh today as on that far-off November of 1773 when he set the date upon his manuscript. Written concisely for an orchestra that numbers only strings and a pair each of oboes, horns and bassoons, the Symphony is in Mozart's most engaging but not his most accomplished manner. Its melodies arrest the ear, its orchestration, all things considered, reveals surprising variety of color and effect, while a pure zest for writing, an infectious gaiety, pervades the whole.

A Charming Piece

A charming piece that makes a welcome addition to the orchestra's repertory, and Mr. Monteux's discerning performance may well serve as future standard.

Presumably no one ever thought ill of this innocent Symphony; but no more than 43 years ago Tchaikovsky's Concerto, which today sounds almost Mendelssohnian, was condemned by the acidulous Hanslick in terms that shame any of the reproaches now heaped upon Stravinsky. Hardly of equal merit throughout its three movements, the Concerto has today lost not only its power to provoke antagonism but, at least in certain passages, its power to interst as well. There remain, however, many compensations in the music itself, and yesterday there were more in Mr. Zimbalist's musicianly, tonally beautiful, technically remarkable, and on the whole deeply expressive performance of it.

changes. Or else, holding heads high, they prance about richly caparisoned in the "post-war" view of Strauss's music. Usually this new judgment makes way to print in the excesses of such reaction. More circumspectly and with more reason Mr. Paul Rosenfeld has set it down in a chapter of his "Musical Chronicle" as published by Messrs. Harcourt, Brace and Company. A few fragments from the chapter bear quotation.

Time has altered Strauss's music, writes Mr. Rosenfeld. In 1904, he was, in Huneker's phrase, an "anarch of art." He was a sort of musical antichrist writing forbidden and occult and world-tumbling things for grand orchestra; pulling the white beard of divinity with his harmonies; initiating his audiences into satanic and wicked philosophies through tone; stirring hell-kitchen cauldrons in his fast-playing band. The very thought of the programmes of his symphonic poems made one dizzy. He proposed to set one in the boots of an archrogue; to make one experience death; dance with Nietzsche the monster-philosopher; collide as superman with the cosmic riddle; step over the prostrate crowds in the stride of the hero; lift the curtain of the alcove where married people sleep. It was like nothing so much as flying off the battlements of the tower of Babel to pursue vain war with Heaven. One knew what Huneker meant when he wrote that Strauss composed "with the pen of beyond good and evil." One saw with delicious shudders the unforgivable in sin heave over the horizon. And in performance, the music was infinitely bewildering, infinitely exciting. It went so fast, faster even than Wagner. Violins coiled into the deeps of the firmament. The sound stepped out and stunned you.

You could never rest quite sure as to what was supposed to be happening; whether Till was upsetting the apple-carts of the market-women or making a long nose at the professors or hearing the judge pronounce sentence against him; whether Don Juan was making love to the Countess or to Anna or to Zerlinchen; whether the orchestra was painting the infancy, adolescence, or old age of the dying man. Was that religion, or was it science that was being discarded by humanity in its attempt to reconcile inhuman nature with man's metaphysical mind? Was the hero writing now "Tod und Verklärung" or "Traum durch die Dämmerung"; was the uncle saying "Just like mamma"; was the clock striking seven in the evening or seven in the morning? Were Herr and Frau Doktor Strauss connubially embracing, or were they throwing the breakfast-dishes at each other's head, or presaging their youngster's grandiose future? Positive one could never be. And when one did succeed in following the programme, sonorous and brilliant passages set everything in one glittering and chiming. The plangent trumpets in the finale of "Don Quixote" were the voice of lashing, howling, mocking disillusion. That was the iron tread of the hero as he strode over Europe with the swing of Rodin's walking man. That was the sun on the banging tympani of "Zarathustra." The singing horns and violins of Don Juan's feast painted the scene one intended some day to live. . . .

Strauss still remains a great musician but in a restricted sense of the word. The tone-poems of this child of Munich are marvelous things—for the ear only. Little has been written for orchestra that can match these rich-sounding works in pure sonority. They are fantasias of orchestral language of a brilliance that still overwhelms. It is doubtful whether any composer has better understood the instruments of the band; has had a more voluptuous feeling for the voices of brass and strings, the windy beauty of the horns, the velvet of reeds; revelled more luxuriously in these bright, high-pitched sounds. It is doubtful whether anyone has had a nicer sense of the purely orchestral possibilities, of the general range of the instruments, of the beautiful tapestry-like interplay of these sonorities. He has written passage upon passage of marvelous networks of timbres and colors, rich, savorous and dense. The great, many-stranded middle section of the Sinfonia; the shimmering, high-fluted introduction to what Mr. Deems Taylor has so cutely called the Uebermenschenwalzer; the poisonously entrancing reeds in the dance of the Seven Veils bewitch us over and over again with their sheer iridescent loveliness. It is a marvelous sensuality this man possesses; a virtuosic gift for orchestration like that of D'Annunzio for prose.

Continued on Following Page

In this many-hued stream of sound, you bathe as you might bathe in a river of perfumed vapor. You issue from it neither touched nor warmed nor refreshed. The music of Strauss has very little to give the mind. You cannot listen to this music and be moved. Life is somehow not strongly in it. It stirs nothing deep in you. It nourishes no high tremulous sense of beauty. There is a sort of lusty abundance in some of it, in "Don Juan" particularly; but this, too, wears a curiously fictitious look. For, though Strauss has a marvelous sensuous gift, his gift remains a superficial thing. In spite of his wizard-like control over the means of expression he has very few striking ideas. His thematic material wants distinction, wants quality. There is something always a little common, a little wanting in edge and incisiveness, in his melodic line. It is Strauss to some degree; but it is also a little everybody's music. . . . To be sure, Strauss manages to clothe these plebeian generalities in most magnificent dress; to press out of them, thanks to his amazing contrapuntal technique, the last drop of emotional possibility which they contain. But one is always conscious that the musical table is loaded with foods and flagons of doubtful quality.

Moreover, the greater number of Strauss's tone-poems want form. With the exception of "Tod und Verklärung" and perhaps "Till Eulenspiegel," they seem fragmentary; he wanders through the greater number of his songs, too. No real inner structure carries them taut from commencement to finish. Rather are, they seem a series of short breaths arbitrarily riveted together. The bow was not taut when this man set out to compose "Zarathustra" or "Don Quixote" or "Ein Heldenleben." The music begins with triumphant impulse. But before many minutes have elapsed, one gets the sense that Strauss did not have any strong feeling of the direction in which he was going when he set out so bravely; and that the expansion of the form is the result only of secondary conception. Handsome passages do ensue—the vigil in "Don Quixote," the love-scene and the brave return of the original theme in "Ein Heldenleben"; the marvelously densely woven middle-section in the "Sinfonia Domestica." But as soon as these are over, the musical Sahara returns. And at the conclusion, we have the baffled sense of having heard a number of not clearly connected fragments; the great inner satisfaction that comes through having been moved through thick water in an unbroken course. . . .

MERCURY

The last concerts of the 43rd season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place this afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux will end his present engagement. Beethoven Symphony, C minor; Carpenter, Adventures in a Perambulator; Debussy, The Afternoon of a Faun; Wagner, overture to "Tannhauser."

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Stravinsky's Masterpiece is Still Being "Received"

By RUTH OGREN

Stravinsky's extraordinary work "Le Sacre du Printemps" which is said to savor warmly of the ultra modernist music of the exceptionally cacaphonous type, which premier in New York created a storm of enthusiasm, and was followed by receptions varying in degrees from zero to the boiling point, is still in the course of being "received" by American audiences.

Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who gave the work its premier at Carnegie Hall some weeks ago, recently brought the work to Boston and found that again the Bostonians' views differed widely from those of hospitable New York.

Following the furore which the first performance created, many requests were received by the management for a repetition of the famous work, yet there were many dissenters, who could see nothing but brutal coarseness in the work, and with his characteristic diplomany, Monteux sought to please both factions by arranging that "Le Sacre" be performed as an extra number added to the regular concerts in Boston.

Those who shuddered at the thought of a repetition were at liberty to leave the auditorium without losing the pleasure of a full, regular concert. And many did leave. Mr. Monteux, again in diplomatic fashion, eased their leave-taking by having the orchestra retire from the stage, and after a short intermission, the musicians returned to perform the Stravinsky work.

Once more Stravinsky's masterpiece, which met several failures in Europe dating back many years, finally to be accepted in America, stirred the auditors who remained for the performance. Again the corridors were the scenes of excited discussions between inspired enthusiasts, blank sceptics, and courageous scoffers. However, from all indications, Stravinsky's music left its inescapable impress with its gasping rythms, its pulsating force and its maddening frenzy

---

"Ah," said the dead men, "so were we!"

Victory! Victory! On with the dance!
Back to the jungle the new beasts prance!
God, how the dead men grin by the wall,
Watching the fun of the Victory Ball.

Mr. Schelling [observes Mr. Gilman] has conceived his tone-poem as a bacchanale traversed by a vision—an apparition of troops "marching on irresistibly, inexorably. Nothing stops them—not those that fall by the way, not those whose fate is written in fiery, stormy skies. On they march to victory or disaster, with—in either case—desolation, suffering, death."

The music (after a mysterious introductory section, moderato) evokes the ballroom and its heedless, swirling crowd. There is a brilliant polonaise, the rhythms of the fox-trot and tango are suggested, and Jazz is king. Then comes the dramatic and poignant interruption: the vision of the marching hosts—those valorous and forgotten dead who sacrificially "laid the world away." The approach of the ghostly legions is announced by the two trumpet-calls: the "Call to Arms" and "Salute to the Colors." We hear the "dies iræ" on the brass. The tramping of the soldiers is momentarily drowned by the tumult of the dance: the lights flare up, and we see the revellers waltzing through the mêlée. But the vision reshapes itself. The Scots and their bagpipes pass. There is a great climax, a [illegible] drum-roll, diminuendo; and [illegible] from a distant trumpeter, "Taps."

the piece, with other of its composer's creations, as "old hat."

Strauss at His Zenith

But whether or not such procedures are valid for the composer of today, surely they were legitimate, even logical means of expression at the time when Strauss employed them. Indeed, the best argument against their present-day continuance is the fact that he carried them to their utmost reasonable limit. To go beyond him were to pile Pelion upon Ossa, to imitate him were mere futility. Yet the fact remains that as the last of Strauss' symphonic poems, the negligible "Alpine Symphony" excepted, the "Domestica" may well be regarded as the apogee of 19th century music romanticism.

Here is [illegible] to [illegible] bors of Berlioz, Saint-Saens, counting less of [illegible], not to mention Strauss's own earlier tone poems in "Eloquent Heldenleben." Strauss previously written on so vast a scale, and this vainglorious piece of autobiography has neither the "Domestica's" firmness of texture nor its richness of invention.

Lofty and Ideal

Nor has Strauss elsewhere written so lofty, so idealistic a vein, the objections of his detractors and the regrettable incident of the baby's bath to the contrary notwithstanding. Also nowhere, it is possible to feel, has he been to the same degree at once the master-craftsman of sheer music, the wielder of stupendous polyphony, the prodigious orchestrator and the inspired tone-poet of that which is noblest, deepest and most persuasive in human nature.

In the "Domestica" comes pages that for idyllic loveliness have scarcely their equal in the whole of music, and pages filled to bursting with the exuberance that is the joy of living. And here may be found an expression of passion wholly removed from sensuality, and of that tenderness which only the strongest may utter.

Monteux Unfolds Its Beauties

When first he conducted the "Domestica" here, although the performance was in many ways an admirable one Mr. Monteux was, in a sense, renewing his own acquaintance with the music. The performance of yesterday, on the other hand, had naught of tentativeness; it was one of supreme consequence and excellence, as notable Mr. Monteux's penetration of the composer's plan and purpose, for his relation of all that Strauss would say as for the incessant euphony and the amazing technical brilliancy of the orchestra's playing.

Far removed from the excitement and, if you will, the excesses of Strauss was Mozart's little Symphony, composed in his 18th year, and as fresh today as on that far-off November of 1773 when he set the date upon his manuscript. Written concisely for an orchestra that numbers only strings and a pair each of oboes, horns and bassoons, the Symphony is in Mozart's most engaging but not his most accomplished manner. Its melodies arrest the ear, its orchestration, all things considered, reveals surprising variety of color and effect, while a pure zest for writing, an infectious gaiety, pervades the whole.

A Charming Piece

A charming piece that makes a welcome addition to the orchestra's repertory, and Mr. Monteux's discerning performance may well serve as future standard.

Presumably no one ever thought ill of this innocent Symphony; but no more than 43 years ago Tchaikovsky's Concerto, which today sounds almost Mendelssohnian, was condemned by the acidulous Hanslick in terms that shame any of the reproaches now heaped upon Stravinsky. Hardly of equal merit throughout its three movements, the Concerto has today lost not only its power to provoke antagonism but, at least in certain passages, its power to interst as well. There remain, however, many compensations in the music itself, and yesterday there were more in Mr. Zimbalist's musicianly, tonally beautiful, technically remarkable, and on the whole deeply expressive performance of it.

Her April/26 Globe April/26

35

SYMPHONY GIVES 23D CONCERT

Mozart's C Major Work Feature, Played for First Time in Boston

FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. 200)—first time in Boston. Tchaikovsky, violin concerto (Mr. Zimbalist, violinist); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Although the performance of Strauss's description of his family life—with frequent exhibitions of harassing domesticity—was a gorgeous one; although Mr. Zimbalist gave a most musical and engrossing interpretation of Tchaikovsky's long winded concerto of uneven worth, the great feature of the concert was Mozart's symphony and not simply because it was played here for the first time.

Mozart wrote it probably in his 17th year, yet the music shows few, if any, evidences of immaturity. There are, of course, certain formulas of that decade; but the melodic spontaneity and freshness, the ease that is almost artistic carelessness, the haunting beauty slightly tinged with melancholy and for that reason all the more beautiful, the sparkle and the dash—these are of the later Mozart when he was at his height. No doubt, as Wyzewa and Saint-Foix suggest, or rather argue, in their monumental study of Mozart's earlier works, the music he heard in Vienna during a short sojourn—Haydn's quartets and the Viennese light operas—influenced the young man after he had become in danger of being Italianized; but this influence was exerted on one ready to accept it, yet self-sufficient in his own invention and expression.

Truly, a delightful symphony, and it was played with incomparable delicacy, grace, euphony and spirit.

Hanslick's volumes of collected reviews and essays are many. It is possible that in the days to come he will be remembered only by the fact that he said, apropos of Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, that it stank in the ear. Even here he was not original. Vischer was before him in saying that certain pictures stank in the eye. In spite of Hanslick's dictum, the concerto still lives in spite of its obvious faults: its endless repetitions, its measures of sheer padding. Why cannot some one arrange "Gems from Tchaikovsky's Concerto" after the manner of various anthologies (including "Crumbs of Comfort.") Long-winded, tedious at times as it is, the concerto by reason of melodic charm and demoniacal spirit is still heard by the people gladly, especially when it is performed by a violinist who displays, as Mr. Zimbalist, tonal beauty, freedom in the interpretation, and the requisite exciting spirit. The concerto is long enough, however, without the introduction of a seemingly interminable cadenza, interesting only as a means for technical display.

The Symphonia Domestica was heard here last December. It is not necessary at this late day to speak of it at length. There are pages of pure gold, pages of quiet, also of overwhelming, beauty; there are other pages, and they are many, that are bombastic and insignificant, showing routine rather than genuine invention. The performance itself was well worth a journey.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts, the last of a memorable season, is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, C minor, No. 5; Carpenter, Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

NEW MOZART WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Symphony in C Major for First Time Here

The only novelty at yesterday's Symphony concert was, rather curiously, a symphony in C major by Mozart, numbered in Koechel's Thematic Catalogue "200." It is supposed to have been composed in 1774, when Mozart was a boy of 18. Bruno Walter brought the score and parts to this country last season for the New York Symphony Society.

The sheer beauty of this music eclipsed for at least one listener the two other numbers on the program, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, suavely played by Zimbalist, and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," repeated from earlier in the present season for no apparent reason, since it is not a novelty here and has not roused especial enthusiasm.

The first movement of Mozart's symphony is not remarkable, though it has the inimitable and indescribable quality that pervades all his music. Nobody else has ever written music really Mozartean, for so many have contrived to echo Beethoven and Wagner. The slow movement has a beautiful theme, of which one is given no chance to weary. The minuet is an anticipation of that in the better known symphony in the same key, the "Jupiter." The finale is also a little masterpiece. How a symphony containing two such remarkable movements can have been overlooked in a city which has heard almost every significant piece ever composed and endless insignificant pieces is a mystery.

Mr Monteux conducted minuet and finale with zest, but as though they were by Haydn. But Mozart is the most difficult composer to perform, since in his music every nuance must be exactly rendered.

Tchaikovsky's concerto has a brilliant, if superficial, first movement, which Mr Monteux and the orchestra interpreted brilliantly, though Mr Zimbalist sacrificed incisive dynamics to purity and beauty of tone. His violin is said to have cost him $50,000. He certainly does justice to Stradivarius in the polish and suavity of his playing. But it lacks fire. The rest of his concerto is full of tiresome and inept repetition of short folk-song phrases.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is straightforward, rather clumsy, and very German music, with an abuse of full orchestra. The themes in it are less striking than the best of those in "Don Juan" and "Till Euelenspiegel." One does not find them going through one's head after the concert. The ponderous sentimentality of the program notes by German commentators on this symphony is amusing. The music can luckily be understood and enjoyed without worrying over how the baby took its bath and whether the man in the home ever lost his temper. One suspects Strauss of wishing sardonically to reduce program music to an absurdity.

Mr Monteux gave an excellent interpretation of Strauss' music. One of his good points has always been a complete imperviousness to parochialism and propaganda about music. He has always made his programs from the best music of all schools and all Nations, without reference to the late war or to any other non-musical matter.

His catholicity of taste in contemporary music is very unusual. After hearing him conduct for five years one cannot determine from either his choice of programs or his performances whether he is an especial admirer of any living composer or an enemy of any. He has played them all, and played them sympathetically, German and French, Russian and English alike.

One does not ever know with which clique in clique-ridden musical Paris Monteux aligns himself. With none of them probably. He is too sane and too good-humored for the excesses of any clique.

P.

BALTIMORE
MARYLAND
SUN
APR

MONTREAL
CANADA
Standard
ISSUE OF
APR 17
MAR 1921

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, who will sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and return to France after the Orchestra's concert in the St. Denis Theatre, Montreal, on April 23, has led that superb organization for four years. He came to the United States equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He was first prominent in his youthful days in Paris, his native city, where he took part in several chamber music ensembles. He soon found his true vocation as a conductor, and became a familiar figure, presiding over the Colonne Concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras there; also at the Opera, and at his own "Monteux Concerts" at the Paris Casino on Sunday afternoons, where he chcampioned some bold new music, which aroused demonstrations and counter demonstrations in the audience. He toured Europe four years as head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House New York. From that post he went to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his rare genius found its best fruition.

* * *

New York Has Musical Feast Of Stravinsky

Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg And Stokowski Each Has Offered Works Of This Composer To Concertgoers

By HENRIETTA STRAUS.
NEW YORK.

NEW YORK seems to have succumbed to Stravinsky this season, much as London did four years ago. First, Walter Damrosch, with the New York Symphony, and last, Willem Mengelberg, with the New York Philharmonic, gave "Le Chant du Rossignol." Next, Leopold Stokowski, with a small ensemble selected from his own men, did the "Renard" for the International Composers' Guild and also the symphony for wind instruments at one of his orchestral concerts. Then the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, played the "Sacre du Printemps," and, last, the League of Composers presented "L'Histoire du Soldat" under Chalmers Clifton.

All of these were first New York performances, and, in most instances, created a genuine interest. The "Chant du Rossignol" was repeated, by general request, on a recent program of the New York Symphony, and the "Sacre du Printemps," by an overwhelming demand, on the succeeding visit of the Boston Symphony, while Stokowski was obliged to encore both the "Renard" and the symphony for wind instruments. The only work not so favored was the "L'Histoire du Soldat," which received, at that, better treatment from the audience than it did from Mr. Cliftoa and his men.

THE outstanding work, however, was the "Sacre du Printemps," the concert version of Stravinsky's now famous ballet of that name. It is a rudely magnificent piece of orchestral writing, with which Eugene Goossens made such a sensational success as a conductor four years ago in London that he had to repeat it at a concert two weeks later. Goossens made it a veritable tour de force of the baton, stressing the barbaric frenzy and elemental ecstasy which Stravinsky undoubtedly demanded in this "Rite of Spring," for he himself was present and was lavish afterward in his praise.

Under Monteux, on the other hand, it became rather a superb exhibition of orchestral virtuosity, beautifully and thoughtfully worked out but lacking the dynamic, rhythmic vitality with which Goossens had infused it and with which he turned it into such "marvelous chaos," as one musician called it. Mild, however, as was Mr. Monteux's version, and general as was the applause, it was not received without protest. Elderly ladies walked out during the performance, with an air of outraged virtue, and indignant letters still wend their way to the press.

The main thing, undoubtedly, on such occasions, is to preserve one's sense of humor, not so much for the music as for the audience. After the "Renard," for instance, I heard one eminent conductor say to another with evident sarcasm: "Every student ought to learn this by heart." And this same conductor said to me once in discussing the "Rite of Spring": "If somebody took a bunch of notes from one part and transferred it to another, would you know the difference?" "No," I replied truthfully, "but Stravinsky would." "Humph!" he retorted wrathfully, "and you call that music!"

NEVERTHELESS, Stravinsky doubtless will continue to write "bunches of notes" that could be transferred, undetected by his audiences, from one page to another, and his audiences equally will continue to be undisturbed by their ignorance.

For there was no mistake about the fact that the New York audience thoroughly enjoyed the "Renard." This is a delicious burlesque of a Russian fairy tale, written for small ensemble, tenor and bass, and it was a lucky "Fox," indeed, to have been sponsored by Stokowski and his men, who gave it with the most perfect finish and understanding. It was also a fortunate "Nightingale" to be introduced by the New York Symphony, for it had Georg Barrère to sing its song on the flute.

This "Song of the Nightingale" is a symphonic poem which seems to be the musical evolution of Stravinsky's opera, "The Nightingale," based on Hans Andersen's exquisite tale. It must be admitted that Mr. Damrosch handled its fine, shimmering orchestration with much more delicacy and charm than did Mr. Mengelberg, who, curiously enough, introduced it at a Philharmonic concert on the same day that Mr. Damrosch gave its second presentation by the New York Symphony.

THE more, indeed, one hears of Stravinsky the more one realizes that he has established a very definite genre that requires a very definite handling. The symphony for wind instruments, for example, which was acclaimed under Stokowski was received in almost dead silence when Koussevitsky presented it in London. The work is not very interesting at best, and Koussevitsky, apparently, did not know what to do with it. So he simply presented the notes, and his audience repudiated the performance. So did Stravinsky himself, who happened to be there.

One felt somewhat the same way about "L'Histoire du Soldat," when Mr. Clifton presented it, for his men had not mastered their parts and he himself seemed to make no effort either to coordinate or subordinate the various voices. Yet this suite is infinitely more interesting than the wood-wind symphony. It is an obvious satire on the adventures of a penniless soldier, one Joseph, marching home on a two-week leave.

The stage action, when given, is incidental to the music, the chief characters either speaking or miming their parts. The score is fairly packed with rhythmic episodes, including marches, a tango, a waltz and a "ragtime." But Mr. Clifton's beat was so vague and indeterminate that never did soldier march or dance to less compelling rhythms.

This same rhythmic deficiency was also the greatest weakness in the performances of Prokofieff's ballet, "Buffoon," which the Neighborhood Playhouse has been giving with the Festival Dancers. This version is an adaptation from that which the Russian Ballet has been giving abroad under the name of "Chout," and which was originally designed by Larionow.

The Neighborhood Playhouse has done very well, on the whole, with this deliciously grotesque nonsense and Prokofieff has provided a richly descriptive score. But the musicians, unfortunately, are not rhythmic, and neither, in consequence, are those who mime the action, so that Prokofieff's chief characteristic is thereby lost. This is a pity, as both the ballet and its presentation are deserving of much more attention than they received.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

86

OTTAWA
CANADA

ISSUE OF

121

POSSIBLE DISBANDMENT OF PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PHILADELPHIA—The continued existence of the Philadelphia Orchestra may be threatened by the demands for next season of the Musicians' Protective Union, of which all the members of the orchestra are members. The increases in salary asked for the players by the organization are so large that the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, the sponsoring body for the organization, has declared itself unable to pay them.

Though negotiations between the Association and the Union have not been concluded, the backers of the orchestra are reported to have declared last week that they might be compelled to disband the orchestra for a year. Such a decision would constitute nothing less than a calamity for the cause of music in Philadelphia.

Under Leopold Stokowski's leadership, the organization has since 1912 attained one of the highest standards in orchestral music in this country, and the annual subscription series given in New York by the organization is invariably sold out with a long waiting list. The influence of such exorbitant demands by the Philadelphia Union, it was feared last week, might react unfavorably on New York orchestras.

The situation was described by Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, last week as "very serious." He stressed the fact that no definite outcome had been reached in the negotiations. "We have not settled anything yet," he said. "The meetings between the Orchestra Association and representatives of the Philadelphia Union have been going on for some time and will continue. The original demands made by the latter body would increase our orchestral budget about $103,000. They asked for a minimum rate of $85 per week for each player, instead of $60, which has hitherto been the scale here, as it also is in New York. The representatives of the Union have shown a certain tendency to modify his extremely high rate, to bring the weekly scale down to $75—which is still high. This would mean a difference of about $65,000 in the orchestral budget."

New York Orchestras Secure.

While the negotiations were going on which, it was stated in some quarters, might determine whether the orchestra would continue, Mr. Stokowski's players were paying their ninth visit of the season to New York to give a concert in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday.

Interested speculation was aroused as to what the principal New York orchestras would do if similar demands were to be levied upon them this spring at this time when the musicians' contracts are renewed. Fears regarding the New York Philharmonic were set at rest by Mr. Judson, its manager, who stated that the contract with the players of this orchestra had been made last year for a two-year period at a minimum rate of $60 for each individual player weekly. This contract has still one season to run.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, when asked whether the crisis in Philadelphia would affect in any way the New York organization, said that it would not do so for the present as the New York Symphony also had an agreement with the union which still had another year to run. "As a musician," said Mr. Damrosch, and a person interested in the development of music, I deplore anything which would interrupt the activities of so fine an organization as the Philadelphia Orchestra. The whole thing, however, must be left with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association which is composed of high-minded and public-spirited citizens able to deal properly with the situation to the best interests of all concerned."

The New York Times comments on the situation as follows:—

"The matter closely concerns the musical activities of New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra gives ten concerts each season in New York and they are largely attended. Not only is Carnegie Hall sold out by subscription for the entire series of concerts, but there is a long waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets, many of whom have had to continue waiting for several years.

"The orchestra is regarded as one of the finest in the country, and worthy of comparison with the best in the world. The conductor is Leopold Stokowski, whose skill, together with the fine personnel that he has gathered under his direction in the course of years, and their constant playing together, have brought the orchestra to its present standard of excellence.

"It was said yesterday by persons familiar with orchestral matters, that the disbanding of the orchestra, even if only temporary, would be little less than a calamity to the musical art, and that the restoration of it, after such a disbandment, would be a matter of great labor, extending over several years. The experience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during and after the war was instanced as showing the difficulty of restoring a fine orchestra to its highest state of perfection. That orchestra was not disbanded, but many of its members were dismissed or resigned, and it has only in the last season or so reached its former rank under a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Philadelphia Orchestra lost little or nothing as a consequence of the war, and has never halted in its rise to the position it now occupies."

FIRST-CLASS AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS ALL SHOW DEFICITS.

The following official reports disclose the fact that not one of the U.S. orchestras of the highest grade is self-supporting:—

"Following its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $83,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below those figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $289,000 to $308,000. The gross income from concerts has risen from $407,000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that 'among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit.' The public is appealed to to give 'this Boston institution' its firmest support at the present time.

"A gift to the guarantee fund of $10,000 from an anonymous giver is now announced, bringing it up to $156,000. This gift is 'In memory of Henry L. Higginson.' The fund, however, according to The Boston Transcript, mounts too slowly to meet the deficit, which now stands at $65,000."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The concert to be given in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will prove one of the richest musical treats ever offered to an Ottawa audience, and I trust that our people will realize the valuable opportunity given them to hear a type of concert that is rare outside of the great cultural centers of the world.

The orchestra will appear in full strength mustering 104 musicians, and the reputation the conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, and his players have won for themselves in New York and Boston, is such that a magnificent performance is assured for Ottawa.

The music critic of the New York Times speaks as follows regarding his impression of the concert given in Carnegie Hall, New York, a few days ago by the Boston Symphony Orchetra:

"The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensative interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck.'

* * *

The Ottawa program, which appears below, contains some of the finest examples of symphonic music:

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor Op. 36.

I—Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima.

II—Andantino in modo di canzona.

III—Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.

IV—Finale; Allegro con fucco.

Liszt—"Les Preludes" Symphonic Poem No. 3 (After Lamartine).

Debussy—Two Nocturnes (a) "Clouds"; (b) "Festivals."

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 14 1924

"THE RITE" ANEW, CHAMBER CONCERT, CURRENT DEBATES

"LE SACRE" MORE AUSPICIOUSLY HEARD

Engrossed Audience, Valiant Performance, Impressions Deepened — The Issues Around and Behind—An Afternoon of Resident Composers, Old and Young, Mr. Foote Prevailing—"Adventures in a Perambulator" Again

At the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, circumstance was kinder to the repetition of "The Rite of Spring" than it had been on Friday afternoon. Presumably those that wished to hear the piece had taken the 400 seats available to non-subscribers; while the audience by night has given a hundred proofs these forty years, that it far outstrips the audience by day in curiosity and receptiveness. Accordingly, at the pause before the beginning of "La Sacre," only a small fraction of the company departed; scarcely any left at the interval in the progress of the tone-poem; while not once was the performance disturbed, as it had been many times on Friday, by withdrawing groups. As the audience was more sympathetic, so were orchestra and conductor more on their mettle. Mr. Monteux was applauded long and loudly, when he came to his place to make beginning; while at the division and, still more at the end, there was round upon round of clapping. And with reason; for the whole performance rang and sang, beat and surged, with the mastery of the conductor and the manifold eloquence of the band. By the plain evidence of Saturday, five-sixths of the evening public of the Symphony Concerts is eager, or willing, to hear the music of the modernists; nay, gives it intent, serious heed, answers it with warm, general applause. And, through forty-three years on the musical side it has been the audiences of Saturday that count.

The more, then, does Mr. Monteux's placing of "Le Sacre" as supplement to a regular concert—"Extra, by General Request"—raise a debateable question of policy. If current report go truly, at the concerts of April 25 and 26, he will repeat Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," likewise "by general request" after his memorable revival of the tone-poem last December. The return to it praises the conductor, and many, after all the years of neglect upon the piece in Boston, will gladly hear it twice in one season. "The Domestica," however, will stand in regular place upon the programme, although twenty years ago, it vexed the stand-patters little less than does "Le Sacre" in these times. By common consent of both partisans and detractors, "The Rite of Spring" is the masterpiece, thus far, of modernist music; while the "Sinfonia Domestica" is only one—and hardly the most remarkable—of Strauss's tone-poems. Yet Stravinsky's music is repeated as pendant to a regular concert with the trying consequences endured on Friday; happily escaped on Saturday.

To do so, as it seemed to some listeners, was to imply that "Le Sacre" was unworthy of repetition in the usual course, was even a freakish and intolerable music. If so, why repeat it, or even play it in the beginning? The whole incident, moreover, has given an opening to the opponents of all modernist music at the Symphony Concerts. Already some of them are saying that henceforth it "must" be played "only" as extra number after the concert is done. The anticipating, and also the ironic eye sees Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, more than once its champion, submitting to this behest. Hereabouts, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stokowski have been the prophets, brave and bold, and to their greater glory, of Stravinsky. Yet it now appears that once in a way both Isaiah and Ezekiel may have qualms. Mr. Stokowski dared not convey "Le Sacre" to New York. Mr. Monteux, repeating the music, made it extra piece in Boston.

Renewed Impressions

It is proof of the enduring quality of "The Rite of Spring" that it bears repetition three times in three months; while at each return it deepens, broadens, enriches, understanding and response. Only under hearing renewed does the mind grasp the might and the magnitude of Stravinsky's design fulfilled. Upon a single tonal canvas—thirty-five minutes and a full orchestra in dimension—he would spread his "Picture" of a pagan and primitive Russia. Spreading it, he would evoke the mystery and the puissance of the vernal and life-giving Earth; traverse the rounds and games of his festal Youth; summon the grave presence, the portentous rites, of his Wise Men; recall again the awe and the magic of evocation; mount to the sacrifice of the Vowed Virgin self-consumed. A scheme to tax and test the clearest minded, the fullest throated of composers! Yet never once does the tone-poem (for, as such, the concert-hall hears it) halt, or stumble, or waver, or thin. To the end, the design holds cohesive and cumulative, full-fraught, unflagging, manifold—scourge and stimulus upon the receiving imagination. For once and in this our time, music has evoked primal awes and dreads, primal hordes at rites and sacrifice; the savageries of those that remember and fear; remember and would—fierce and in frenzy [illegible] new scope for music, Stravinsky conquered it.

As searching and thrilling, at third or fourth hearing, are the means of conquest. Back to the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven must the mind go for a comparable power and sweep of rhythm, when Stravinsky's drums beat and strings swirl; when knife-like are his woodwinds and thunderous his brass. The sustained surge whips the hearer breathless. Back to Wagner, mourning Siegfried slain and a hero, does the ear return for such clangors as time upon time mount and shiver from "Le Sacre," while in intervening years more than one composer—Stravinsky at their head—has enriched music with the new might of superposed and warring chords. The newer generation of composers, from Rimsky the Russian through Ravel the Parisian, has discovered and developed the pungency and the poignancy of individual instrumental timbres, isolated, opposed, blended. With these means, Stravinsky, through "Le Sacre" outdoes them all in bludgeon-power and rapier-sharpness. In the evoking of primal awes and mysteries and savageries this play of timbres is the leap and the flash of his creative flame.

And—be it said in a firm, clear voice—Stravinsky also knows beauty; the old sensuous beauty that is one of the everlasting heritages of music. Only, like Debussy before him—the Debussy now established and acclaimed—he has found new form, new voice, new impression for this beauty. It fills the second part of "Le Sacre" through many a measure at the beginning. It haloes the Dance of the Adolescents in Part First; it recurs in the music of the earlier rites. Elsewhere, in the tone-poem, other are the purposes and the speech of Stravinsky; while with him alone rests the choice of design and means. We who listen have only to descry the one and hear the other, by imagination receiving, answering, measuring both. Time the Sifter will determine "The Rite of Spring" as masterpiece of new power or as "abomination of desolation." For the while, even in the heats of controversy, it is wise to keep clear of innocent, even charming, prejudices. Only a year ago, a kind lady benignantly informed this department that "Boston society did not approve of the music of Wagner."

Neighborhood Composers

Had the shade of MacDowell wandered to Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon, it might have enjoyed the excursion from the Elysian Fields; might even have whispered into some super-sensitive ear: "I told you so." For MacDowell abominated concerts that sequestered American composers as in a corral of their own, and once said as much to the late and the eminent Felix Motti, with a brusqueness of word and manner that perceptibly surprised the Kaiserliche und Königliche General Musik-Dirigent, then in leisurely sojourn at New York. As it happened, the programme of the Flute Players not only assembled American composers "exclusively"; but, with a single exception, the late C. T. Griffes, limited the assembly to living or dead Bostonians. (Whether this circumstance would have lessened or enlarged MacDowell's wrath, a mere reviewer presumes not to say.) For the most part also, the eldest generation of composers had their day—Mr. Foote with a Theme and Variations for String Quartet; Mr. Chadwick with a Quintet for Piano and Strings and a new piano-piece, "The Aspen" above the waters; the late Horatio Parker with a "Valse Gracile" for Piano. At the other extreme in three songs for Piano and Tenor Voice, in two pieces in little for Flute, Viola, and Piano, stood the youngest of them all, Mr. Joseph Wagner, still higher student in composition at the Conservatory. Somehow Griffes also slipped in with a fantastical Scherzo—possibly because Mr. Sanroma, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play it.

Only one of these pieces seemed at all remarkable and that by the oldest of the gathered composers. Since Mr. Foote numbers his Theme and Variations Opus 31, it must have been long overlooked; while intrinsically, it well deserved revival. The long-breathed, full-bodied, gravely unfolded theme is the invention of a reflective musician. The suceeding Variations are his meditations upon it. Mr. Foote shuns the showy or abstruse feats, the easy tonal bric-à-brac, the obvious, semi-sentimental songfulness of such pieces. He devises his Variations gravely, with a wisdom and a readiness of means that conceal themselves. With an imaginative hand and ear he distributes and savors his measures among the four instruments. Always he is choice of matter and procedure, cultivating an unobtrusive brevity, as one who would speak to the point, have done—and not think too often of one. Johannes Brahms, no small influence in Mr. Foote's middle years. Throughout, also, he keeps to a gentle austerity of mood, sentiment, voice—familiar characteristic of his music. Somehow, whenever the best of it returns to our concert-halls, the surer are a few listeners that it should be oftener heard.

On the debit side, Mr. Chadwick is too fluent by half through his Quintet. It is long, repetitious and rambling; while page upon page is the part-writing that must have been second nature to a composer of his resource. Of course, there are felicitous moments, particularly in transition or in the return newly suffused of some theme already thrice familiar. Often, too, comes recurring sense of Mr. Chadwick's intrinsic American quality in his "absolute" music. American is the cheerful flood of the first movement; the warm, honest sentiment of the second; the buoyancy of the Scherzo; the "up and doing" of the Finale. We Americans also share Mr. Chadwick's fault in the Quintet, which is loquacity. In turn, "The Aspen" proved no more than a trifle, not too fanciful of substance or device; Parker's "Valse Gracile" was inconsequence, leaving not a trace behind; while Griffes's Scherzo, of grotesquerie and mystery, achieved neither. Finally, Mr. Wagner's music was distinctly disappointing. His three songs to verses of Browning are brief, well-made, appropriate—pleasant piece of the schools and the studio but with little hint of individuality. In the Trios his matter is as conventional; his handling of the three instruments curiously devoid of fantasy or flavor. Surely his prize-winning tone-poem must have disclosed a more personal invention, more sensibility to modulation and timbres. [illegible] singer and Mr. Laurent as player aside, there have been concerts the club more remarkable for the co-operating talents.

Incidents and Prospects

When Mr. Schelling's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," is played at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday, the composer himself will conduct in the piece. Infrequently he returns to Boston as pianist. Unless recollection slips, never until now has he come to Symphony Hall as conductor.

Casting about for a piece by an American composer to include in his final programme at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux has pitched upon Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in A Perambulator." The music has not been heard here since its first vogue when it was played thrice in a single season. In those days, Mr. Carpenter's humor, fancy and felicity carried all before them. At a Symphony Concert, there were unchecked smiles, even open laughter. The repetition should renew them. Amongst the Americans, Mr. Monteux chooses well.

For the first times last week Mr. Koussevitzky's name appeared officially in the programme-books of the Symphony Orchestra, when they announced its "forty-fourth season, 1924-25, of twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 10-11, 1924. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor." Present subscribers may retake their seats up to May 1. Meanwhile the names of new subscribers will be entered on the waiting lists. Prices for next year will descend from $70 to $20. The series of five concerts on Monday evenings, "Serge Koussevitzky, conductor," will also be continued. Present subscribers to them may retake their seats until June 1.

H. T. P.

86

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
APR 12

PHILADELPHIA—The continued existence of the Philadelphia Orchestra may be threatened by the demands for next season of the Musicians' Protective Union, of which all the members of the orchestra are members. The increases in salary asked for the players by the organization are so large that the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, the sponsoring body for the organization, has declared itself unable to pay them.

Though negotiations between the Association and the Union have not been concluded, the backers of the orchestra are reported to have declared last week that they might be compelled to disband the orchestra for a year. Such a decision would constitute nothing less than a calamity for the cause of music in Philadelphia.

Under Leopold Stokowski's leadership, the organization has since 1912 attained one of the highest standards in orchestral music in this country, and the annual subscription series given in New York by the organization is invariably sold out with a long waiting list. The influence of such exorbitant demands by the Philadelphia Union, it was feared last week, might react unfavorably on New York orchestras.

The situation was described by Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, last week as "very serious." He stressed the fact that no definite outcome had been reached in the negotiations. "We have not settled anything yet," he said. "The meetings between the Orchestra Association and representatives of the Philadelphia Union have been going on for some time and will continue. The original demands made by the latter body would increase our orchestral budget about $100,000. They asked for a minimum rate of $85 per week for each player, instead of $60, which has hitherto been the scale here, as it also is in New York. The representatives of the Union have shown a certain tendency to modify this extremely high rate, to bring the weekly scale down to $75—which is still high. This would mean a difference of about $65,000 in the orchestral budget."

New York Orchestras Secure.

While the negotiations were going on which, it was stated in some quarters, might determine whether

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

the orchestra would continue, Mr. Stokowski's players were paying their ninth visit of the season to New York to give a concert in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday.

Interested speculation was aroused as to what the principal New York orchestras would do if similar demands were to be levied upon them this spring at this time when the musicians' contracts are renewed. Fears regarding the New York Philharmonic were set at rest by Mr. Judson, its manager, who stated that the contract with the players of this orchestra had been made last year for a two-year period at a minimum rate of $60 for each individual player weekly. This contract has still one season to run.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, when asked whether the crisis in Philadelphia would affect in any way the New York organization, said that it would not do so for the present as the New York Symphony also had an agreement with the union which still had another year to run. "As a musician," said Mr. Damrosch, and a person interested in the development of music, I deplore anything which would interrupt the activities of so fine an organization as the Philadelphia Orchestra. The whole thing, however, must be left with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association which is composed of high-minded and public-spirited citizens able to deal properly with the situation to the best interests of all concerned."

The New York Times comments on the situation as follows:—

"The matter closely concerns the musical activities of New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra gives ten concerts each season in New York and they are largely attended. Not only is Carnegie Hall sold out by subscription for the entire series of concerts, but there is a long waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets, many of whom have had to continue waiting for several years.

"The orchestra is regarded as one of the finest in the country, and worthy of comparison with the best in the world. The conductor is Leopold Stokowski, whose skill, together with the fine personnel that he has gathered under his direction in the course of years, and their constant playing together, have brought the orchestra to its present standard of excellence.

"It was said yesterday by persons familiar with orchestral matters, that the disbanding of the orchestra, even if only temporary, would be little less than a calamity to the musical art, and that the restoration of it, after such a dismantlment, would be a matter of great labor, extending over several years. The experience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during and after the war was instanced as showing the difficulty of restoring a fine orchestra to its highest state of perfection. That orchestra was not disbanded, but many of its members were dismissed or resigned, and it has only in the last season or so reached its former rank under a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Philadelphia Orchestra lost little or nothing as a consequence of the war, and has never halted in its rise to the position it now occupies."

FIRST-CLASS AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS ALL SHOW DEFICITS.

The following official reports disclose the fact that not one of the U.S. orchestras of the highest grade is self-supporting:—

"Following its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $88,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below those figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $289,000 to $308,000. The gross income from concerts has risen from $497,000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that 'among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit.' The public is appealed to to give 'this Boston institution' its firmest support at the present time.

"A gift to the guarantee fund of $10,000 from an anonymous giver is now announced, bringing it up to $156,000. This gift is 'In memory of Henry L. Higginson.' The fund, however, according to The Boston Transcript, mounts too slowly to meet the deficit, which now stands at $65,000."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The concert to be given in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will prove one of the richest musical treats ever offered to an Ottawa audience, and I trust that our people will realize the valuable opportunity given them to hear a type of concert that is rare outside of the great cultural centers of the world.

The orchestra will appear in full strength mustering 104 musicians, and the reputation the conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, and his players have won for themselves in New York and Boston, is such that a magnificent performance is assured for Ottawa.

The music critic of the New York Times speaks as follows regarding his impression of the concert given in Carnegie Hall, New York, a few days ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensative interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck.'

* * *

The Ottawa program, which appears below, contains some of the finest examples of symphonic music:

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor Op. 36.

I—Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima.

II—Andantino in modo di canzona.

III—Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.

IV—Finale; Allegro con fucco.

Liszt—"Les Preludes" Symphonic Poem No. 3 (After Lamartine).

Debussy—Two Nocturnes (a) "Clouds"; (b) "Festivals."

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 14 1924

"THE RITE" ANEW, CHAMBER CONCERT, CURRENT DEBATES

"LE SACRE" MORE AUSPICIOUSLY HEARD

Engrossed Audience, Valiant Performance, Impressions Deepened — The Issues Around and Behind—An Afternoon of Resident Composers, Old and Young, Mr. Foote Prevailing—"Adventures in a Perambulator" Again

At the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, circumstance was kinder to the repetition of "The Rite of Spring" than it had been on Friday afternoon. Presumably those that wished to hear the piece had taken the 400 seats available to non-subscribers; while the audience by night has given a hundred proofs these forty years, that it far outstrips the audience by day in curiosity and receptiveness. Accordingly, at the pause before the beginning of "La Sacre," only a small fraction of the company departed; scarcely any left at the interval in the progress of the tone-poem; while not once was the performance disturbed, as it had been many times on Friday, by withdrawing groups. As the audience was more sympathetic, so were orchestra and conductor more on their mettle. Mr. Monteux was applauded long and loudly, when he came to his place to make beginning; while at the division and, still more at the end, there was round upon round of clapping. And with reason; for the whole performance rang and sang, beat and surged, with the mastery of the conductor and the manifold eloquence of the band. By the plain evidence of Saturday, five-sixths of the evening public of the Symphony Concerts is eager, or willing, to hear the music of the modernists; nay, gives it intent, serious heed, answers it with warm, general applause. And, through forty-three years on the musical side it has been the audiences of Saturday that count.

The more, then, does Mr. Monteux's placing of "Le Sacre" as supplement to a regular concert—"Extra, by General Request"—raise a debateable question of policy. If current report go truly, at the concerts of April 25 and 26, he will repeat Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," likewise "by general request" after his memorable revival of the tone-poem last December. The return to it praises the conductor, and many, after all the years of neglect upon the piece in Boston, will gladly hear it twice in one season. "The Domestica," however, will stand in regular place upon the programme, although twenty years ago, it vexed the stand-patters little less than does "Le Sacre" in these times. By common consent of both partisans and detractors, "The Rite of Spring" is the masterpiece, thus far, of modernist music; while the "Sinfornia Domestica" is only one—and hardly the most remarkable—of Strauss's tone-poems. Yet Stravinsky's music is repeated as pendant to a regular concert with the trying consequences endured on Friday; happily escaped on Saturday.

To do so, as it seemed to some listeners, was to imply that "Le Sacre" was unworthy of repetition in the usual course, was even a freakish and intolerable music. If so, why repeat it, or even play it in the beginning? The whole incident, moreover, has given an opening to the opponents of all modernist music at the Symphony Concerts. Already some of them are saying that henceforth it "must" be played "only" as extra number after the concert is done. The anticipating, and also the ironic eye sees Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, more than once its champion, submitting to this behest. Hereabouts, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stokowski have been the prophets, brave and bold, and to their greater glory, of Stravinsky. Yet it now appears that once in a way both Isaiah and Ezekiel may have qualms. Mr. Stokowski dared not convey "Le Sacre" to New York. Mr. Monteux, repeating the music, made it extra piece in Boston.

Renewed Impressions

It is proof of the enduring quality of "The Rite of Spring" that it bears repetition three times in three months; while at each return it deepens, broadens, enriches, understanding and response. Only under hearing renewed does the mind grasp the might and the magnitude of Stravinsky's design fulfilled. Upon a single tonal canvas—thirty-five minutes and a full orchestra in dimension—he would spread his "Picture" of a pagan and primitive Russia. Spreading it, he would evoke the mystery and the puissance of the vernal and life-giving Earth; traverse the rounds and games of his festal Youth; summon the grave presence, the portentous rites, of his Wise Men; recall again the awe and the magic of evocation; mount to the sacrifice of the Vowed Virgin self-consumed. A scheme to tax and test the clearest minded, the fullest throated of composers! Yet never once does the tone-poem (for, as such, the concert-hall hears it) halt, or stumble, or waver, or thin. To the end, the design holds cohesive and cumulative, full-fraught, unflagging, manifold—scourge and stimulus upon the receiving imagination. For once and in this our time, music has evoked primal awes and dreads, primal hordes at rites and sacrifice; the savageries of those that remember and fear; remember and wou[nd]—fierce and in frenzy. [illegible]

For searching and the test at third or fourth hearing, are the scores of conquest. Back to the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven must the mind go for a comparable power and sweep of rhythm, when Stravinsky's drums beat and strings swirl; when knife-like are his woodwinds and thunderous his brass. The sustained surge whips the hearer breathless. Back to Wagner, mourning Siegfried slain and a hero, does the ear return for such clangors as time upon time mount and shiver from "Le Sacre," while in intervening years more than one composer—Stravinsky at their head—has enriched music with the new might of superposed and warring chords. The newer generation of composers, from Rimsky the Russian through Ravel the Parisian, has discovered and developed the pungency and the poignancy of individual instrumental timbres, isolated, opposed, blended. With these means, Stravinsky, through "Le Sacre" outdoes them all in bludgeon-power and rapier-sharpness. In the evoking of primal awes and mysteries and savageries this play of timbres is the leap and the flash of his creative flame.

And—be it said in a firm, clear voice—Stravinsky also knows beauty; the old sensuous beauty that is one of the everlasting heritages of music. Only, like Debussy before him—the Debussy now established and acclaimed—he has found new form, new voice, new impression for this beauty. It fills the second part of "Le Sacre" through many a measure at the beginning. It haloes the Dance of the Adolescents in Part First; it recurs in the music of the earlier rites. Elsewhere, in the tone-poem, other are the purposes and the speech of Stravinsky; while with him alone rests the choice of design and means. We who listen have only to descry the one and hear the other, by imagination receiving, answering, measuring both. Time the Sifter will determine "The Rite of Spring" as masterpiece of new power or as "abomination of desolation." For the while, even in the heats of controversy, it is wise to keep clear of innocent, even charming, prejudices. Only a year ago, a kind lady benignantly informed this department that "Boston society did not approve of the music of Wagner."

Neighborhood Composers

Had the shade of MacDowell wandered to Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon, it might have enjoyed the excursion from the Elysian Fields; might even have whispered into some super-sensitive ear: "I told you so." For MacDowell abominated concerts that sequestered American composers as in a corral of their own, and once said as much to the late and the eminent Felix Mottl, with a brusqueness of word and manner that perceptibly surprised the Kaiserliche und Königliche General Musik-Dirigent, then in leisurely sojourn at New York. As it happened, the programme of the Flute Players not only assembled American composers "exclusively"; but, with a single exception, the late C. T. Griffes, limited the assembly to living or dead Bostonians. (Whether this circumstance would have lessened or enlarged MacDowell's wrath, a mere reviewer presumes not to say.) For the most part also, the eldest generation of composers had their day—Mr. Foote with a Theme and Variations for String Quartet; Mr. Chadwick with a Quintet for Piano and Strings and a new piano-piece, "The Aspen" above the waters; the late Horatio Parker with a "Valse Gracile" for Piano. At the other extreme in three songs for Piano and Tenor Voice, in two pieces in little for Flute, Viola, and Piano, stood the youngest of them all, Mr. Joseph Wagner, still higher student in composition at the Conservatory. Somehow Griffes also slipped in with a fantastical Scherzo—possibly because Mr. Sanroma, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play it.

Only one of these pieces seemed at all remarkable and that by the oldest of the gathered composers. Since Mr. Foote numbers his Theme and Variations Opus 31, it must have been long overlooked; while intrinsically, it well deserved revival. The long-breathed, full-bodied, gravely unfolded theme is the invention of a reflective musician. The suceeding Variations are his meditations upon it. Mr. Foote shuns the showy or abstruse feats, the easy tonal bric-a-brac, the obvious, semi-sentimental songfulness of such pieces. He devises his Variations gravely, with a wisdom and a readiness of means that conceal themselves. With an imaginative hand and ear he distributes and savors his measures among the four instruments. Always he is choice of matter and procedure, cultivating an unobtrusive brevity, as one who would speak to the point, have done—and not think too often of one, Johannes Brahms, no small influence in Mr. Foote's middle years. Throughout, also, he keeps to a gentle austerity of mood, sentiment, voice—familiar characteristic of his music. Somehow, whenever the best of it returns to our concert-halls, the surer are a few listeners that it should be oftener heard.

On the débit side, Mr. Chadwick is too fluent by half through his Quintet. It is long, repetitious and rambling; while page upon page is the part-writing that must have been second nature to a composer of his resource. Of course, there are felicitous moments, particularly in transition or in the return newly suffused of some theme already thrice familiar. Often, too, comes recurring sense of Mr. Chadwick's intrinsic American quality in his "absolute" music. American is the cheerful flood of the first movement; the warm, honest sentiment of the second; the buoyancy of the Scherzo; the "up and doing" of the Finale. We Americans also share Mr. Chadwick's fault in the Quintet, which is loquacity. In turn, "The Aspen" proved no more than a trifle, not too fanciful of substance or device; Parker's "Valse Gracile" was inconsequence, leaving not a trace behind; while Griffes's Scherzo, of grotesquerie and mystery, achieved neither. Finally, Mr. Wagner's music was distinctly disappointing. His three songs to verses of Browning are brief, well-made, appropriate—pleasant piece of the schools and the studio but with little hint of individuality. In the Trios his matter is as conventional; his handling of the three instruments curiously devoid of fantasy or flavor. Surely his prize-winning tone-poem must have disclosed a more personal invention, more sensibility to modulation and timbres. [illegible] singer, and Mr. Laurent as player aside, there have been concerts the club more remarkable for the co-operating talents.

Incidents and Prospects

When Mr. Schelling's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," is played at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday, the composer himself will conduct in the piece. Infrequently he returns to Boston as pianist. Unless recollection slips, never until now has he come to Symphony Hall as conductor.

Casting about for a piece by an American composer to include in his final programme at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux has pitched upon Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in A Perambulator." The music has not been heard here since its first vogue when it was played thrice in a single season. In those days, Mr. Carpenter's humor, fancy and felicity carried all before them. At a Symphony Concert, there were unchecked smiles, even open laughter. The repetition should renew them. Amongst the Americans, Mr. Monteux chooses well.

For the first times last week Mr. Koussevitsky's name appeared officially in the programme-books of the Symphony Orchestra, when they announced its "forty-fourth season, 1924-25, of twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 10-11, 1924. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor." Present subscribers may retake their seats up to May 1. Meanwhile the names of new subscribers will be entered on the waiting lists. Prices for next year will descend from $70 to $20. The series of five concerts on Monday evenings, "Serge Koussevitzky, conductor," will also be continued. Present subscribers to them may retake their seats until June 1.

H. T. P.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

86

OTTAWA
CANADA

ISSUE OF

12

POSSIBLE DISBANDMENT OF PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

PHILADELPHIA—Th continued existence of the Philadelphia Orchestra may be threatened by the demands for next season of the Musicians' Protective Union, of which all the members of the orchestra are members. The increases in salary asked for the players by the organization are so large that the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, the sponsoring body for the organization, has declared itself unable to pay them.

Though negotiations between the Association and the Union have not been concluded, the backers of the orchestra are reported to have declared last week that they might be compelled to disband the orchestra for a year. Such a decision would constitute nothing less than a calamity for the cause of music in Philadelphia.

Under Leopold Stokowski's leadership, the organization has since 1912 attained one of the highest standards in orchestral music in this country, and the annual subscription series given in New York by the organization is invariably sold out with a long waiting list. The influence of such exorbitant demands by the Philadelphia Union, it was feared last week, might react unfavorably on New York orchestras.

The situation was described by Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, last week as "very serious." He stressed the fact that no definite outcome had been reached in the negotiations. "We have not settled anything yet," he said. "The meetings between the Orchestra Association and representatives of the Philadelphia Union have been going on for some time and will continue. The original demands made by the latter body would increase our orchestral budget about $103,000. They asked for a minimum rate of $85 per week for each player, instead of $60, which has hitherto been the scale here, as it also is in New York. The representatives of the Union have shown a certain tendency to modify his extremely high rate, to bring the weekly scale down to $75—which is still high. This would mean a difference of about $65,000 in the orchestral budget."

New York Orchestras Secure.

While the negotiations were going on which, it was stated in some quarters, might determine whether the orchestra would continue, Mr. Stokowski's players were paying their ninth visit of the season to New York to give a concert in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday.

Interested speculation was aroused as to what the principal New York orchestras would do if similar demands were to be levied upon them this spring at this time when the musicians' contracts are renewed. Fears regarding the New York Philharmonic were set at rest by Mr. Judson, its manager, who stated that the contract with the players of this orchestra had been made last year for a two-year period at a minimum rate of $60 for each individual player weekly. This contract has still one season to run.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, when asked whether the crisis in Philadelphia would affect in any way the New York organization, said that it would not do so for the present as the New York Symphony also had an agreement with the union which still had another year to run. "As musician," said Mr. Damrosch, and a person interested in the development of music, I deplore anything which would interrupt the activities of so fine an organization as the Philadelphia Orchestra. The whole thing, however, must be left with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association which is composed of high-minded and public-spirited citizens able to deal properly with the situation to the best interests of all concerned."

The New York Times comments on the situation as follows:—

The matter closely concerns the musical activities of New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra gives ten concerts each season in New York and they are largely attended. Not only is Carnegie Hall sold out by subscription for the entire series of concerts, but there is a long waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets, many of whom have had to continue waiting for several years.

"The orchestra is regarded as one of the finest in the country, and worthy of comparison with the best in the world. The conductor is Leopold Stokowski, whose skill, together with the fine personnel that he has gathered under his direction in the course of years, and their constant playing together, have brought the orchestra to its present standard of excellence.

"It was said yesterday by persons familiar with orchestral matters, that the disbanding of the orchestra, even if only temporary, would be little less than a calamity to the musical art, and that the restoration of it, after such a disbandment, would be a matter of great labor, extending over several years. The experience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during and after the war was instanced as showing the difficulty of restoring a fine orchestra to its highest state of perfection. That orchestra was not disbanded, but many of its members were dismissed or resigned, and it has only in the last season or so reached its former rank under a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Philadelphia Orchestra lost little or nothing as a consequence of the war, and has never halted in its rise to the position it now occupies."

FIRST-CLASS AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS ALL SHOW DEFICITS.

The following official reports disclose the fact that not one of the U.S. orchestras of the highest grade is self-supporting:—

"Following its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $83,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below those figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $299,000 to $308,000. The gross income from concerts has risen from $407,000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that 'among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit.' The public is appealed to to give 'this Boston institution' its firmest support at the present time.

"A gift to the guarantee fund of $10,000 from an anonymous giver is now announced, bringing it up to $156,000. This gift is 'in memory of Henry L. Higginson.' The fund, however, according to The Boston Transcript, mounts too slowly to meet the deficit, which now stands at $65,000."

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The concert to be given in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will prove one of the richest musical treats ever offered to an Ottawa audience, and I trust that our people will realize the valuable opportunity given them to hear a type of concert that is rare outside of the great cultural centers of the world.

The orchestra will appear in full strength mustering 104 musicians, and the reputation the conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, and his players have won for themselves in New York and Boston, is such that a magnificent performance is assured for Ottawa.

The music critic of the New York Times speaks as follows regarding his impression of the concert given in Carnegie Hall, New York, a few days ago by the Boston Symphony Orchetra:

"The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensative interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck."

* * *

The Ottawa program, which appears below, contains some of the finest examples of symphonic music:

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor Op. 26.

I—Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima.

II—Andantino in modo di canzona.

III—Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.

IV—Finale; Allegro con fucco.

Liszt—"Les Preludes" Symphonic Poem No. 3 (After Lamartine).

Debussy—Two Nocturnes (a) "Clouds"; (b) "Festivals."

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 14 1924

"THE RITE" ANEW, CHAMBER CONCERT, CURRENT DEBATES

"LE SACRE" MORE AUSPICIOUSLY HEARD

Engrossed Audience, Valiant Performance, Impressions Deepened — The Issues Around and Behind—An Afternoon of Resident Composers, Old and Young, Mr. Foote Prevailing—"Adventures in a Perambulator" Again

At the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, circumstance was kinder to the repetition of "The Rite of Spring" than it had been on Friday afternoon. Presumably those that wished to hear the piece had taken the 400 seats available to non-subscribers; while the audience by night has given a hundred proofs these forty years, that it far outstrips the audience by day in curiosity and receptiveness. Accordingly, at the pause before the beginning of "Le Sacre," only a small fraction of the company departed; scarcely any left at the interval in the progress of the tone-poem; while not once was the performance disturbed, as it had been many times on Friday, by withdrawing groups. As the audience was more sympathetic, so were orchestra and conductor more on their mettle. Mr. Monteux was applauded long and loudly, when he came to his place to make beginning; while at the division and, still more at the end, there was round upon round of clapping. And with reason; for the whole performance rang and sang, beat and surged, with the mastery of the conductor and the manifold eloquence of the band. By the plain evidence of Saturday, five-sixths of the evening public of the Symphony Concerts is eager, or willing, to hear the music of the modernists; nay, gives it intent, serious heed, answers it with warm, general applause. And, through forty-three years on the musical side it has been the audiences of Saturday that count.

The more, then, does Mr. Monteux's placing of "Le Sacre" as supplement to a regular concert—"Extra, by General Request"—raise a debateable question of policy. If current report go truly, at the concerts of April 25 and 26, he will repeat Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," likewise "by general request" after his memorable revival of the tone-poem last December. The return to it praises the conductor, and many, after all the years of neglect upon the piece in Boston, will gladly hear it twice in one season. "The Domestica," however, will stand in regular place upon the programme, although twenty years ago, it vexed the stand-patters little less than does "Le Sacre" in these times. By common consent of both partisans and detractors, "The Rite of Spring" is the masterpiece, thus far, of modernist music; while the "Sinfonia Domestica" is only one—and hardly the most remarkable—of Strauss's tone-poems. Yet Stravinsky's music is repeated as pendant to a regular concert with the trying consequences endured on Friday; happily escaped on Saturday.

To do so, as it seemed to some listeners, was to imply that "Le Sacre" was unworthy of repetition in the usual course, was even a freakish and intolerable music. If so, why repeat it, or even play it in the beginning? The whole incident, moreover, has given an opening to the opponents of all modernist music at the Symphony Concerts. Already some of them are saying that henceforth it "must" be played "only" as extra number after the concert is done. The anticipating, and also the ironic eye sees Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, more than once its champion, submitting to this behest. Hereabouts, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stokowski have been the prophets, brave and bold, and to their greater glory, of Stravinsky. Yet it now appears that once in a way both Isaiah and Ezekiel may have qualms. Mr. Stokowski dared not convey "Le Sacre" to New York. Mr. Monteux, repeating the music, made it extra piece in Boston.

Renewed Impressions

It is proof of the enduring quality of "The Rite of Spring" that it bears repetition three times in three months; while at each return it deepens, broadens, enriches, understanding and response. Only under hearing renewed does the mind grasp the might and the magnitude of Stravinsky's design fulfilled. Upon a single tonal canvas—thirty-five minutes and full orchestra in dimension—he would spread his "Picture" of a pagan and primitive Russia. Spreading it, he would evoke the mystery and the puissance of the vernal and life-giving Earth; traverse the rounds and games of his festal Youth; summon the grave presence, the portentous rites, of his Wise Men; recall again the awe and the magic of evocation; mount to the sacrifice of the Vowed Virgin self-consumed. A scheme to tax and test the clearest minded, the fullest throated of composers! Yet never once does the tone-poem (for, as such, the concert-hall hears it) halt, or stumble, or waver, or thin. To the end, the design holds cohesive and cumulative, full-fraught, unflagging, manifold—scourge and stimulus upon the receiving imagination. For once and in this our time, music has evoked primal awes and dreads, primal hordes at rites and sacrifice; the savageries of those that remember and fear; remember and would [illegible]—fierce and in frenzy [illegible] new scope for music. Stravinsky conquered it.

As searching and thrilling, at third or fourth hearing, are the means of conquest. Back to the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven must the mind go for a comparable power and sweep of rhythm, when Stravinsky's drums beat and strings swirl; when knife-like are his woodwinds and thunderous his brass. The sustained surge whips the hearer breathless. Back to Wagner, mourning Siegfried slain and a hero, does the ear return for such clangors as time upon time mount and shiver from "Le Sacre," while in intervening years, more than one composer—Stravinsky at their head—has enriched music with the new might of superposed and warring chords. The newer generation of composers, from Rimsky the Russian through Ravel the Parisian, has discovered and developed the pungency and the poignancy of individual instrumental timbres, isolated, opposed, blended. With these means, Stravinsky, through "Le Sacre" outdoes them all in bludgeon-power and rapier-sharpness. In the evoking of primal awes and mysteries and savageries this play of timbres is the leap and the flash of his creative flame.

And—be it said in a firm, clear voice—Stravinsky also knows beauty; the old sensuous beauty that is one of the everlasting heritages of music. Only, like Debussy before him—the Debussy now established and acclaimed—he has found new form, new voice, new impression for this beauty. It fills the second part of "Le Sacre" through many a measure at the beginning. It haloes the Dance of the Adolescents in Part First; it recurs in the music of the earlier rites. Elsewhere, in the tone-poem, other are the purposes and the speech of Stravinsky; while with him alone rests the choice of design and means. We who listen have only to descry the one and hear the other, by imagination receiving, answering, measuring both. Time the Sifter will determine "The Rite of Spring" as masterpiece of new power or as "abomination of desolation." For the while, even in the heats of controversy, it is wise to keep clear of innocent, even charming, prejudices. Only a year ago, a kind lady benignantly informed this department that "Boston society did not approve of the music of Wagner."

Neighborhood Composers

Had the shade of MacDowell wandered to Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon, it might have enjoyed the excursion from the Elysian Fields; might even have whispered into some super-sensitive ear: "I told you so." For MacDowell abominated concerts that sequestered American composers as in a corral of their own, and once said as much to the late and the eminent Felix Mottl, with a brusqueness of word and manner that perceptibly surprised the Kaiserliche und Königliche General Musik-Dirigent, then in leisurely sojourn at New York. As it happened, the programme of the Flute Players not only assembled American composers "exclusively"; but, with a single exception, the late C. T. Griffes, limited the assembly to living or dead Bostonians. (Whether this circumstance would have lessened or enlarged MacDowell's wrath, a mere reviewer presumes not to say.) For the most part also, the eldest generation of composers had their day—Mr. Foote with a Theme and Variations for String Quartet; Mr. Chadwick with a Quintet for Piano and Strings and a new piano-piece, "The Aspen" above the waters; the late Horatio Parker with a "Valse Gracile" for Piano. At the other extreme in three songs for Piano and Tenor Voice, in two pieces in little for Flute, Viola, and Piano, stood the youngest of them all, Mr. Joseph Wagner, still higher student in composition at the Conservatory. Somehow Griffes also slipped in with a fantastical Scherzo—possibly because Mr. Sanroma, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play it.

Only one of these pieces seemed at all remarkable and that by the oldest of the gathered composers. Since Mr. Foote numbers his Theme and Variations Opus 31, it must have been long overlooked; while intrinsically, it well deserved revival. The long-breathed, full-bodied, gravely unfolded theme is the invention of a reflective musician. The suceeding Variations are his meditations upon it. Mr. Foote shuns the showy or abstruse feats, the easy tonal bric-à-brac, the obvious, semi-sentimental songfulness of such pieces. He devises his Variations gravely, with a wisdom and a readiness of means that conceal themselves. With an imaginative hand and ear he distributes and savors his measures among the four instruments. Always he is choice of matter and procedure, cultivating an unobtrusive brevity, as one who would speak to the point, have done—and not think too often of one, Johannes Brahms, no small influence in Mr. Foote's middle years. Throughout, also, he keeps to a gentle austerity of mood, sentiment, voice—familiar characteristic of his music. Somehow, whenever the best of it returns to our concert-halls, the surer are a few listeners that it should be oftener heard.

On the debit side, Mr. Chadwick is too fluent by half through his Quintet. It is long, repetitious and rambling; while page upon page is the part-writing that must have been second nature to a composer of his resource. Of course, there are felicitous moments, particularly in transition or in the return newly suffused of some theme already thrice familiar. Often, too, comes recurring sense of Mr. Chadwick's intrinsic American quality in his "absolute" music. American is the cheerful flood of the first movement; the warm, honest sentiment of the second; the buoyancy of the Scherzo; the "up and doing" of the Finale. We Americans also share Mr. Chadwick's fault in the Quintet, which is loquacity. In turn, "The Aspen" proved no more than a trifle, not too fanciful of substance or device; Parker's "Valse Gracile" was inconsequence, leaving not a trace behind; while Griffes's Scherzo, of grotesquerie and mystery, achieved neither. Finally, Mr. Wagner's music was distinctly disappointing. His three songs to verses of Browning are brief, well-made, appropriate—pleasant piece of the schools and the studio but with little hint of individuality. In the Trios his matter is as conventional; his handling of the three instruments curiously devoid of fantasy or flavor. Surely his prize-winning tone-poem must have disclosed a more personal invention, more sensibility to modulation and timbres. [illegible]

[illegible]nger, and Mr. Laurent as player aside, there have been concerts the club more remarkable for the co-operating talents.

Incidents and Prospects

When Mr. Schelling's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," is played at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday, the composer himself will conduct in the piece. Infrequently he returns to

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF 121

PHILADELPHIA—The continued existence of the Philadelphia Orchestra may be threatened by the demands for next season of the Musicians' Protective Union, of which all the members of the orchestra are members. The increases in salary asked for the players by the organization are so large that the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, the sponsoring body for the organization, has declared itself unable to pay them.

Though negotiations between the Association and the Union have not been concluded, the backers of the orchestra are reported to have declared last week that they might be compelled to disband the orchestra for a year. Such a decision would constitute nothing less than a calamity for the cause of music in Philadelphia.

Under Leopold Stokowski's leadership, the organization has since 1912 attained one of the highest standards in orchestral music in this country, and the annual subscription series given in New York by the organization is invariably sold out with a long waiting list. The influence of such exorbitant demands by the Philadelphia Union, it was feared last week, might react unfavorably on New York orchestras.

The situation was described by Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, last week as "very serious." He stressed the fact that no definite outcome had been reached in the negotiations. "We have not settled anything yet," he said. "The meetings between the Orchestra Association and representatives of the Philadelphia Union have been going on for some time and will continue. The original demands made by the latter body would increase our orchestral budget about $100,000. They asked for a minimum rate of $85 per week for each player, instead of $60, which has hitherto been the scale here, as it also is in New York. The representatives of the Union have shown a certain tendency to modify this extremely high rate, to bring the weekly scale down to $75—which is still high. This would mean a difference of about $65,000 in the orchestral budget."

New York Orchestras Secure.

While the negotiations were going on which, it was stated in some quarters, might determine whether the orchestra would continue, Mr. Stokowski's players were paying their ninth visit of the season to New York to give a concert in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interested speculation was aroused as to what the principal New York orchestras would do if similar demands were to be levied upon them this spring at the time when the musicians' contracts are renewed. Fears regarding the New York Philharmonic were set at rest by Mr. Judson, its manager, who stated that the contract with the players of this orchestra had been made last year for a two-year period at a minimum rate of $60 for each individual player weekly. This contract has still one season to run.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony, when asked whether the crisis in Philadelphia would affect in any way the New York organization, said that it would not do so for the present as the New York Symphony also had an agreement with the union which still had another year to run. "As a musician," said Mr. Damrosch, and a person interested in the development of music, I deplore anything which would interrupt the activities of so fine an organization as the Philadelphia Orchestra. The whole thing, however, must be left with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association which is composed of high-minded and public-spirited citizens able to deal properly with the situation to the best interests of all concerned."

The New York Times comments on the situation as follows:—

The matter closely concerns the musical activities of New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra gives ten concerts each season in New York and they are largely attended. Not only is Carnegie Hall sold out by subscription for the entire series of concerts, but there is a long waiting list of applicants for subscription tickets, many of whom have had to continue waiting for several years.

"The orchestra is regarded as one of the finest in the country, and worthy of comparison with the best in the world. The conductor is Leopold Stokowski whose skill, together with the fine personnel that he has gathered under his direction in the course of years, and their constant playing together, have brought the orchestra to its present standard of excellence.

"It was said yesterday by persons familiar with orchestral matters, that the disbanding of the orchestra, even if only temporary, would be little less than a calamity to the musical art, and that the restoration of it, after such a disbandment, would be a matter of great labor, extending over several years. The experience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during and after the war was instanced as showing the difficulty of restoring a fine orchestra to its highest state of perfection. That orchestra was not disbanded, but many of its members were dismissed or resigned, and it has only in the last season or so reached its former rank under a new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Philadelphia Orchestra lost little or nothing as a consequence of the war, and has never halted in its rise to the position it now occupies."

FIRST-CLASS AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS ALL SHOW DEFICITS.

The following official reports disclose the fact that not one of the U.S. orchestras of the highest grade is self-supporting:—

"Following its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $33,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below those figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $289,000 to $308,000. The gross income from concerts has risen from $407,000 in 1922 to $428,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that 'among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit.' The public is appealed to to give 'this Boston institution' its firmest support at the present time.

"A gift to the guarantee fund of $10,000 from an anonymous giver is now announced, bringing it up to $156,000. This gift is 'in memory of Henry L. Higginson.' The fund, however, according to The Boston Transcript, mounts too slowly to meet the deficit, which now stands at $65,000."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The concert to be given in the Auditorium on Easter Monday, April 21st, by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will prove one of the richest musical treats ever offered to an Ottawa audience, and I trust that our people will realize the valuable opportunity given them to hear a type of concert that is rare outside of the great cultural centers of the world.

The orchestra will appear in full strength mustering 104 musicians, and the reputation the conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, and his players have won for themselves in New York and Boston, is such that a magnificent performance is assured for Ottawa.

The music critic of the New York Times speaks as follows regarding his impression of the concert given in Carnegie Hall, New York, a few days ago by the Boston Symphony Orchetra:

"The performances were those of an orchestra which is now a most finished and sensative interpreter of the smallest wish of the conductor, and a conductor whose only purpose it was to transmit to his audience the message of the composer. Mr. Monteux never sought to make an effect for effect's sake or in any way to come between the listener and the music. Modestly and unostentatiously, but with a sincerity and authority felt by every one, he read the music of Beethoven and Franck."

* * *

The Ottawa program, which appears below, contains some of the finest examples of symphonic music:

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor Op. 36.

I—Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima.

II—Andantino in modo di canzona.

III—Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.

IV—Finale; Allegro con fucco.

Liszt—"Les Preludes" Symphonic Poem No. 3 (After Lamartine).

Debussy—Two Nocturnes (a) "Clouds"; (b) "Festivals."

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

Foote Prevailing—"Adventures in a Perambulator" Again

At the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, circumstance was kinder to the repetition of "The Rite of Spring" than it had been on Friday afternoon. Presumably those that wished to hear the piece had taken the 400 seats available to non-subscribers; while the audience by night has given a hundred proofs these forty years, that it far outstrips the audience by day in curiosity and receptiveness. Accordingly, at the pause before the beginning of "La Sacre," only a small fraction of the company departed; scarcely any left at the interval in the progress of the tone-poem; while not once was the performance disturbed, as it had been many times on Friday, by withdrawing groups. As the audience was more sympathetic, so were orchestra and conductor more on their mettle. Mr. Monteux was applauded long and loudly, when he came to his place to make beginning; while at the division and, still more at the end, there was round upon round of clapping. And with reason; for the whole performance rang and sang, beat and surged, with the mastery of the conductor and the manifold eloquence of the band. By the plain evidence of Saturday, five-sixths of the evening public of the Symphony Concerts is eager, or willing, to hear the music of the modernists; nay, gives it intent, serious heed, answers it with warm, general applause. And, through forty-three years on the musical side it has been the audiences of Saturday that count.

The more, then, does Mr. Monteux's placing of "Le Sacre" as supplement to a regular concert—"Extra, by General Request"—raise a debateable question of policy. If current report go truly, at the concerts of April 25 and 26, he will repeat Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," likewise "by general request" after his memorable revival of the tone-poem last December. The return to it praises the conductor, and many, after all the years of neglect upon the piece in Boston, will gladly hear it twice in one season. "The Domestica," however, will stand in regular place upon the programme, although twenty years ago, it vexed the stand-patters little less than does "Le Sacre" in these times. By common consent of both partisans and detractors, "The Rite of Spring" is the masterpiece, thus far, of modernist music; while the "Sinfornia Domestica" is only one—and hardly the most remarkable—of Strauss's tone-poems. Yet Stravinsky's music is repeated as pendant to a regular concert with the trying consequences endured on Friday; happily escaped on Saturday.

To do so, as it seemed to some listeners, was to imply that "Le Sacre" was unworthy of repetition in the usual course, was even a freakish and intolerable music. If so, why repeat it, or even play it in the beginning? The whole incident, moreover, has given an opening to the opponents of all modernist music at the Symphony Concerts. Already some of them are saying that henceforth it "must" be played "only" as extra number after the concert is done. The anticipating, and also the ironic eye sees Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, more than once its champion, submitting to this behest. Hereabouts, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stokowski have been the prophets, brave and bold, and to their greater glory, of Stravinsky. Yet it now appears that once in a way both Isaiah and Ezekiel may have qualms. Mr. Stokowski dared not convey "Le Sacre" to New York. Mr. Monteux, repeating the music, made it extra piece in Boston.

Renewed Impressions

It is proof of the enduring quality of "The Rite of Spring" that it bears repetition three times in three months; while at each return it deepens, broadens, enriches, understanding and response. Only under hearing renewed does the mind grasp the might and the magnitude of Stravinsky's design fulfilled. Upon a single tonal canvas—thirty-five minutes and a full orchestra in dimension—he would spread his "Picture" of a pagan and primitive Russia. Spreading it, he would evoke the mystery and the puissance of the vernal and life-giving Earth; traverse the rounds and games of his festal Youth, summon the grave presence, the portentous rites, of his Wise Men; recall again the awe and the magic of evocation; mount to the sacrifice of the Vowed Virgin self-consumed. A scheme to tax and test the clearest minded, the fullest throated of composers! Yet never once does the tone-poem (for, as such, the concert-hall hears it) halt, or stumble, or waver, or thin. To the end, the design holds cohesive and cumulative, full-fraught, unflagging, manifold—scourge and stimulus upon the receiving imagination. For once and in this our time, music has evoked primal awe and dreads, primal hordes at rites and sacrifice; the savageries of those that remember and fear; remember and wou[ld] [re]—fierce and in frenzy. [It is new] heritages of music. Only, like Debussy before him—the Debussy now established and acclaimed—he has found new form, new voice, new impression for this beauty. It fills the second part of "Le Sacre" through many a measure at the beginning. It haloes the Dance of the Adolescents in Part First; it recurs in the music of the earlier rites. Elsewhere, in the tone-poem, other are the purposes and the speech of Stravinsky; while with him alone rests the choice of design and means. We who listen have only to descry the one and hear the other, by imagination receiving, answering, measuring both. Time the Sifter will determine "The Rite of Spring" as masterpiece of new power or as "abomination of desolation." For the while, even in the heats of controversy, it is wise to keep clear of innocent, even charming, prejudices. Only a year ago, a kind lady benignantly informed this department that "Boston society did not approve of the music of Wagner."

Neighborhood Composers

Had the shade of MacDowell wandered to Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon, it might have enjoyed the excursion from the Elysian Fields; might even have whispered into some super-sensitive ear: "I told you so." For MacDowell abominated concerts that sequestered American composers as in a corral of their own, and once said as much to the late and the eminent Felix Mottl, with a brusqueness of word and manner that perceptibly surprised the Kaiserliche und Königliche General Musik-Dirigent, then in leisurely sojourn at New York. As it happened, the programme of the Flute Players not only assembled American composers "exclusively"; but, with a single exception, the late C. T. Griffes, limited the assembly to living or dead Bostonians. (Whether this circumstance would have lessened or enlarged MacDowell's wrath, a mere reviewer presumes not to say.) For the most part also, the eldest generation of composers had their day—Mr. Foote with a Theme and Variations for String Quartet; Mr. Chadwick with a Quintet for Piano and Strings and a new piano-piece, "The Aspen" above the waters; the late Horatio Parker with a "Valse Gracile" for Piano. At the other extreme in three songs for Piano and Tenor Voice, in two pieces in little for Flute, Viola, and Piano, stood the youngest of them all, Mr. Joseph Wagner, still higher student in composition at the Conservatory. Somehow Griffes also slipped in with a fantastical Scherzo—possibly because Mr. Sanroma, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play it.

Only one of these pieces seemed at all remarkable and that by the oldest of the gathered composers. Since Mr. Foote numbers his Theme and Variations Opus 31, it must have been long overlooked; while intrinsically, it well deserved revival. The long-breathed, full-bodied, gravely unfolded theme is the invention of a reflective musician. The suceeding Variations are his meditations upon it. Mr. Foote shuns the showy or abstruse feats, the easy tonal bric-à-brac, the obvious, semi-sentimental songfulness of such pieces. He devises his Variations gravely, with a wisdom and a readiness of means that conceal themselves. With an imaginative hand and ear he distributes and savors his measures among the four instruments. Always he is choice of matter and procedure, cultivating an unobtrusive brevity, as one who would speak to the point, have done—and not think too often of one, Johannes Brahms, no small influence in Mr. Foote's middle years. Throughout, also, he keeps to a gentle austerity of mood, sentiment, voice—familiar characteristic of his music. Somehow, whenever the best of it returns to our concert-halls, the surer are a few listeners that it should be oftener heard.

On the debit side, Mr. Chadwick is too fluent by half through his Quintet. It is long, repetitious and rambling; while page upon page is the part-writing that must have been second nature to a composer of his resource. Of course, there are felicitous moments, particularly in transition or in the return newly suffused of some theme already thrice familiar. Often, too, comes recurring sense of Mr. Chadwick's intrinsic American quality in his "absolute" music. American is the cheerful flood of the first movement; the warm, honest sentiment of the second; the buoyancy of the Scherzo; the "up and doing" of the Finale. We Americans also share Mr. Chadwick's fault in the Quintet, which is loquacity. In turn, "The Aspen" proved no more than a trifle, not too fanciful of substance or device; Parker's "Valse Gracile" was inconsequence, leaving not a trace behind; while Griffes's Scherzo, of grotesquerie and mystery, achieved neither. Finally, Mr. Wagner's music was distinctly disappointing. His three songs to verses of Browning are brief, well-made, appropriate—pleasant piece of the schools and the studio but with little hint of individuality. In the Trios his matter is as conventional; his handling of the three instruments curiously devold of fantasy or flavor. Surely his prize-winning tone-poem must have disclosed a more personal invention, more sensibility to modulation and timbres. M[r.]

[...]nger, and Mr. Laurent as [...]player aside, there have been concerts the club more remarkable for the co-operating talents.

Incidents and Prospects

When Mr. Schelling's sardonic tone-poem, "A Victory Ball," is played at the Symphony Concerts next Friday and Saturday, the composer himself will conduct in the piece. Infrequently he returns to Boston as pianist. Unless recollection slips, never until now has he come to Symphony Hall as conductor.

Casting about for a piece by an American composer to include in his final programme at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux has pitched upon Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in A Perambulator." The music has not been heard here since its first vogue when it was played thrice in a single season. In those days, Mr. Carpenter's humor, fancy and felicity carried all before them. At a Symphony Concert, there were unchecked smiles, even open laughter. The repetition should renew them. Amongst the Americans, Mr. Monteux chooses well.

For the first times last week Mr. Koussevitzky's name appeared officially in the programme-books of the Symphony Orchestra, when they announced its "forty-fourth season, 1924-25, of twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 10-11, 1924. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor." Present subscribers may retake their seats up to May 1. Meanwhile the names of new subscribers will be entered on the waiting lists. Prices for next year will descend from $70 to $20. The series of five concerts on Monday evenings, "Serge Koussevitzky, conductor," will also be continued. Present subscribers to them may retake their seats until June 1.

H. T. P.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 17 192

PAY TRIBUTE TO M. MONTEUX

Trustees of Symphony Orchestra Arrange for Farewell Reception to Conductor on Saturday, Afternoon, May 3, in Symphony Hall

In order that the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may have an opportunity of expressing their appreciation of the work of M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra for the last five years, who is to sever his connection with this band at the end of this season, the trustees have planned for a reception in his honor. This reception will take place in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, May 3, from 3.30 to 5.30 P. M.

On this occasion M. Monteux will be presented with a written expression of appreciation, a copy of which is now in the manager's office at Symphony Hall, and which the patrons of the concerts are asked to sign. There also is another copy at the Society of Arts and Crafts in Park street which may be signed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

APR

RECEPTION AND GIFT TO PIERRE MONTEUX

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to give a reception in honor of Pierre Monteux at Symphony Hall, Saturday May 3, from 3:30 to 5:30.

There will be presented to Mr. Monteux a written expression of appreciation of his services as conductor for five years. All of the subscribers to the concerts are to sign this testimonial and may place their signatures on it at the manager's office at the hall or at the Society of Arts and Crafts on Park street.

From
Traveler
Boston, Mass.

ZIMBALIST

With Efrem Zimbalist as the last soloist of the season, the last pair but one, of the regular Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 25 and 26. Zimbalist will appear with the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's violin concerto. Pierre Monteux will repeat on this program Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," and revive a little known symphony of Mozart's in C major (Koechel 200).

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO CLOSE SEASON HERE ON APRIL 29

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here, on Tuesday evening, April 29, in Infantry Hall, will mark one of Pierre Monteux's last appearances over the orchestra. He will conclude his season and his term in Boston on Friday and Saturday of the same week. Mr. Monteux's fifth and last season has proven one of the finest in the history of an orchestra which has had many illustrious conductors. Remarkable demonstrations have been accorded him in his closing concerts in New York and other cities.

The soloist will be John Charles Thomas, the popular American baritone, who has won a high place as a concert singer. He will appear with the orchestra in the prologue to "Pagliacci," and the air from Massenet's "Herodiade."

Mr. Monteux will also conduct Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." He will conclude his Providence season with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," which piece at the end of the week in Boston is also to be the last in which he will appear over this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Twenty-Second Program of Boston Orchestra

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

"The Russian Easter"—Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Unfinished" Symphony ..... Schubert
Aria from "Titus" ..... Mozart
"Song of the Sea" ..... Converse
Three Songs With Orchestra ..... Strauss
"A Victory Ball" ..... Schelling

The soloist was Sigrid Onegin.

This was the first performance in Boston of Schelling's "A Victory Ball," suggested by Alfred Noyes' verses of like title. The composer calls his composition a Fantasy, which describes it accurately enough, although the term "descriptive fantasy" might have been a trifle more exact, for descriptive music this most certainly is, not music which is purely objective in its appeal, which is graphically realistic.

The class of program music to which this Fantasy belongs is a large one and includes much of doubtful value. "The Forge in the Forest," "In a Clock Shop," "The Mouse and the Trap" et id genus omne, all dear to the patrons of popular concerts, probably represent its lowest level, although Beethoven was not above such puerilities in his bird calls in the "Pastoral" Symphony. Berlioz, the master par excellence of this style, was often saved by the very force of his imagination, which led him into such strange paths that the essential weakness of his means of expression was overcome by the romantic wildness of the ideas he would express.

Mr. Schelling's "Victory Ball" is at bottom no different from any of the compositions cited above. To be sure, the underlying idea is poignant, and one which appeals to a higher order of intelligence, but after all the composer's problem was simply to portray two sharply contrasted pictures—the one of wild gayety, the other of the grim horrors of war. To do this, he has employed conventional and well recognized methods, albeit with skill. In the sections devoted to the dance he has written music which is brilliantly emotional. A Berlioz would have made this music horrible, perhaps more so than the succeeding war picture, but Mr. Schelling's imagination stopped short after writing dance music which is dance music and nothing more. This was undoubtedly the portion of the work which should have called forth the finer imaginative qualities of his art. In the succeeding war picture he has resorted to the usual rolling of drums and bugle calls. Perhaps here no composer could have done more. The music is frankly descriptive and the effects are driven home with sledge hammer strokes. As a whole, "A Victory Ball" makes a strong popular appeal, because of its subject and more even, because of its obviousness—one is tempted to add, triteness.

In his "Song of the Sea," given for the first time yesterday, Mr. Converse has at least avoided the pitfall of attempting to describe the ocean in musical terms. He has instinctively sought the subjective idea of Whitman's poem, and although there is much in his composition which is lacking in distinction, many pages in which there is a conscious but not wholly successful striving for expression, there are occasional moments when he achieves his purpose and writes music which is definitely emotional.

Madame Onegin was hardly at home in Mozart's Aria, although completely so in the songs by Strauss, music which evidently appeals to her. But after all, this Aria by Mozart cannot be numbered among his best works.

The orchestra gave one of the most beautiful and affecting performances of the "Unfinished" Symphony it has been our good luck to hear, a performance free from sentimentality or from any attempts to read into this artless music effects and qualities which are not inherent in its nature. S. M.

EL PASO,
TEXAS
HERALD

...was picked up in London.

* * *

America will be introduced to some modern Russian compositions when Serge Koussevitzky takes up the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky thinks that German music is in decadence now and nothing worthwhile will be produced from that country for several years.

Among the Russian compositions that he will give is Serge Taniel's symphony "After Reading a Psalm." The composer died of hunger under the Bolshevik regime. He also thinks that Myakovski, another modern Russian composer, has written wonderful symphonies.

Mr. Koussevitzky was offered full powers with regard to all musical questions in Russia by Kerensky when he was prime minister. He refused the offer because it would have interfered with his work as conductor of the Moscow orchestra.

* * *

NOVEL NUMBERS, STANDARD ITEMS, ADMIRED SINGER

VARIED FARE AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Audience and Pieces—Mr. Schelling Passionately Inarticulate in "A Victory Ball"—Mr. Converse Fails to Fill the Sonorous Void of a "Song of the Sea"—Rimsky's Tonal Pageant—Schubert's Streaming Song—Mme. Onegin in Measured Richness

A MISCELLANY of eight pieces filled a Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon that none the less was shorter than usual. Mr. Stock with his Chicago orchestra and public, set the fashion for such an assemblage of snippets. Now and again Mr. Stokowski copies it for his Philadelphians. Occasionally, by way of variety, it also pleases Mr. Monteux. How his Bostonians take it is not easy to say with any certainty. He began on Friday with Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter," and hearty and general was the clapping. He proceeded with that fount of melody, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the applause was as brief, thin and tepid as though Mr. Bliss or Monsieur Honegger had signed the music. In the whole course of twenty-two pairs of concerts, from last October onwards, it is hard to remember a number more coldly received. Orchestrally, Mr. Monteux passed next to Mr. Converse's new tone-poem, "Song of the Sea." It was hardly an impressive music. Yet long and loud were the plaudits, not to be stayed until the composer bowed pleasure and gratitude. Finally, Mr. Schelling led the band through his fantasia, "A Victory Ball"—much more enkindling and engrossing piece. More perturbed, however, than warmed seemed the audience. Between whiles, Mme. Onégin sang an air from Mozart's opera in the grand manner, "Titus," and added to it three orchestrated songs of Strauss—the familiar "Morgen" and "Cäcilie," the less known "Muttertändelei." As she deserved on many a score, she was loudly clapped.

Inference from these shows of hands is curiously contradictory. Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is readily understandable and insistently emphatic—so obvious indeed that Mr. Sousa has already set it in the work-day repertory of his band. "A Victory Ball," moreover, ends in a fashion to arrest listening ears and quicken comprehending sensibilities. In contrast, Mr. Converse's tone-poem is neither lucid musical sound nor impressive tonal imagery. Yet the Bostonian composer was heaped with applause; while the visitor from New York was less generously rewarded. With honor, in their own city and in their own society are our prophets of music, especially if they be in presence at the concert containing their handiwork. Again, there was no mistaking the pleasure of the audience in the swelling pomps, rhetorical fervors and florid decoration of Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture; but Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony—of the instrumental song that abides in beauty, of the moods envied alike by poets of words and poets of tones—it passed coldly by. So doing, it was beyond understanding. Give it Stravinsky and it cries for something "melodious." Give it Strauss, and it murmurs for something suave. Set before it the ideal beauty of Schubert the songful, Schubert the gentle; and it scarcely taps its palms. There is nothing so inscrutable as "what the public wants" from the practice of the arts. Therefore, we bystanders must always be peering at it.

Neither of the new pieces contributed much to the pleasure of the day. As a romantic idealist, Mr. Schelling watched the German war, finally entered it himself. Like many another American, he saw in it no renewed struggle vi et armis for political and commercial destinies and supremacies. Sincerely and quite simply he regarded it as a contest on his side for the freedoms, the integrities, the aspirations and the peace of mankind. He believed that it would exalt his fellow-soldiers as he was himself exalted. He counted the dead a noble sacrifice in a cause for which he also would have lain down his life. Inevitably he was chagrined, disillusioned, embittered, as he looked upon the outcome of this "Great War," upon the course of human nature, upon the face of the world. His mood of devotion had run deep. His subsequent mood of revolt penetrated as deeply. So possessed, so craving relief and release, he seems to have written "A Victory Ball" on a hint from garish and rough-textured rhymes by the Englishman, Alfred Noyes.

In the scheme of the music, the dancers dance crassly, commonly, brazenly, after the manner of the cabaret. A ghostly soldiery marches out of the corridors of memory upon this rout. The Dies Iræ—day of wrath and day of judgment—sounds. The march and the dance rise and fall. To the blowing of myriad pipes, to the echo of "Taps," faint and far, the phantom host vanishes. In words this design lays hold upon the imagination. In tones, Mr. Schelling's music falls short of such illusion. His invention is neither fertile nor impressive; his procedure is expert and also dry; the contrasts that cut on paper, pass bluntly in sound. From first measure to last, "A Victory Ball" seems an inarticulate, unachieved piece. And the reason is not far to seek. Mr. Schelling was fain to fill his Fantasia with passionate resentment, bitter scorn, sardonic pity. The mood so possessed him as man that it constricted him as musician. He burned to speak out, and the fierceness of the flame withered his utterance. More than once in many an art men deeply stirred have been so holden.

In quite different case, but equally sterile seems Mr. Converse in his "Song of the Sea." No constriction stays him. In spite of Mr. Monteux's reported cuts in the tone-poem, it contains far too many pages of merely fluent and practised music-making, nearly all in Mr. Converse's stout-bodied, thick-voiced, full-rounded fashion. He seeks the massed, not the individualized, timbres, of an orchestra. His harmonies are an upholstery upon the musical framework. His measures move in broad lines through square-cut periods. He prefers to affirm rather than suggest.

Now all these are the ways of good craftsmen in tones through Mr. Converse's formative years at the turn of the century. In his earlier pieces, notably in "The Mystic Trumpeter," he used them as means to individual and imaginative expression. Of late, however, they have tended to become habitual process, to be but sonorous cloak for infertile matter. The plain shortcoming of this "Song of the Sea" is scanty musical invention and dulled emotional impulse. The music, excellently made in kind, merely sounds above and around a void. The tonal patterns and progress interest neither the ear nor the mind. The tonal substance and coloring evoke neither Whitman's ocular vision of lowering sky and clouded stars, nor his spiritual vision (as Cleopatra has it in Shakspeare's play) of "immortal longings." With all deference to Mr. Converse, a "Song of the Sea" should sound like the music of an established composer, perceiving that it was time to write another piece.

Yet in the whole course of the concert compensations abounded. Realists with music sit before Rimsky's "Russian Easter" and shake their heads. He repeats his themes, they observe sadly, where he should develop them. He is all for rhythm, for harmonic color, for the play of timbres. His strings whirr or sing; his wood-wind pierces; his brass trumpets. Always there is much orchestral ado. Yet to "thoughtful people"—God bless them!—it is orchestral ado about nothing. Meanwhile visionaries with music are all aglow with the Overture. They see the cathedral through mists of incense. Like the stars of heaven are the tapers. Below the glowing altar move priests and bishops stately, a treasury in their vestments; while before them great lords kneel. The hymns of the folk ascend; their feet resound under the arches. Or as some will have it, we hearers do but listen to a music akin in design and color to the many hued and angular frescos with which it was custom to adorn the great churches and the great-rooms of a Russia once Holy. Yet others will have the Overture wholly pagan—music of barbaric rites and splendors, a softened "Sacre." Pagan or Christian, the splendor and the fervor only the pedants may deny.

No doubt the Unfinished Symphony did sound a little tame after this magnificence. For once Schubert writes almost briefly; whereas ear, mind and spirit must have time to adjust themselves to his gentle loveliness, serene fancy, pensive and warm-hearted singing. Besides, there was another distraction. The strings, flutes, clarinets, horns, would match Schubert in bright or liquid or shadowed tones, in grace of phrase and plasticity of motion. Orchestra and composer were indeed as one: but between the two the listener was ever letting sensation sway. Mr. Monteux, moreover, takes the Unfinished Symphony simply. Enough for him that Schubert sings in eager or musing rapture. Unlike more formidable conductors, he descries no other passion in the music; while, being a man of taste, he will not turn it to rhetoric.

Compensation also was sight of Mme. Onegin's opulent presence and sound of her rich-voiced song. For the nonce, too, she did not over-stress that richness or overlabor the propulsive power behind. Not once did her higher tones thin or sharpen; upon the lower descended no thickening cloud. As just was she in play of projected mood and conveyed emotion; while clear sense of style directed her through each music. She sustained the long sweep of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and deepened the erotic rapture. Using half-voice, she suffused her tones with the still and sustained glow of his "Morgen." The light motion, the fluid tone, the playful spirit with which she clothed "Muttertändelei" surprised in a singer usually full blown. In the air of Mozart she summoned the stately and spacious progress, the decorative elegance of his one "court opera." Again Mozart sang, but in the periwig, laces and brocades that no doubt his Sextus and his Titus wore. In her recitals Boston has heard Mme. Onegin, the favorite singer. In the Symphony Concerts it hears also the accomplished artist. H. T. P.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have sent out invitations to a reception to Mr Monteux, to be held at Symphony Hall, May 3, from 3:30 to 5:30. A similar reception at the time of the final concert in New York assembled a notable company of musicians.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

87

BALTIMORE
MARYLAND
SUN

N. Y. Concert Season Is Fading Away

Pierre Monteux, Who Reestablished Boston Symphony Orchestra, Was Given Enthusiastic Farewell Ovation

By HENRIETTA STRAUSS.
NEW YORK.

THE last few weeks have borne all the recognized earmarks of the season's approaching demise. There have been the usual tender farewells between conductors and audiences, the usual lonely concert of some out-of-town orchestra that always prostpones its visit until primed by the winter's routine, and the usual last-minute novelties that come as a saving grace.

Of the first, the only one of permanence was that of Pierre Monteux's. The appreciation shown him was, it must be admitted, very tardy; for, whatever his merits as an interpreter, there can be no question of his greatness in training an orchestra. He has done more than rescue the Boston Symphony from a threatened disintegration—he has made it once more supreme.

His successor, Koussevitsky, will doubtless reap the glory, for Koussevitsky is of the prima-donna species. But in the memory of the few it will be Pierre Monteux who deserves our gratitude for saving our greatest orches-

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

Boston's Symphony Conductor "Playing" in New York—Fam sical folk in the midst of a little party given in New York the other day to honor the young pianist, Anton Bilotti. Leopold Godowsky while Siegfried Wagner, son of the great composer, sings a solo from one of his famous father's operas. Mr. Pierre Monteux, popula of Boston's Symphony Orchestra, is the gentleman with the mustache. Others in the group are Mrs. Wagner, Mrs. Godowsky, Mme. tarye, Mme. Monteux, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Drake. (Kadel & Herbert.)

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

MONTEUX'S FAREWELL PROGRAM.

The final Boston Symphony concert of the season here, to be given on Tuesday evening, April 8th, in Infantry Hall, will be one of Pierre Monteux's very last appearances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since the great French leader is to conclude the season and his term in Boston on Friday and Saturday of the same week. He has already made his last appearance as conductor of the orchestra in New York and several other cities, each of these farewell concerts becoming the occasion of a demonstration by the audience. Mr. Monteux will soon return to France to meet engagements in his own country.

He will conclude his Providence season and likewise his Boston season with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser" and the other orchestral numbers for his farewell concert in Providence will be Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." The soloist of the evening will be John Charles Thomas, the popular American baritone, who by the sheer beauty of his voice has won an enviable place recently, as a concert singer. He will appear with the orchestra in the Prologue to "Pagliacci," and the Air from Massenet's "Herodiade."

The sixth lecture in the Chopin Club series upon "Music Understanding" will be given by Mrs. Emma Winslow Childs at the music room of Mrs. Misch, 601 Elmwood avenue, on Thursday, April 24, at 3:30 in the afternoon. The subject will be "Form and Design in Music."

The Virginia Anderson string quartet will play Easter Sunday morning at the Central Baptist Church on Lloyd avenue. The quartet will play the following program: First Movement, from string quartet in G, Mozart; "Genius Loci," Thern; "Andante Cantabile," from string quartet, Op II., Tschaikowsky; "Le Demin Sommeil de la Vierge," Massenet. The quartet will also play with the organ an orchestral accompaniment for the choir which will give "As It Began to Dawn," by Arthur Ryder.

One of the features of the concert which will be given Wednesday evening, April 30, by the Monday Morning Musical Club in Memorial Hall, is a group of familiar quartets to be sung by Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, soprano; Mrs. Elsie Lovell Hankins, contralto; Mr. Willard Amison, tenor, and Mr. Harry A. Hughes will be the accompanist. The staging and lighting are in charge of Mrs. James O. Otis.

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

POP CONCERTS TO OPEN MAY 5

Symphony Orchestra to Offer Closing Pair of Concerts

A week from Monday, May 5, is to be the opening night of the Pop concerts—always one of the biggest nights of the season. This will be the 38th spring of the Pop concerts, which indeed are almost as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Each of Agide Jacchia's seven seasons as conductor of the Pops orchestra of 80 symphony players has been bigger and more broadly popular than the last, and it is not at all unlikely that his 8th will be the biggest on record. There will be Pop concerts on alternate Sundays, as last year. There will be the usual accompaniment of refreshments.

MONTEUX'S FAREWELL

The last appearance of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the closing pair of Symphony concerts of the season in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Beethoven'c Fifth Symphony in C minor, John Alden Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

JOURNAL

Musical Notes from Library

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 29 is posted on the bulletin board in the Music Library. The library has all of the music. The "Symphony in E minor, No. 5, 'From the New World,' op. 95" by Dvorak, is arranged for piano solo and piano duet. The "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy; and the "Overture to 'Tannhauser'" by Wagner are in these two arrangements also. The two songs which the soloist, John Charles Thomas, is to sing, "Prologue to 'Pagliacci'" by Leoncavallo; and the air "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade" by Massenet, are in the music collection in the form of the vocal score of these two operas, with piano accompaniment.

Several articles in periodicals will be of interest in regard to Mr. Thomas. In Musical America for Jan. 5, page 27, his singing of the "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade" is especially mentioned. Some other references are given in regard to his singing in the same periodical for Jan. 26, page 27, and in the Musical Courier for Jan. 3, page 26, and 28, and Jan. 24, page 34.

As this will be the last concert here which Pierre Monteux will conduct a chapter in "Eighth notes," by Parker, the music critic of the Boston Transcript, will be of interest. The chapter is called "Monteux, the visualist." There is also an editorial in Musical Digest, for April, page 17.

There are some interesting articles about Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra who will take his place in the fall, in Musical America, for April 12, page 3, called "Koussevitzky; the wizard and his magic baton" by C. C. Parker, and on the same page, "Koussevitzky is bringing Russian novelties for the Boston Symphony." In the Musical Courier for Sept. 13, 1923, page 21, and 28 is an article and editorial on the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1924 and also in Musical America for Sept. 15, 1923, page 1.

* * *

The Schubert Club held its monthly meeting on Monday morning in Room 613, Jackson building. The president, Mrs. Nathan H. Wilcox, presided. The subject of the morning's programme "American Composers of the Twentieth Century," was presented in a paper by Miss Ethel L. Thornton. This paper concluded the work of the club for the year on the general theme 'Composers of the Twentieth Century.'' Musical items were given by Miss Mary A. Cull. The annual meeting of the club will be held on Monday, May 12.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

"THE SPIRIT GIVETH LIFE"

After all, music does not speak for itself. It never has and it never can. [The New York Herald-Tribune H. T. P.

By Old Agreement

A Word About Mr. Monteux's Ending Term as Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

IT pleases sundry partisans of Mr. Monteux (who would seemingly have him perpetual conductor at the Symphony Concerts) to go about the town saying that farewell ceremonies for him are a mockery on the part of the trustees of the orchestra, since they have virtually dismissed him. So saying, these malcontents are at odds with known and published facts. When the trustees made a final contract with Mr. Monteux, three years ago, it was explicitly agreed between them that his new term should end in the spring of 1924. This proviso was so drawn as to leave no room for misunderstanding or embarrasssment on either side. In The Transcript and in other newspapers, it was also published at the time. The simple fact is that, in a flood of well won praise, Mr. Monteux now completes a term of service in Boston, long since fixed, determined and mutually accepted.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

APR 9

Kussevitzky, Boston's New Conductor, Discussed By London Music Chronicler

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, having lost Monteux, will next October have a new conductor. He will, of course, preside over the famous band of the Hub when it comes to New York; hence interest in the man who has made so deep an impression in Europe is widespread in musical circles. What sort of a conductor is this man, Serge Kussevitzky by name?

London has long known him. Here is an estimate which appeared in Truth, February 14, 1923:

"Last week we had the pleasure of seeing again Serge Kussevitzky conduct the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kussevitzky is undoubtedly one of the greatest conductors living, and there was a notable roll-up at the Queen's Hall of our English conductors—Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Adrian Boult and Mr. Eugene Goossens, among others.

"The program contained one first rate item, the Brahms Symphony in E (No. 3); one superb show piece, the Tchaikovsky fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini,' and a number of small items such as an orchestral version of a sentimental drawing-room song by Rachmaninoff, described as 'Vocalise.' Mr. Kussevitzky began magnificently with the Tchaikovsky; he simply carried his orchestra with him in the fiery execution of an astounding bit of carefully planned virtuosity. No one I have heard since Nikisch can get so much out of an orchestra as Mr. Kussevitzky. In the words of an old poet: 'He rides the whirlwind and commands the storm.' After such a performance as the 'Francesca da Rimini' one is left breathless and settles down in one's seat in anticipation of a wonderful evening.

"But on this occasion Mr. Kussevitzky cheated us. I suspect he had concentrated his rehearsing on the Tchaikovsky and on the Raval arrangement of Moussorgsky's 'Picture Show,' which concluded the program. At any rate, I felt that the Brahms performance was being improvised, and that he was relying too much on the orchestra's ability to pick up his intentions as they went along. There was a complete lack of certainty and inevitability about the performance which contrasted strongly with the rendering of the Tchaikovsky work. Moreover, Mr. Kussevitzky's rendering of the Brahms was in itself too Tchaikovskian, too dramatic and overemphasized. There were good moments, but on the whole it was a poor, rhapsodically uneven performance of that fine work, and it gave me very little pleasure."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM

the middle of May.

"Modernist" music is an enigma to many—to the majority, in fact. Igor Stravinsky is a typical modernist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been introducing some of these modern novelties and at its two concerts in New York the past season ered to show music lovers in the metropolis what the orchestra could do in this line. A critic says of these performances:

"Stravinsky's strange and powerful score Le Sacre du Printemps," which was introduced in New York at a memorable concert of the Boston Symphony some six weeks ago, was repeated by the same organization. In the interimb the work's fame had spread into every quarter of musical New York, with the result that an overflow audience greeted Mr. Monteux and his famous band. The work was fully discussed following its local premiere, when it made a profound impression by reason of its barbaric and mighty rhythm and daring conception. Again the score seemed a legitimate masterpiece, a strong, seizing manifestation of genius, executed with consummate technical wizardry. Its immense difficulties were again negotiatied with brilliant success and perfecton of detail by Mr. Monteux and his men. The audience was stirred to the extent of bursting into applause after part 1 of the score, but Mr. Monteux did not pause to acknowledge the handclapping until the end, when there was a demonstration."

MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER

3 7 1924

RIALTO NOTES

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra promises to become the American exponent of Russian modern music when Serge Koussevitzky takes up the leadership of the organization in September.

A lot of music has been written in Russia in recent years and practically nothing has reached America, says Koussevitzky. There's the symphony of Serge Taniels, called After Reading a Psalm. The composer died of hunger. He was a close friend of mine, says Koussevitzky. There's also Myakovski, who has written a number of symphonies. Kouessvitzky expects to give at least [illegible] in Boston during the coming seas[illegible]

Koussevitzky was bo[illegible]r in northern Russia in 187[illegible] considerable period he was [illegible] as a double-bass virtuoso. He succeeds Pierre Monteux who conducted the Boston Symphony for many years.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW FANTASIA

Shelling's "Victory Ball" Played for the First Time in Boston

PROGRAM TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter"; Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Converse, "Song of the Sea," Tone poem after Walt Whitman; Schelling, "A Victory Ball." Sigrid Onegin, who sang here with the Symphony orchestra for the first time, sang "Ach nur einal nock im Leban" from Mozart's "Titus," and three songs by Strauss: "Morgen," "Mutter taendelei" and "Caecilie." Converse's tone poem was performed for the first time. Mr. Schelling conducted his Fantasy, which was played here for the first time.

Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is one of the most impressive musical compositions that we have heard in the concert hall for many years. It sets the nerves atingling. It shakes the soul.

He did not write this Fantasia merely as a lover of grim, ironic poetry, reading Alfred Noyes's vision of dead soldiers watching the dancers, unmindful of war's horrors and the sacrifice made by young and old; he himself had served gallantly; he knew what war meant. Outraged by flippancy and frivolity, by the forgetfulness of those surviving, saved for their wanton pleasures by the death of thousands and tens of thousands, he was fired to composition by the splendid savagery, the burning invective of the poet's lines.

And Mr. Schelling wrote as an accomplished musician as well as a soldier and a patriot; wrote dramatically, tragically; not with conventionally theatrical intent and emphasis, for, terribly in earnest, blazing with indignation, he yet was faithful to art; and so this Fantasia is the more impressive. Hysterical outbursts, merely melodramatic effects, would have lessened the effect that is now overwhelming.

He did not miss the opportunity given by the poet for the contrast between riotous life and the shock and the scorn of the dead, unseen spectators. There are the vivid musical pictures of marching soldiers, the tramping toward death or victory. The Dies Irae and the Scottish bagpipes are heard; all this as in a vision that might have turned the dancers to stone. And after the great climax, skilfully led up to from rolling drums, is heard a trumpeter far off, sounding "Taps," the final tribute.

No wonder that this Fantasia is dedicated "To the memory of an American soldier."

Mr. Converse went again to Walt Whitman for his inspiration. Choosing Whitman's "On the Beach at Night" he wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation of the lines into music, nor did he endeavor to describe realistically the shatter of the sea. The spiritual contents of poems attract him; in this instance the successive moods of the child mourning the momentary disappearance of stars and planet, and then the comforting thought of immortality. So in this "Song of the Sea," a reassured, heightened, joyous spirit triumphs at last over the opening mood of sadness.

Nature gave Mme. Onegin an uncommonly beautiful voice. Art has done little for her. The more the pity. At present she is not acquainted with certain elementary and essential principles of song. It could be wished that at a Symphony concert a woman about to sing would come upon the stage and bear herself with dignity and grace.

The orchestra gave a superb performance of "The Russian Easter."

The concert will be repeated to-night. The program of next week is as follows: a symphony, C major, by the young Mozart, which will be heard for the first time in Boston; Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto played by Mr. Zimbalist, and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, which was performed earlier in the season.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

371

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Plaint and Perplexity

A CORRESPONDENT sends to this department a note that it approaches with trepidation. She is, it seems, an occasional visitor to the Symphony Concerts, taking pot-luck at the box-office when the music in prospect tempts her. Twice of late her ticket placed her close to the living and resident composer whose newest master-work was played for the first time. In each instance long and loud applause acclaimed it and him. With one hand the scrupulous and generous Monteux put by these plaudits. With the other, he directed them toward the receptive composer, of whose presence and placement in the concert-room he seemed to be fore-warned. The eyes, the heads, the clapping hands of three-fourths the audience followed the directing gesture, lighted upon the composer, turned not away until he had bowed one, and sometimes two or three, acknowledgements.

"While all this was going on," writes the correspondent, "I was most uncomfortable, and it seemed to me that my immediate neighbors were also embarrassed. The men looked at their boots or fidgetted with the programme-book; while the women picked at their best Saturday-evening bib-and-tucker and instinctively re-settled it. I felt, and I think others felt, as though the whole audience was looking us over. Nor was the applauded composer exactly an enticing spectacle—plainly ready, yet hesitating between this moment and that for grateful uprising. Would not the stage be the proper and the better place for him?"

Possibly the correspondent is over-sensitive about herself and unsympathetic toward the honored and beaming music-maker. Of course he is the most modest and surprised of men, no doubt as embarrassed as his neighbors under so many gazing eyes and clapping hands. None the less, it does stand to reason that the place for public appearance at the Symphony Concerts is the stage and no other. Indeed, within easy recollection, various composers—Mr. Gilbert, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Bliss—have preferred it. Others might advisedly do likewise. Unwhipped cynics have even suggested that they be seated on the platform during the playing of their music, with their countenances as rising or falling barometer to the proceedings. Only Beethoven, however, so took post in his final years, when he was stone-deaf.

H. T. P.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT
40

TWENTY YEARS OF RICHARD STRAUSS AND A TONE-POEM

MR. MONTEUX AGAIN SUBMITS THE "DOMESTICA"

The Composer as the Turn of the Century Imagined Him—The Composer as a New Generation Judges Him—A Just Reaction and a Reaction Overdone—Mr. Rosenfeld as Devil's Advocate

LIKE most conductors—Parisian mediocrities only excepted—Mr. Monteux takes pleasure in the music of Richard Strauss. Like most publics, the audiences of the Symphony Concerts hear it gladly. Accordingly at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will be played anew. In Boston, it had lain neglected through nearly twelve years until Mr. Monteux revived it last December. Here and elsewhere music and performance were notably well received. Therefore, by general and particular request, "The Domestica" will now be repeated. When Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra first outspread it upon Bostonian ears in 1907, it was a debated and to some a repugnant piece. "Conservatives" spoke of it with the same vehement and ludicrous resentment that of late they or their heirs and assigns have lavished upon Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"; while suburban spinsters despatched no less eager "letters to the editor" containing their mild jokes at the expense of music and programme. Now, in these nineteen-twenties, all save a few "diehards" sit in peace and pleasure before this "awful 'Sinfonia Domestica.'"

Nay, for more entertainment to the bystander, some that once extolled the tone-poem have drifted into mistrust and misliking. The hair-shirt of penance pleasantly titillates them, and they like to say that "of course" they over-estimated Strauss and all his works. Now they have "put him in his place"—until the fashion changes. Or else, holding heads high, they prance about richly caparisoned in the "post-war" view of Strauss's music. Usually this new judgment makes way to print in the excesses of such reaction. More circumspectly and with more reason Mr. Paul Rosenfeld has set it down in a chapter of his "Musical Chronicle" as published by Messrs. Harcourt, Brace and Company. A few fragments from the chapter bear quotation.

Time has altered Strauss's music, writes Mr. Rosenfeld. In 1904, he was, in Huneker's phrase, an "anarch of art." He was a sort of musical antichrist writing forbidden and occult and world-tumbling things for grand orchestra; pulling the white beard of divinity with his harmonies; initiating his audiences into satanic and wicked philosophies through tone; stirring hell-kitchen cauldrons in his fast-playing band. The very thought of the programmes of his symphonic poems made one dizzy. He proposed to set one in the boots of an archrogue; to make one experience death; dance with Nietzsche the monster-philosopher; collide as superman with the cosmic riddle; step over the prostrate crowds in the stride of the hero; lift the curtain of the alcove where married people sleep. It was like nothing so much as flying off the battlements of the tower of Babel to pursue vain war with Heaven. One knew what Huneker meant when he wrote that Strauss composed "with the pen of beyond good and evil." One saw with delicious shudders the unforgivable in sin heave over the horizon. And in performance, the music was infinitely bewildering, infinitely exciting. It went so fast, faster even than Wagner. Violins spiralled into the deeps of the firmament. The sound stepped out and stunned you.

You could never rest quite sure as to what was supposed to be happening; whether Till was upsetting the apple-carts of the market-women or making a long nose at the professors or hearing the judge pronounce sentence against him; whether Don Juan was making love to the Countess or to Anna or to Zerlinchen; whether the orchestra was painting the infancy, adolescence, or old age of the dying man. Was that religion, or was it science that was being discarded by humanity in its attempt to reconcile inhuman nature with man's metaphysical mind? Was the hero writing now "Tod und Verklärung" or "Traum durch die Dämmerung"; was the uncle saying "Just like mamma"; was the clock striking seven in the evening or seven in the morning? Were Herr and Frau Doktor Strauss connubially embracing, or were they throwing the breakfast-dishes at each other's head, or presaging their youngster's grandiose future? Positive one could never be. And when one did succeed in following the programme, sonorous and brilliant passages set everything in one glittering and chiming. The plangent trumpets in the finale of "Don Quixote" were the voice of lashing, howling, mocking disillusion. That was the iron tread of the hero as he strode over Europe, with the swing of Rodin's walking man. That was the sun on the banging tympani of "Zarathustra." The singing horns and violins of Don Juan's feast painted the scene one intended some day to live.

Strauss still remains a great musician but in a restricted sense of the word. The tone-poems of this child of Munich are marvelous things—for the ear only. Little has been written for orchestra that can match these rich-sounding works in pure sonority. They are fantasias of orchestral language of a brilliance that still overwhelms. It is doubtful whether any composer has better understood the instruments of the band; has had a more voluptuous feeling for the voices of brass and strings, the windy beauty of the horns, the velvet of reeds; revelled more luxuriously in these bright, high-pitched sounds. It is doubtful whether anyone has had a nicer sense of the purely orchestral possibilities, of the general range of the instruments, of the beautiful tapestry-like interplay of these sonorities. He has written passage upon passage of marvelous networks of timbres and colors, rich, savorous and dense. The great, many-stranded middle section of the Sinfonia; the shimmering, high-fluted introduction to what Mr. Deems Taylor has so cutely called the Uebermenschenwalzer; the poisonously entrancing reeds in the dance of the Seven Veils bewitch us over and over again with their sheer iridescent loveliness. It is a marvelous sensuality this man possesses; a virtuosic gift for orchestration like that of D'Annunzio for prose.

Following Page

In this many-hued stream of sound, you bathe as you might bathe in a river of perfumed vapor. You issue from it neither touched nor warmed nor refreshed. The music of Strauss has very little to give the mind. You cannot listen to this music and be moved. Life is somehow not strongly in it. It stirs nothing deep in you. It nourishes no high tremulous sense of beauty. There is a sort of lusty abundance in some of it, in "Don Juan" particularly; but this, too, wears a curiously fictitious look. For, though Strauss has a marvelous sensuous gift, his gift remains a superficial thing. In spite of his wizard-like control over the means of expression he has very few striking ideas. His thematic material wants distinction, wants quality. There is something always a little common, a little wanting in edge and incisiveness, in his melodic line. It is Strauss to some degree; but it is also a little everybody's music. . . . To be sure, Strauss manages to clothe these plebeian generalities in most magnificent dress; to press out of them, thanks to his amazing contrapuntal technique, the last drop of emotional possibility which they contain. But one is always conscious that the musical table is loaded with foods and flagons of doubtful quality.

Moreover, the greater number of Strauss's tone-poems want form. With the exception of "Tod und Verklärung" and perhaps "Till Eulenspiegel," they seem fragmentary; he wanders through the greater number of his songs, too. No great inner structure carries them taut from commencement to finish. Rather more, they seem a series of short breaths arbitrarily riveted together. The bow was not taut when this man set out to compose "Zarathustra" or "Don Quixote" or "Ein Heldenleben." The music begins with triumphant impulse. But before many minutes have elapsed, one gets the sense that Strauss did not have any strong feeling of the direction in which he was going when he set out so bravely; and that the extension of the form is the result only of a secondary conception. Handsome passages do ensue—the vigil in "Don Quixote," the love-scene and the brave return of the original theme in "Ein Heldenleben"; the marvelously densely woven middle-section in the "Sinfonia Domestica." But as soon as these are over, the musical Sahara returns. And at the conclusion, we have the baffled sense of having heard a number of not clearly connected fragments, not the great inner satisfaction that comes through having been moved through this matter in an unbroken course. . . .

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

Apr. 12 6

The Boston Pops will open their thirty-ninth season Monday evening, May 5, at the Boston Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia will conduct the orchestra of symphony players in popular programs.

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Music News and Reviews

Twenty-third Program of the Boston Symphony

The program of the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Mozart..Symphony in C major (K. No. 200)
Tschaikowsky.....Concerto for Violin
Strauss....."Symphonia Domestica"

Efrem Zimbalist was the soloist.

This was the second performance of the "Symphonia Domestica" this season. It is quite possible to understand Mr. Monteux's desire to conduct it a second time before his departure, for its preparation was a difficult task even for so accomplished an orchestra as the Boston Symphony.

The impression made by this work is a curious one. Within a few short years our attitude toward German music has so completely changed that now perhaps for the first time are we able to hear it as it really is, without prejudice. During the long régime of German conductors, an undue emphasis was placed on the music of their compatriots, particularly on that of Strauss. The Bostonian musical public came to regard his series of inflated and bombastic tone poems as a new gospel in music, whereas in reality the new developments in the art were coming from France and, later, spurred on by the French Renaissance, from Russia. Thus a fictitious sanctity came to surround the productions of this supposedly arch evangel, and the music of Debussy and his disciples was only occasionally heard in semicontemptuous performance.

But time has changed all this and although we, here in Boston, are somewhat late in attaining the proper perspective in regard to modern tendencies and even now and again revert to our former attitude, we are at least beginning to understand.

Now no one will deny the many interesting qualities of Strauss' music and this "Symphonia Domestica," although not one of his best works, will still serve as an excellent example of them all. Although often unduly prolix, it may truthfully be said that there is scarcely a page on which is not to be found some clever orchestral effect or some other technical device which at least excites our admiration if not our emotions.

But again, it is not possible to hear this music without realizing that at bottom it is essentially commonplace, the work of a supreme master of the technic of composition, but one who employs his marvelous art without regard for the canons of good taste. Thematic material, harmonies, even the orchestration, remarkable as it is, are the work of a super-chef de musique militaire. And now, as we are able to judge more calmly of this music, we find that it contains little, if anything, which represents progress along harmonic lines, and when all is said and done it is difficult to admit that even in the matter of orchestration the composer has achieved much in advance of Wagner, save in the matter of almost overwhelming noise. The symphony was given a stirring performance, one in which orchestra and conductor fairly outdid themselves.

Mr. Zimbalist played Tschaikowsky's Concerto in a manner which may only be described as masterly. This is music which may easily become commonplace. Mr. Zimbalist, with the greatest art, carefully concealed the defects of this somewhat worn and never particularly distinguished composition and made of it a thing of beauty. Perhaps no greater tribute than this can be paid Mr. Zimbalist or any other virtuoso. Some music plays itself and even bad playing will not rob it of its effectiveness. The greatness of an artist shows forth best when he undertakes music like this concerto in which he is obliged to conceal its weaknesses under the cloak of his musicianship. Mr. Zimbalist is first and always a musician of taste, refinement and intelligence. How few there are of his kind and what a pleasure to welcome him once again! S. M.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past five years, will direct his final concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Within a few days he will return to his home in Paris.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SYMPHONY GIVES 23D CONCERT

Mozart's C Major Work Feature, Played for First Time in Boston

FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. 200)—first time in Boston, Tchaikovsky, violin concerto (Mr. Zimbalist, violinist); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Although the performance of Strauss's description of his family life—with frequent exhibitions of harassing domesticity—was a gorgeous one; although Mr. Zimbalist gave a most musical and engrossing interpretation of Tchaikovsky's long winded concerto of uneven worth, the great feature of the concert was Mozart's symphony and not simply because it was played here for the first time.

Mozart wrote it probably in his 17th year, yet the music shows few, if any, evidences of immaturity. There are, of course, certain formulas of that decade; but the melodic spontaneity and freshness, the ease that is almost artistic carelessness, the haunting beauty slightly tinged with melancholy and for that reason all the more beautiful, the sparkle and the dash—these are of the later Mozart when he was at his height. No doubt, as Wyzewa and Saint-Foix suggest, or rather argue, in their monumental study of Mozart's earlier works, the music he heard in Vienna during a short sojourn—Haydn's quartets and the Viennese light operas—influenced the young man after he had become in danger of being Italianized; but this influence was exerted on one ready to accept it, yet self-sufficient in his own invention and expression.

Truly, a delightful symphony, and it was played with incomparable delicacy, grace, euphony and spirit.

Hanslick's volumes of collected reviews and essays are many. It is possible that in the days to come he will be remembered only by the fact that he said, apropos of Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, that it stank in the ear. Even here he was not original. Vischer was before him in saying that certain pictures stank in the eye. In spite of Hanslick's dictum, the concerto still lives in spite of its obvious faults: its endless repetitions, its measures of sheer padding. Why cannot some one arrange "Gems from Tchaikovsky's Concerto" after the manner of various anthologies (including "Crumbs of Comfort.") Long-winded, tedious at times as it is, the concerto by reason of melodic charm and demoniacal spirit is still heard by the people gladly, especially when it is performed by a violinist who displays, as Mr. Zimbalist, tonal beauty, freedom in the interpretation, and the requisite exciting spirit. The concerto is long enough, however, without the introduction of a seemingly interminable cadenza, interesting only as a means for technical display.

The Symphonia Domestica was heard here last December. It is not necessary at this late day to speak of it at length. There are pages of pure gold, pages of quiet, also of overwhelming, beauty; there are other pages, and they are many, that are bombastic and insignificant, showing routine rather than genuine invention. The performance itself was well worth a journey.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts, the last of a memorable season, is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, C minor, No. 5; Carpenter, Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
TIMES
B
APR 26 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the 1924-'25 season of concerts in New York City Thursday evening, November 27.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO BE MONTEUX FAREWELL

A splendid program will mark the farewell of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the closing concert of the season here, next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, at 8:15 p. m. The appearance as soloist of John Charles Thomas, the popular American baritone will likewise add to the interest of the program. It will also include Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, one of the most popular in the repertory, of which the themes were inspired by the Spirituals of the American Negro, which the Bohemian composer closely studied during his sojourn in this country. There will also be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's Overture to Tannhauser. John Charles Thomas, who has been conspicuously successful in his concert appearances of the last three seasons, will on this ocasion make his first appearance with the orchestra. He will sing the prologue to "Pagliacci," and Massenet's Air, "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade."

Pierre Monteux will conclude his season and his fifth year term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston, next Friday and Saturday. Providence has been quick to appreciate his superlative qualities as an orchestral leader and as an inspired interpreter, both of the old masters and the music of our own day. It has been many times said, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never attained a higher degree of excellence, than under his command.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

NEW MOZART WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Symphony in C Major for First Time Here

The only novelty at yesterday's Symphony concert was, rather curiously, a symphony in C major by Mozart, numbered in Koechel's Thematic Catalogue "200." It is supposed to have been composed in 1774, when Mozart was a boy of 18. Bruno Walter brought the score and parts to this country last season for the New York Symphony Society.

The sheer beauty of this music eclipsed for at least one listener the two other numbers on the program, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, suavely played by Zimbalist, and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," repeated from earlier in the present season for no apparent reason, since it is not a novelty here and has not roused especial enthusiasm

The first movement of Mozart's symphony is not remarkable, though it has the inimitable and indescribable quality that pervades all his music. Nobody else has ever written music really Mozartean, as so many have contrived to echo Beethoven and Wagner. The slow movement has a beautiful theme, of which one is given no chance to weary. The minuet is an anticipation of that in the better known symphony in the same key, the "Jupiter." The finale is also a little masterpiece. How a symphony containing two such remarkable movements can have been overlooked in a city which has heard almost every significant piece ever composed and endless insignificant pieces is a mystery.

Mr Monteux conducted minuet and finale with zest, but as though they were by Haydn. But Mozart is the most difficult composer to perform, since in his music every nuance must be exactly rendered.

Tchaikovsky's concerto has a brilliant, if superficial, first movement, which Mr Monteux and the orchestra interpreted brilliantly, though Mr Zimbalist sacrificed incisive dynamics to purity and beauty of tone. His violin is said to have cost him $33,000. He certainly does justice to Stradivarius in the polish and suavity of his playing. But it lacks fire. The rest of his concerto is full of tiresome and inept repetition of short folk-song phrases.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is straightforward, rather clumsy, and very German music, with an abuse of full orchestra. The themes in it are less striking than the best of those in "Don Juan" and "Till Euelenspiegel." One does not find them going through one's head after the concert. The ponderous sentimentality of the program notes by German commentators on this symphony is amusing. The music can luckily be understood and enjoyed without worrying over how the baby took its bath and whether the man in the home ever lost his temper. One suspects Strauss of wishing sardonically to reduce program music to an absurdity.

Mr Monteux gave an excellent interpretation of Strauss' music. One of his good points has always been a complete imperviousness to parochialism and propaganda about music. He has always made his programs from the best music of all schools and all Nations, without reference to the late war or to any other non-musical matter.

His catholicity of taste in contemporary music is very unusual. After hearing him conduct for five years one cannot determine from either his choice of programs or his performances whether he is an especial admirer of any living composer or an enemy of any. He has played them all, and played them sympathetically, German and French, Russian and English alike.

One does not ever know with which clique in clique-ridden musical Paris Monteux aligns himself. With none of them probably. He is too sane and too good-humored for the excesses of any clique.

P. R.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

ZIMBALIST PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Efrem Zimbalist, the noted violinist, played in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon as soloist in this week's pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Since his acquisition of the famous "Titian" Stradivarius, Zimbalist has added to the purity of style and unyielding artistic integrity that have made appeal to limited though discriminating audiences, a warmth and beauty of tone that are all-compelling.

With the Symphony orchestra, Zimbalist plays Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D major, that displayful piece of prodigious difficulties. Mr. Zimbalist rendered it yesterday afternoon with an utter mastery of all intricacies, with comprehensive understanding and perfection of style that amazed his audience. He was recalled many times.

Mozart's Symphony in C major, hitherto unknown to Boston, was introduced yesterday. It is a pleasing example of the less important Mozart, characterized as of brilliant elegance, though not without superficiality. Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," repeated by general request, completed the program, which will be repeated at Symphony hall tonight.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

John Charles Thomas is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony at Providence this week. He has chosen to sing "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade" and the Prologue to "Pagliacci," a choice hardly worthy musically speaking of a Symphony program.

Pittsburgh music lovers are trying to

What the Trouble Is

His list of suggestions is far from whimsical. On the contrary, the present writer, Deems Taylor of the New York World and Pitts Sanborn of the Mail have all anticipated him in this choice, except for Strauss' "Frau Ohne Schatten" and "Penelope."

The trouble, as Deems Taylor lately said in the World, is that there are three possible ways of running a great musical enterprise. The first is that taken by the Boston Symphony and the other leading orchestras, of giving only the very best music in the best possible performance, with the certainty of a large deficit. The second is that taken by the theatres in this country, with a few honorable exceptions like the Theatre Guild in New York and the Jewett Players here, of producing only those things from which a large profit can be hoped. The third is a compromise, followed by both the Metropolitan and Chicago Operas, of giving the public opera as good as it is willing to support liberally at the box office so that the deficit will be small.

Imagine the Boston Symphony run on this principle, as it easily might be, and you will see the artistic deficiencies. The Symphony would be playing in a big and totally unsuitable place like Mechanic's Building, with the Pops repertory instead of that of the regular concerts. The Pops are what the public will pay for. The regular concerts are what it ought, ideally speaking, to have. Once and a while single movements of symphonies by Beethoven would be given, but seldom any Mozart and never any Haydn. Massenet and Arthur Sullivan and Tschaikowsky would replace Debussy and Strauss and Stravinsky.

The big financial difficulty is the wages paid certain singers and those required for stage hands and orchestra and chorus. Without these and the often inflated salaries of the management opera would show a profit in Boston.

It ought to be possible to reduce the prima donna's wages, but will not be so long as the unthinking part of the public is likely to go to see Mary Garden or Jeritza and not to hear "Pelleas" or "Lohengrin."

But if this were really a musical Nation the Government or the millionaires who give surplus funds to charity would willingly meet any deficit in producing opera on the best scale. Meanwhile if Maj. Higginson had not set the fashion so wisely and so well one wonders what we should be doing for orchestras. Neither London nor Paris now has anything at all comparable to the best of our orchestras.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MANY MEN, MANY MINDS

A Word About Conductors' Ways with Stravinsky's Music

THE test of a composer, it seems, is not so much whether he can refute his critics as whether he can survive his interpreters. Both Beethoven and his "Fourth Symphony," for instance, have long outlived that contemporary who wrote that in this music Beethoven "is extremely bizarre and makes himself unintelligible and an object of terror to even cultivated dilettanti." And Stravinsky continues to be played, in spite of an indignant "opposition." On the other hand [writes Henrietta Strauss in The New York Nation], one can recall recent occasions when a wave of the baton has proved more fatal to either of these composers than any gesture of protest; when Beethoven has become again an "object of terror" and Stravinsky almost "unintelligible." With Beethoven, at least, there is the safeguard of familiarity. But when, as happened last winter, five pieces by Stravinsky receive their first hearing in New York from five different conductors, and each conductor presents the composer from an entirely different angle, then to find the true Stravinsky becomes more a matter of deduction than of recognition.

"The Song of the Nightingale," for example, revealed one Stravinsky under Mr. Damrosch and another under Mr. Mengelberg. This symphonic evolution of Stravinsky's opera "The Nightingale" represents that phase, rather than period, of the composer which, in conciseness and elimination, delicacy yet brilliancy of effect, bears a curious kinship to the Japanese art of the brush. As Mr. Damrosch's treatment adhered more closely to this interpretation than the heavy reading of Mr. Mengelberg, and as his "Nightingale" happily had Mr. Barrère to sing its rapture on the flute, one can only feel that Mr. Damrosch's bird bore more resemblance to the real one and Mr. Mengelberg's to its glittering, jewelled rival.

Again, Mr. Monteux's performance of "The Rite of Spring" differed quite radically in conception from that which Eugene Goossens gave when he introduced it to London, four years ago. Where Goossens made this music literally a ritual of barbaric frenzy and elemental ecstasy, Mr. Monteux marked it with a fine restraint, in which heavy, decorous rhythms were substituted for the dynamic vitality of Goossens's beat. Stravinsky, however, was present at the latter's performance, and gave it his unqualified approval. And so, while Mr. Monteux's version was interesting and brought out the superb virtuosity of his orchestra, it must be considered from an interpretative standpoint as inaccurate.

Stravinsky, indeed, is an invaluable auditor, for he does not hesitate to repudiate what is spurious, even when the conductor is a Koussevitzky. This he did when the latter introduced in London his Symphonies for Wind Instruments and presented merely the notes, without either coördination or subordination of the voices. If one may use such a performance as a precedent, then one may legitimately reject that of "The Story of the Soldier," which Chalmers Clifton presented for the League of Composers, and in which he displayed a similar looseness of ends. This piece is a satirical suite on the adventures of a penniless soldier marching home on a two-weeks' furlough. It contains many rhythmic episodes, including marches, a tango, a waltz, and even rag-time. Such episodes should, of course, be irresistible; but so indeterminate was Mr. Clifton's beat and so vague his musical purpose that no soldier ever danced or marched to less alluring sounds.

Koussevitzky was excused on the ground that those who play Skriabin well cannot do Stravinsky, and Koussevitzky is, undoubtedly, magnificent with Skriabin. Whether this can be applied to Mr. Clifton I do not know. Yet it is a poor idea at best, for there is Stokowski, who not only has the fluid and sensuous emotionalism that Skriabin requires, but also the sensitiveness to sonorities and the dynamic, mechanical rhythm that Stravinsky practically demands. Stokowski, indeed, seems to be the one conductor here on whose interpretations of Stravinsky one can rely. He made, as far as was possible, a success of the same Symphonies for Wind Instruments with which Koussevitzky had failed—they are uninteresting at best. And he created a veritable sensation with Stravinsky's "Fox," which he prepared and conducted for the International Composers' Guild. This delicious burlesque of a Russian fairy tale was by the same ironical Stravinsky of "The Soldier," but it proved infinitely more amusing than the latter. This might not have been so had "The Soldier" been presented in its entirety and with the same perfection of detail and understanding. As it is, one cannot but wonder whether there is not danger that the patient may die while doctors disagree.

* Miss Strauss forgets that when "The Rite of Spring" was a new piece of the theatre ten years ago in Paris, Mr. Monteux, then chief conductor of Diaghylev's Russian Ballet, prepared the original performances, with the guilding and counselling composer incessantly at his elbow; and that the conductor's present version of "Le Sacre" embodies exactly the composer's first will with it. Miss Strauss errs again in the objection that Stravinsky raised to Koussevitzky's performance in London of the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments." The composer then complained because the conductor "presented merely notes," but because he did not do so, rather to give the music poetized emotional voice.

H. T.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

41

SYMPHONY 151 YEARS OLD HEARD

Strauss' "Domestica" Dominates Concert, However

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three pieces sufficed to make the programme of the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon: a youthful symphony of Mozart, hitherto unheard here; Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Efrem Zimbalist as the soloist; and finally the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

INTEREST IN STRAUSS

When Mr. Monteux revived the "Domestica" last December it had gone unplayed at the Syphmony Concerts for more than a decade, and he is to be thanked for repeating it ere the season was done. A score of years have passed since the first performance of the "Domestica," in Carnegie Hall, in New York, with Strauss conducting—and its place in music is not yet fixed.

No longer may the "Domestica" be deemed formidable and unintelligible, no longer is the listener apt to be discomfited by Strauss' ingenuous programme or his possible breaches of good taste. But so at variance are contemporary musical ways with Strauss' whole technical scheme, his obvious programme, his inflated orchestra, his motives that now and then skirt the commonplace, his adherence to outmoded methods of thematic development, that many now casually dismiss the piece, with other of its composer's creations, as "old hat."

Strauss at His Zenith

But whether or not such procedures are valid for the composer of today, surely they were legitimate, even logical means of expression at the time when Strauss employed them. Indeed, the best argument against their present-day continuance is the fact that he carried them to their utmost reasonable limit. To go beyond him were to pile Pelion upon Ossa, to imitate him were mere futility. Yet the fact remains that as the last of Strauss' symphonic poems, the negligible "Alpine Symphony" excepted, the "Domestica" may well be regarded as the apogee of 19th century musical romanticism.

Here is fitting crown to the labors of Berlioz, Liszt, Saint-Saens and countless others, not to mention the Strauss of the earlier tone-poems. Only in "Ein Heldenleben" had Strauss previously written on so vast a scale, and that vainglorious piece of autobiography has neither the "Domestica's" firmness of texture nor its richness of invention.

Lofty and Ideal

Nor has Strauss elsewhere written in so lofty, so idealistic a vein, the objections of his detractors and the regrettable incident of the baby's bath to the contrary notwithstanding. And nowhere, it is possible to feel, has he been to the same degree at once the master-craftsman of sheer music, the wielder of stupendous polyphony, the prodigious orchestrator and the inspired tone-poet of that which is noblest, deepest and most persuasive in human nature.

In the "Domestica" comes pages that for idyllic loveliness have scarcely their equal in the whole of music, and pages filled to bursting with the exuberance that is the joy of living. And here may be found an expression of passion wholly removed from sensuality, and of that tenderness which only the strongest may utter.

Monteux Unfolds Its Beauties

When first he conducted the "Domestica" here, although the performance was in many ways an admirable one Mr. Monteux was, in a sense, making his own acquaintance with the music. The performance of yesterday, on the other hand, had naught of tentativeness; it was one of supreme eloquence and excellence, as notable for Mr. Monteux's penetration of the composer's plan and purpose, for his revelation of all that Strauss would say, as for the incessant euphony and the amazing technical brilliancy of the orchestra's playing.

Far removed from the excitements and, if you will, the excesses of Strauss was Mozart's little Symphony, composed in his 18th year, and as fresh today as on that far-off November of 1773 when he set the date upon his manuscript. Written concisely for an orchestra that numbers only strings and a pair each of oboes, horns and bassoons, the Symphony is in Mozart's most engaging but not his most accomplished manner. Its melodies arrest the ear, its orchestration, all things considered, reveals surprising variety of color and effect, while

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

42

Announcements of church musical programmes or other events of general musical interest intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to Music Editor. The Sunday Journal, and should reach this office before Friday noon.

Final Appearance in Providence of Pierre Monteux, Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Week's Event of Widest Interest. Two Concerts To-day.

The final appearance in Providence, and nearly the final in America, of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the week's event of widest musical interest. Mr. Monteux, whose reputation as a programme maker has become firmly established in this country, has chosen for his farewell here on Tuesday evening Dvorak's fifth symphony, "From the New World." The concert will close, as will the final one in Boston on the following Saturday, with Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." The other instrumental number will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." As the soloist of the evening, John Charles Thomas, baritone, will make his first appearance with this orchestra. He will sing, with the orchestra, the prologue to "Pagliacci," and Massenet's air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."

John Charles Thomas
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Tuesday

Mrs. Mae Stockwell Hiller
Contralto Who Will Sing at Monday Morning Musical Club Concert Wednesday Night.

This week concludes Mr. Monteux's five-year term as conductor of the orchestra, and he returns to France. The period is a long one in the annals of the organization—only those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck having equalled it. There have been several remarkable features in his farewell season, such as his introduction to New York and Boston of Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre Du Printemps," which, although ultra-radical and called the most important musical innovation of our century, was a distinct success and had to be repeated in each city in response to requests. Mr. Monteux's recent performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was called one of the finest performances of this masterpiece ever given in Boston.

In the past five years his programmes have traversed the entire range of the symphonic repertory, neither slighting nor favoring any epoch or any national school. A review of the symphonies performed in Providence in this period reveal his care to proportion. Of Beethoven, the Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7 were played; of Schubert, the B-minor and C-major Symphonies; of Schumann, the 1st and 4th; of Brahms, the 1st and 4th; of Mozart, the E-flat and Jupiter Symphonies; of Tchaikovsky, the 5th and 6th; there were also single Symphonies of Franck, Dvorak, d'Indy and Sibelius.

Mr. Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He was first prominent in his youthful days in Paris, his native city, where he took part in several chamber music ensembles. He soon found his true vocation as a conductor, and became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras there; also at the Opera, and at his own "Monteux Concerts" at the Paris Casino on Sunday afternoons, where he championed some bold new music, which aroused demonstrations and counter demonstrations in the audience.

He toured Europe four years as head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Hence he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1919.

Pierre Monteux has made a precedent in the Boston Symphony concerts and in the symphony concerts of America, which will be remembered long after he returns to his own country. His programmes have been probably unexampled in freedom from routine, in keen espousal of every national school, and in discriminate championship of the newer music still to be recognized.

Pierre Monteux
Latest Photograph of Noted Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Photo by J. E. Purdy & Co.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

FAREWELL OF PIERRE MONTEUX.

A remarkably fine program will mark the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season here next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15 p. m., which will also be the final appearance of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the orchestra in Providence.

The principal number will be Dvorak's popular symphony from "The New World," which was the result of the famous Bohemian's sojourn in America and his study of the folk music of the American negro. It is particularly famous for the fine melody of the largo, which is sung by the English horn solo. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the verses of Mallarme, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." The soloist of the evening will be John Charles Thomas, the popular American baritone, who in his recent concert tjours has been compared favorably with the greatest baritones of the day, particularly as regards sheer beauty of tone. He will sing with the orchestra the prologue to "Pagliacci," and Massenet's air, "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade."

Pierre Monteux will conclude his season and his fifth year term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Providence has been quick to appreciate his superlative qualities as an orchestral leader and as an inspired interpreter, both of the old masters and the music of our own day. It has been many times said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never attained a higher degree of excellence than under his command.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

Mr Monteux takes leave of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's concerts. The writer, as readers of the Globe's Symphony reviews will not need to be told, has not been a fervent admirer of his conducting. Yet his modesty, sincerity, well-schooled musicianship and ingratiating personality have made him popular as a person even with those who d.slike his conducting of many great classics. Boston owes him a real and great debt for the patient skill with which he has restored an orchestra twice woefully shattered to something approaching its pre-war glories. His term of office has not been without great vicissitudes. No other conductor has ever had so many difficult situations to meet as Monteux. He has come through with an honorable degree of success and a large share of public and private regard. There have been numerous achievements in the performance of certain works, Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," Strauss' "Till," Rimsk [illegible] "Scheherezade" among them. At his best Monteux is a really great conductor. His future plans are not yet announced, but one doubts whether in all Boston there is a man who bears him real ill will so that he does not join in wishing Monteux good fortune whatever he may undertake.

The Paulist Choristers, to be heard at

A novelty was introduced by the Boston Symphony under M. Pierre Monteux, Edward Burlingham Hill's second suite of "Stevensoniana." The Boston Transcript said it was a "surprising revelation of new powers and new freedoms in the composer. Mr. Hill has found imaginative promptings in Stevenson's verses, and has written with exceeding choiceness and aptness of mood and means."

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

A review written by Ernest Newman in The Sunday Times of London gives his impressions of Serge Kusevitsky, who will be at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, as a conductor. Mr. Newman, who has long admired Mr. Kusevitsky, heard him lead the London Symphony Orchestra in Strauss's "Don Juan," Brahms's Fourth Symphony and other numbers and said:

Kusevitsky's tempi in "Don Juan" struck every one as much slower than the normal. The explanation probably is that Kusevitsky, consciously or unconsciously, dramatizes the women in the symphonic poem; that is to say, instead of showing us the Countess and Donna Anna in Strauss's description of them, he makes them speak in their own persons. They become stage characters and employ, in order to reveal their emotions fully to the audience, all the conscious art of the singer, drawing the last ounce of the expressiveness out of their phrases. This concentration on themselves, as it were, necessarily makes them adopt a slower pace than a conductor who is only concerned with an external description of them would allow them. It is true, then, that these sections were taken so slowly as to put the piece as a whole a little out of shape, but we were compensated by the exceptional beauty and poignancy of the music for the Countess and Donna Anna—a beauty and a poignancy that managed to make themselves felt even through the poor playing of the orchestra. Equally remarkable, in another way, was the fire of the characteristic music of the Don.

It was probably the orchestra's difficulty in adapting its pre-established notions to the novel tempi of Kusevitsky that made it play so badly. It might have been a completely different orchestra that, later in the evening, gave us so magnificent a performance of Brahm's Fourth Symphony. Kusevitsky achieved the miracle of proving that Brahm's melodic line can be inflected with the utmost delicacy without losing any forthright strength. The blend of power and tenderness in the slow movement was particularly moving; while in the third movement the slight ungainliness of fait that is the very essence of the music here was preserved in spite of the unusual vivacity of the phrasing. And in the finale Kusevitsky, without doing any damage to the grand structural lines of the movement, gave each of the variations an unusually well-defined physiognomy of its own. Altogether, the performance, though departing in many points from what the true-blue Braham would regard as "the Brahms tradition," was as remarkable a one I have ever heard of the music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

New Russian Leader for The Boston Orchestra

There seems to be an impression in America that Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who is to come to America next autumn to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an exclusive modernist as a programme maker.

This impression has probably arisen from the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky is the founder and head of a musical publishing firm in Russia, devoted to the principal worthy contemporary music of Russian and other composers. Mr. Koussevitzky has always been a champion of true genius, whether of our century or another.

Nor has he favored any particular epoch or school. When he conducted his own orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd, he gave special series devoted to the masterpieces of Bach, of Beethoven, and other masters. His concert as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra last month and this, included Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini, and Tchaikovsky.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

PHILIP HALE of The Boston Herald paid eloquent tribute to Ernest Schelling's symphonic poem, "The Victory Roll," played for the first time in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the composer conducting, on April 18, in Symphony Hall:

Mr. Schelling's Fantasia is one of the most impressive musical compositions that we have heard in the concert hall for many years. It sets the nerves a-tingling. It shakes the soul.

He did not write this Fantasia merely as a lover of grim, ironic poetry, reading Alfred Noyes's vision of dead soldiers watching the dancers, unmindful of war's horrors and the sacrifice made by young and old; he himself had served gallantly; he knew what war meant. Outraged by flippancy and frivolity, by the forgetfulness of those surviving, saved for their wanton pleasures by the death of thousands and tens of thousands, he was fired to composition by the splendid savagery, the burning invective of the poet's lines.

And Mr. Schelling wrote as an accomplished musician as well as a soldier and a patriot; wrote dramatically, tragically; not with conventionally theatrical intent and emphasis, for, terribly in earnest, blazing with indignation, he yet was faithful to art; and so this Fantasia is the more impressive. Hysterical outbursts, merely melodramatic effects, would have lessened the effect that is now overwhelming.

He did not miss the opportunity given by the poet for the contrast between riotous life and the shock and the scorn of the dead, unseen spectators. There are the vivid musical pictures of marching soldiers, the tramping toward death or victory. The Dies Irae and the Scottish bagpipes are heard; all this as in a vision that might have turned the dancers to stone. And after the great climax, skillfully led up to from rolling drums, is heard a trumpeter far off, sounding "Taps," the final tribute.

No wonder that this Fantasia is dedicated "To the memory of an American soldier."

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SPRING SUNDAY SOUNDING WITH ASSORTED MUSIC

MR. MONTEUX WORKS HIS WILL ON TWO AUDIENCES

A Symphony Twice Played Without Interruption—The Flute-Players Give the Virtuosi an Inning and Produce New Pieces—The Paulist Choir Churchly and Also Commonplace—The Newcomer to "The Flonzaleys"—Professor Paine Redivivus

IT is possible to play a short symphony in Boston without pause, without interrupting applause, without too much chafing among the tardy beyond the doors of Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux did as much with his little Symphony of Mozart last Friday afternoon and repeated the exploit no less sucessfully on Saturday evening. True, twenty minutes and a little more sufficed for the piece. Even so, it was progress that the listeners should take the hint from the conductor's uplifted and staying hand, clapping not a pair of their own. For the renouncing of applause between the divisions of a symphony is quite as essential as the shortening of the pause from movement to movement. The latter wisdom indeed denies late-comers the privilege to stream into the concert-room at length and at leisure, and so may bring forth works of regret and repentance. Yet, since prompt arrival at Symphony Hall is often conditioned by the movement—so-called—of traffic in Bostonian streets, it is doubtful whether pains and penalties are altogether an offshoot of the divine justice. On the other hand, there is hardly an excuse—except as relief from admiring tension—for applause at every halt of a symphony. It distracts those who are engrossed in the music. It rends and dissipates the atmosphere by that music summoned.

Mr. Stowkowski, it is said, has so far prevailed with the public of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York that it stirs not a hand in the course of the longest symphony. Or, if some stranger does so presume, he perceives immediately his social error. Whether the congregations at Symphony Hall will ever and permanently attain to that perfection none may foretell. For once, on Friday and Saturday last, both audiences did. Yet, as the hymn says, and as between Boston and New York, "we feebly labor, they in glory shine." Indeed, in symphonies that sustain hearers at high tension, an appreciable pause between the movements seems both reasonable and desirable. If only there were no late-comers to slip the leash, and no clappers, unrestrained and unrestrainable, to break the illusion of the music! The conductors ponder this salutary discipline of the concert-hall, uncertain whether or not to try enforcement. Trustees behind them are similarly hesitant. Yet, as everyone knows, we Americans, though we will have our grumbles, are the most docile [illegible]

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

45

ZIMBALIST THRILLS, STRAUSS LAYS HOLD, MONTEUX MARSHALS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF DEEP SENSATIONS

The Violinist Excels Himself, Transfiguring Chaikovsky's Music—The "Sinfonia Domestica" with Conductor and Orchestra at Zenith—The Composer and Life—For Beginning Mozart Young, Simple, Gentle

BY anticipation the repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" bade fair to overpass all else in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. By actual experience Mr. Zimbalist's transfiguration of Chaikovsky's Concerto for Violin ran it close. Since that remembered Friday in 1915 when Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck joined hands and voices in Beethoven's Concerto, Symphony Hall has known no such playing of a piece for violin and orchestra as Mr. Monteux and Mr. Zimbalist now accomplished. From the beginning the audience was intent. Before the first movement had proceeded far, it was rapt. A hundred measures further, and he was a numb listener who did not feel the excitement around him and within himself. At the pause came the still suspensive instants in which a transported company gropes for release of emotion and finds it in a torrent of applause. As breathless was the listening through the slow song and the finale. Not a programme-leaf rustled. Again composer and conductor, violinist and orchestra, possessed every hearer. Daimonic was the word for the musicians' ending; while as fast and furious leapt the clapping. Next to the first performance of "The Rite of Spring," this playing of Chaikovsky's Concerto seemed the emotional peak of the symphonic year.

Mr. Zimbalist was an "added starter," as it were, to the "assisting artists" of the season. Though in these, his middle thirties, he should be near the noon of his powers, none of his recent concerts in Boston has quite foretold the violinist of yesterday. Nor is the chosen Concerto now counted any masterpiece in the "literature" of the fiddle. New as long ago as 1881, it made some stir in the world as music of incredible difficulty and incredible wildness. To the purists of the violin in particular and of "the tone-art" in general —as they liked to call it—the Concerto was then anathema. Now the youngsters across the aisle speak of it to each other as "one more thing" of "poor old Peter." Between these extremes it has lain in a limbo, from which the violinists occasionally pluck it, when they suspect that Beethoven or Brahms, Bruch, Lalo or Mendelssohn will no longer "do." Yet after forty years there are light and heat in this music of Chaikovsky, if only there be the violinist and the conductor to set it aglow. The melody upspringing into song from the chief theme of the first movement invites every fervor, finesse and sensibility of the player, rewarding them with beauty. The "passage-work," as the technicians name it, may be wrought into rhapsody; while the cadenza, as Mr. Zimbolist proved, can be lifted into striding, intricate, magnificent declamation.

The brief middle song flowers in a charm unsentimentalized, a grace that is not soft. Russian of origin the music may be; but to the imagination Chaikovsky and the violinist are fiddling from Arcadia. On the abusive tongues of the "conservatives" of the eighties, the finale, racing and whirling out of two folk-tunes, "stank of brutal and wretched jollity." Now, played as it was yesterday, there are few to deny its native wildness, its voice and fling of village-revel with the Moujik none the worse for a skinful of liquor and an arm around his doxy. Not many a concerto for violin will bear scrutiny as music "absolute" and self-contained. Like nearly all the others, Chaikovsky needs a liberating virtuoso, an enkindling rhapsodist.

That heaven-sent violinist was yesterday Mr. Zimbalist—cool, calm, collected, impassive even, when every nerve within him must have been tingling. His technical resources and dexterities seemed the simple, flawless means to intricate, exacting ends —and there is no more to be said. His tone was of silken texture, edgeless body, limpid flow, luminous as the day, sensitive as shadow to sunlight—and again there is no more to be said. Rather, proclaiming print may not half sound the wondrous beauty with which Mr. Zimbalist clothed the songful course of the first movement—a beauty vibrant with the sensuous voice and the penetrating tang of the violin, warm to every accent and shading of composer or violinist—the fascination of sound in lovely motion, the thrill of sound when musical and poetic impulses give it shape, pace and color. As futile is print to weave the charm of the pattern and the progress when Chaikovsky's solo-measures and Mr. Zimbalist's violin threaded the orchestral web; or to summon the passion of creation with which the violinist traversed the "passage-work"; or the splendor of his rhapsody even in a cadenza.

Yet the finely tempered as well as the ardent violinist likewise sounded—the musician who kept all the grace of the little canzonetta, but never sapped it into languor; the poet who caught all the idyllic quality, but not once smooched it with excess of sentiment. The virtuoso achieved the rhythmic exactness, the swift plasticity, the progressions "in a fine frenzy rolling" of the finale; while the rhapsodist whipped every repetition with the lash of his bow, swirled like a delirious Dionysos through music that is a rabble-rout of shifting tone. The violinist and the musician, the virtuoso and the poet, the sophisticate and the simple was Mr. Zimbalist in this Concerto. The composer gave him cue and stood transfigured. The conductor and the orchestra caught the zest, the passion; vied with the fiddler, outdid Chaikovsky; while a rapt audience quivered in the hollow of these hands. Not once in a month of blue moons may violin-playing bring such an experience. For nine years the Symphony Concerts have waited for it anew.

Thrill upon thrill leapt also from the repetition of "The Domestica." More than once since the revival of last December, Mr. Monteux has in private rehearsed or in public replayed the piece, until now, in the vernacular of the tuning-room, "he knows exactly what he wants—and gets it." Around him yesterday he had, besides, an orchestra that has warmed and waxed to the music and that he now sustains at its ancient plasticity and beauty, passion and power. Strauss himself, vowed voluptuary in orchestral tone, might have envied Mr. Monteux, the rich depths of the horns; the pulse and shimmer of the brighter strings; the flare of the trumpets; the glitter of the flutes; the thick pile of the middle voices. The tonal mass was like a bed of glowing coal with in the grate of the music; while at need from it darted the isolated instruments, each in its own quality.

With an endless flexibility and response a characterizing conductor and orchestra defined the personages, projected the moods of this intimate drama in tones. A conductor and an orchestra drenched in the sheer sensuous beauty of music, achieved the measures in the scherzo that ripple and glisten like sunlit, stirring sea. A tapestry in tones far-spread, thick-woven with instrumental gold, threaded with the passion of ardent living become the passion of ardent sound, unfolded from those middle measures, unmatched for the heights and depths of song upon all Strauss's pages. And forthwith the fire, the frenzy, the fantasy—and also the swiftness, certainty and suppleness—of conductor and orchestra through that double fugue of the joy of life. The end crowns the work. If Mr. Monteux can surpass his version of "The Domestica" yesterday with his version of the Fifth Symphony next week, God speed him!

Agree, if the listener will have it so, that the motivs of "The Domestica" do not arrest the ear and seize the imagination as do those of "A Hero-Life" or "Don Juan." Agree again that the transformations of those themes do not make the mirror of many reflections that is "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote." Agree once more that naught in this "Sinfonia" mounts to the power and sweep of the opening of "Zarathustra"; to the calm and the pang of the finale of the dying knight; to the spiritual desolation of "Death and Transfiguration" before the apotheosis ascends. Agree, finally, that as tonal structure "The Domestica" only reafirms the superb ability of Strauss to unfold, knit, sustain and unify a spacious and intricate musical and emotional design. Yet there is that in this symphony which none other of the tone-poems and little other music yields.

Nowhere else are written such measures of the deep passion of living as those which span from the scherzo to the finale. Here abide, for repetition only to intensify, the ardor of the work done because he who does it loves it, and thereby expresses himself: the ardor of the affection that stimulates and rewards this doing; the happiness—for tears or for tones—that is the fruit and crown. Thereafter in the racing, flaunting, heaven-scaling fugue, the joy and the elation, the fantasy, the frolic, even the ribaldry of this living. We dream: we strive; perhaps we achieve. We love and are loved. And then we fling out as wild and screaming and not to be stayed as this very fugue, racking the purists, maddening the moralists of "the tone-art." The learned say that music to be vital and puissant or even beautiful, must be integrated to life. Was it ever more closely bound than in this middle and this close of the "Sinfonia Domestica?"

So much for a Symphony Concert that seized the imagination and stirred the emotions as may few in many a year and with many a music. Yet there was also gentle beginning. Studious with Mozart, Mr. Bruno Walter, the eminent conductor, opened upon a day the little Symphony in C major, written in the composer's seventeenth year, when the musical world of Vienna was first dawning upon him. On neither visit to America did Mr. Walter find—or make—opportunity to play the piece. He commended it, however, to his friend, Pierre Monteux, and yesterday, from a duly diminished orchestra, it was heard for the first time in Boston. It is indeed a very gentle, modest little Symphony, shunning nearly every intricacy of sonata or symphonic form as the end of the eighteenth century knew and practised them, using the orchestra choir by choir, content with the reeds and the horns playing beneath the strings. There are lively little tunes at the smiling beginning and through the whirring end. (The eighteenth, like the twentieth century, preferred its music quick-paced.) The slow division is simplicity itself, yet not without grace of motion. The Minuet, strangely, seems more studious, ample, formal. Here and there the ear detects the charm of workmanship, the radiant surfaces, the playful fancy it is now the custom to call Mozartean. It also discovers that in the Vienna of 1773 as well as in the Vienna of 1924 there were capital operetta-tunes.

H. T. P.

GOVERNOR REMOVES HEAD

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Stravinsky and Psychoanalysis

To the Editor of The New York Times:

This is written in response to your criticism of the Boston Symphony's performance of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring." The music is, perhaps, too primitive. But it is not imitative; it is psychologically a representation of the past, as if we were not to live, but to review our past in a conscious way. Stravinsky did not so much say, "Come, we are savages!" as he says, "Come, we were once savages; let us see how it was, we intellectual people!" He says: "This is not the music we played but how we felt." It is a difficult thing, especially for such as have been brought up to moral ideas of religion and other things, and for such as would (if they could understand it at all) undoubtedly oppose the recent investigations of Freud, Jung, Abraham and all the rest, to understand. Stravinsky tries to do the "psychoanalytic," to draw the thing out of the unconscious, especially of such people as I have mentioned. Any one who has followed the course of "psychoanalysis" and the violent revulsions it has caused, will perhaps understand why certain patrons and patronesses, and certain musicians, were leaving the hall before the end of the piece. It was too painful to be introduced to the grinning skeleton and the old anatomical things that had seemed all concealed, and dropped, tacitly, so long from social recognition that they seemed non-existent; and to face the fact that there is still a lot left in us that is not quite so nice as would appear from the outside. We dance no "Rites of Spring," now, but we have our own dances. The "Rites of Spring" is only a further proof that dancing is sex, and no dancing is, properly speaking, a moral thing. Let Stravinsky not despair, at any rate he will not be done to death by premature and popular praise. For myself I should like to now hear the piece many many times before forming any fixed opinion.

B. G.

Franklin, Mass., April 20, 1924.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF

Pierre Monteux finished his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. He took hold of the orchestra after it was disorganized by a strike and has welded it into something approaching its pristine skill. Mr. Monteux will return to France and during the summer will direct a symphony orchestra in popular concerts at a Belgian watering place.

m The ____

AUSTIN, TEX.

Pierre Monteux appeared Saturday afternoon in a farewell as conductor of the Boston Symphony series in New York. He will finish soon his duties with the Boston organization. For five years Mr. Monteux has wielded the baton for his band of musicians and his work has been of sterling type.

"Those who plumb sufficiently beneath the surface of things to get at the real substance are aware of the musicianship of Pierre Monteux and his sincerity. His is a gentle nature. His demeanor while conducting is restrained, and perhaps on that account New Yorkers have been somewhat slow in estimating his abilities at their true worth. Experts who watched the upbuilding of the Boston Symphony after its disintegration some years ago, realize the work Mr. Monteux accomplished. It is now one of the foremost orchestras in personnel and playing efficiency. Mr. Monteux's part in this upbuilding was conspicuous. We salute and extend every good wish for his future."—Musical Digest.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

MONTEUX HERE IN LAST CONCERT WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony in E-Minor Principal Number in Fine Program

Pierre Monteux closed his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence last night in one of the most brilliant concerts Infantry Hall has known in its long history of this world famous musical organization—to return, within a short time to his native Paris. He will be succeeded next fall by Serge Koussevitsky. His closing program will be long remembered and his conductorship of the orchestra will go down in the history of American music as an epoch which marked the rise again of the Boston Symphony to a rank second to none in the United States if indeed in the world. Such has been his musicianship, combined with a broad human understanding and a keen ability in the selection of programmes, that his audiences have enjoyed a wide range of freedom in choice of composers and subjects.

Dvorak's "New World Symphony" in E-minor was the principal number, and John C. Thomas, tenor, was the soloist. During the intermission a large size replica in bronze of a mounted Indian warrior "Invoking the Great Spirit" was presented to M. Monteux as a token of esteem by Providence music lovers. Coming after the Dvorak number it seemed particularly appropriate.

The "New World" symphony has been variously interpreted, but the best conception of the theme perhaps, is found in that which describes it as voicing the appeal of a primitive race struggling upwards toward the light and the freedom which the North American continent has given to them. It is more typical in construction of the embodiment of the negro spirituales than of the Indian predecessors of the whites or the blacks in this country, and probably was so intended by Dvorak. Throughout its brilliantly scored four parts there runs the repeated strumming of the religious plea of the African. It is a noble conception, perhaps not truly the American musical epic, but certainly a most fascinating interpretation of a powerful impulse surging within the new nation.

Mr. Thomas sang the prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" with fine vigor and dignity; and Massenet's "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade" with feeling and sympathetic interpretation. His voice is full, rich, powerful, and his enunciation is clear, his command of range technically at a high level. He was recalled for applause several times for each number.

"Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is a light and fantastic interpretation of the reveries of a woodland sprite the day after a wild and sensuous escapade. It was played with the delicate shadings of color brought out in sharp and pleasing relief. Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser," stately, almost religious in theme, vigorous, powerful in climax, was played with almost the idea of a benediction, combining the reverent, the reminiscent and the victorious, a wholly fitting close to Mr. Monteux's pleasing seasons.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

"New World" Symphony Featured in Mr. Monteux's Last Providence Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

More than mere musical interest attaches to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, since on that occasion Mr. Monteux makes his farewell appearance in Providence.

At the close of the present season Mr. Monteux returns to France, and his subsequent plans are not yet known. A kindly, modest man, an excellent musician of the widest possible sympathies and tastes, and a conductor of exceptional ability, Mr. Monteux will leave in Boston, and in every other city where the orchestra has played, a host of admirers and well-wishers.

Nor has Mr. Monteux earned the esteem of the orchestra's various publics alone through his admirable programme-making and conducting: in a sense Boston owes to him its orchestra's very existence. At the time of the now almost forgotten "strike," when a full third of the orchestra's members abruptly left its ranks, Mr. Monteux continued as best he might the concerts both in Boston and out of town, gradually replenishing and rehabilitating the shattered band, until by another autumn it was fairly restored to its former excellence. And he has since quietly and steadily continued his work of improving the general efficiency of that orchestra until to-day, due in no small measure to his efforts, it stands with scarcely a peer in this country or abroad.

For this final concert in Providence, Mr. Monteux has selected a programme of familiar, well-liked music. With the single exception of one of John Charles Thomas's solo numbers, the Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci," it has in fact all been played in this city during the five years in which Mr. Monteux has been conductor of the Boston Symphony: the principal item, Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, was played here in the spring of 1920, the Overture to "Tannhauser" a year later, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" in February, 1922, and Mr. Thomas's second piece, the air "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's opera, "Herodiade," was sung by Reinald Werrenrath at a Boston Symphony concert two years earlier.

The origin of the "New World" Symphony must by this time be well known to most music lovers, yet it will no doubt bear retelling. In the three years (1892-95) during which the eminent Bohemian composer was director of the National Conservatory in New York, he became convinced that the American composer should make use of the folk-song material that was readiest at hand: namely, that of the Southern Negroes. And to point his moral he himself composed a symphony, a string quartet, and a string quintet, in which such melodies, or rather melodies conceived in imitation of them, were employed. It was not Dvorak's belief that the music of the Negro particularly expressed the nature and the aspiration of the American people, but as one who had used liberally the folk-songs of his own Bohemia he felt, and perhaps rightly, that all true music should have its roots in the soil; and between one form of folk-music and another he drew no sharp distinctions. Indeed, in this Symphony, "From the New World" those themes which were intended to have a Negroid cast might well be the production of any primitive people, and moreover there is here no mistaking the expression of the buoyancy and the impulse which Dvorak found characteristic of the American people. Aside from the intrinsic appeal of the music it is this latter aspect of it that matters most to us, that for us gives the music its greater significance.

After an introductory Adagio the chief theme of the first movement is proclaimed with great decision by two horns in unison, and this forthright melody thereupon sets the emotional key for the movement as a whole. Ingenious commentators have found in the two charming subsidiary melodies resemblances to certain Negro "Spirituals," but the question has chiefly an academic interest. More important is the fact that these themes are of themselves attractive and that Dvorak, one of the great masters of instrumentation, has given them an orchestral setting of genuine beauty.

Hardly another single movement from any symphony, old or new, is so beloved as the succeeding Largo, of which the principal melody has lately been fitted with words by William Arms Fisher, Bostonian composer, and issued as a song under the title "Goin' Home." There is a story to the effect that Dvorak found his inspiration for this movement in Longfellow's tale of "Hiawatha's Wooing", but surely its plaintive theme has in it more of Negro than of Indian character and feeling.

Most symphonies, even including some of the more renowned of them, are not of equal excellence throughout their length, but in this, his memorable gift to America, Dvorak's invention neither fails nor flags. The Scherzo is a masterpiece of its kind; nimble, sparkling, brightly orchestrated, and then with a trio of contrasting songfulness, and the finale, with its powerful chief theme and its passionate second melody, is perhaps the strongest of the four movements.

In music miracles are rare enough. Most compositions, however beautiful, however inspired, have an obvious ancestry. But certain other music—Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" or Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" for example—seem to have come to their creators in a moment of revelation, so little have they in common with any previous manifestation of musical beauty. And although Debussy's Prelude to Mallarme's poetic fantasy has in its thirty years of life become thoroughly familiar to the musical public, it still exerts its spell with almost undiminished potency. Here is music that transports the listener to a Pagan world of sights, sounds and sensations exquisitely voluptously, yet music that for all its seeming vagueness and fragility is as firmly knit as a fugue of Bach, as solid of facture as a symphonic movement by Brahms or Beethoven.

Nor have the years that have piled upon the head of Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, and that now lack but twenty of a full century, appreciably lessened the power or the appeal of that splendid composition. In time the opera which it prefaces and of which it is the dramatic synthesis may lose its place upon the stage, but the Overture will long keep alive its most vivid and most significant music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MONTEUX HONORED IN FINAL BOW HERE

Statue Given Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Concert at Infantry Hall.

AUDIENCE GIVES HIM OVATION

Prof. Albert K. Potter Pays Tribute to Musician in Behalf of Local Music Lovers.—Delightful Programme Presented

Pierre Monteux made his final bow to a Providence audience last evening at Infantry Hall with the close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here. But he was not allowed to depart without a tangible evidence of the admiration and respect of Providence patrons. After the playing of Dvorak's "New World" symphony Professor Albert K. Potter of Brown University, acting for a group of Providence music lovers, presented M. Monteux with a bronze reproduction of the statue by the American sculptor, Dallin, "Invocation to the Great Spirit," which stands in front of the Boston Art Museum.

Professor Potter paid a fine tribute to M. Monteux's qualities as musician and as a man and the audience, which rose as the presentation began, gave the popular leader a veritable ovation.

The movement which culminated in the presentation was inaugurated among the admirers of M. Monteux in this city by Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel.

LEADER FOR FIVE YEARS

It is five years since M. Monteux assumed leadership of the famous Boston organization and as Professor Potter pointed out he began his duties under somewhat trying circumstances. Great changes had been made in the orchestra's personnel and he was confronted with the task of remoulding his forces into the fine responsive band that previously for so many years had been one of the leading orchestras of the world. His success is apparent to-day, the organization having again, through his untiring efforts, reached the heights of artistry.

For the principal number in yesterday's concert M. Monteux presented the "New World" symphony by the Bohemian composer, Dvorak, a work of particular interest to an American audience. It was written while the eminent musician was a resident of New York and has for its inspiration the folk tunes of America. Dvorak himself said that he did not take any special themes for the foundation of this symphony but used thematic material partly borrowed from Southern negro melodies and partly original. This inspiration came, of course, from the plaintive tunes of the South.

The symphony is a delightful work, rich in sweet melodies and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. The slow movement is one that lingers in the hearer's memory and throughout the four movements there is originality of treatment, colorful instrumentation and brilliant effects.

FRENCH NUMBERS GIVEN

The remaining portion of the orchestral programme included the Debussy prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Wagner overture to "Tannhauser." It is in the imaginative writings of the modern French composers that M. Monteux finds material for delightfully artistic conceptions. He has played the Debussy work here on previous occasions. It is always intimately sensed and set forth with delicacy and beauty.

For the closing number the ever popular "Tannhauser" overture received a brilliant rendition.

The evening's soloist, John Charles Thomas, scored a big success in his two appearances with the orchestra. He has become a favorite with Providence audiences through former visits here in concert. The "Pagliacci" prologue was sung with dramatic effect and brought him many recalls. His other number, the air, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," received an artistic interpretation and showed his fine voice to particular advantage. Again he was the recipient of tremendous applause and was forced to return several times in acknowledgment.

A. F. P.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAY 1

THE RESTORER, THE SUSTAINER, THE BROADENER

MR. MONTEUX AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Conductor's Three Days of Farewell—The Band That He Saved and Renewed—The Present Range, Diversity and Freedom of the Concerts, Work of His Hand—His Own Deepened Abilities and Enhanced Powers

WILHELM GERICKE, now living in old age and retirement at Vienna, first set and then achieved the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Karl Muck, still in active practice of his profession in many a European city, raised it to its highest pinnacle of performance and prestige. Pierre Monteux, coming to it in a later day, departing after the concerts of the current week, has restored those standards and regained in large measure that prestige. By these titles, he deserves to rank with his two illustrious predecessors; while in a third respect he excels them both. Beyond any other conductor in the three and forty years of the Symphony Concerts, he has widened the scope of the repertory, counting no music, so long as it warranted performance, alien to him or to his hearers. His successors will, no doubt, respect the standards and maintain the prestige of the Boston Orchestra. No conductor of ability or ambition could do otherwise to the full degree of his powers. Whoever they may be, whatever they may prove, not one of them—it is safe to say—will return to the repertory as it was before Mr. Monteux widened, animated and modernized it. So doing, he has left lasting imprint upon the course and the quality of the Symphony Concerts, as Boston first hears them, as in other cities they are repeated. A cosmopolitan and a catholic repertory, alive and of our own time, are his fullest titles to high place in our conductors' Pantheon.

When, in the autumn of 1919, Mr. Monteux became the conductor of the Boston Orchestra, the demoralization of the final years in the German war and the mediocrity and provinciality of Henri Rabaud as conductor through six perilous months, had reduced it to the lowest pitch in all its annals. Except to a faithful public in the city where it had long been glorious institution, it had become (as Mr. Gilman wrote the other day in The New York Tribune) "virtually negligible." Outside Boston, only certain Parisians closely heeded it, because they believed they could enter in and possess it as one of the conquered artistic provinces of the late war—Mr. Higginson chose only German conductors—parcelling it out among themselves, and pitching Rabauds to rule it. The personnel of the orchestra—hitherto a band of virtuosi—had been decimated by dissensions incident to both the just resentments and the unjust intolerances of war-time. Not a few of the newcomers were inferior to their predecessors in antecedents and ambitions, talents and loyalties, discontent over salaries and relations or non-relations with the Musicians' Union was rife in the band; while there were those among it who, for their own purposes, would foment more discord.

Less by his own desires than by the will of an official hierarchy in Paris, Monsieur Rabaud had been thrust into a conductorship which he regarded, honestly enough, as a temporary sojourn abroad. Undoubtedly he meant well and did his best through his brief term in Boston. He lacked, however, the ability, the endurance and the persistence to begin the restoration of an orchestra decimated and declined. It cried for discipline, and he was a gentle man. His horizons in music were wholly those of academic and official Paris. By them he chose his pieces, shaped his programmes. By them he measured intrinsically literal, routine, unindividual performance. These were not the courses or the standards that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had proudly followed and maintained from the days of Gericke through the days of Muck. At the end of a season, the peril of the future loomed large. That way ruin lay, and Mr. Monteux, cosmopolite (as a conductor should be) of Paris, cosmopolite of the Russian Ballet and the Metropolitan Opera House, was summoned to the rescue.

The restoraton, nay the salvation, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Pierre Monteux began, pursued, enforced and finally achieved—with coöperating trustees, management and public—is written clear in the quality and the prestige of the band and its concerts, at home and abroad, through this closing musical year of 1923-24. Then, after all the days of waiting and hoping and persevering—say from last spring onward—the end crowned the work. And the orchestra that so flourishes anew and is so lauded afresh is Pierre Monteux's orchestra and none other, though Serge Koussevitzky will be the first to receive it as heritage. For fortune, while it seemed to harass Mr. Monteux, as "the strike" of the players befell, actually favored him. For little more than a season had he worked at the restoration of the band, when the discord, long simmering, boiled into open outbreak. Before the tumult stilled many in the orchestra had grown or been dismissed into the void, while others—and the majority—bound by actual or implied obligation.

It is not Mr. Monteux's habit to flinch or to repine. The so-called strike had cleared the band of much dead or dying wood, of many undesirables. Forthwith the conductor set about reconstitution. Choice, exacting and far-searching was he in the assembling of new men and new talents. Not a prejudice, not an inclination swayed him. He was all for the best, wherever the best was obtainable. On the part of the trustees a readjustment of salaries and working terms materially aided. Gradually the Symphony Orchestra became not only a band of abilities youthful, in process, or at full maturity, but a band that was reciprocating instrument to the conductor, as diligent, keen, ambitious and finely tempered.

Then proceeded the patient, exigent, nearly endless work of restoration. The strings were refined to high precision and fluid pliancy. Their tone was brightened or deepened. The wood-winds stood forth anew in the command of the virtuosity, the individuality, the musical quality and sensibility, that of old had been theirs. The horns, the other brass, became rich, glowing, full voiced yet mellow. The percussion wrought their little miracles of rhythm and color. In sum, the whole orchestra became a balanced, euphonious, sensitive and adept instrument. It knew finesse; it released force; it shimmered with beauty; it seethed with power. There was underbody; there were also lustres; and everywhere flexibility. From Bach and Mozart to Strauss and Stravinsky, the whole range of music lay within the scope of the reanimated band. Ancient, classic, romantic, modernistic, at the composer's will it changed its voice. And that voice was also the voice of Pierre Monteux, fine of ear, alert of mind, many-sided as is music. From the dust and ashes of 1920, he has upreared the radiant and silken orchestra of 1924.

Meanwhile that other and enduring glory of the term of Pierre Monteux, conductor in Boston, had come as gradually to pass—the widening, the vitalizing, the liberating of the repertory and the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. It is the obligation of conductor and orchestra to open to audiences the masterpieces and the acknowledged classics of music—by Mr. Monteux unfailingly fulfilled. It is error and excess to repeat those masterpieces and those classics until they become routine, mechanical, devitalized, upon conductor, band and audience. Above all his predecessors at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux has avoided this pitfall. It is equally the obligation and should be the pleasure of a conductor to search in the dark places of the masters—to rediscover and disclose anew their music that lapsing years, established custom, easy-going habit, have overlooked and neglected. The discoveries may be no more than interesting; yet they deserve place in a long and annual series of symphony concerts. With these resurrections and revivals, Mr. Monteux has been both diligent and fruitful. He regarded tradition; yet before none was he servile.

Again it is the obligation and usually the pleasure of a conductor to renew his orchestra and his hearers in the music written within our time yet already semi-established in the "standard repertory"—say of Debussy and Ravel, of Strauss and Mahler, of Sibelius and Loeffler; by belated discovery of Rimsky-Korsakov and Musorgsky. Mr. Monteux has eagerly returned to it, steadily amplified it, almost unfailingly given it animating and characterizing voice and life. In the securities and the freedoms that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoys; through such a series of concerts as he annually undertakes; with such a band as he now commands, it is his bounden and imperative obligation to keep his public informed as to the music of the immediate hour. He owes such duty to his audiences, the composers, his own honor in his profession, the whole unfolding, expanding and—glory be!—ever-experimenting art of music. Again beyond his predecessors, Mr. Monteux has proclaimed and practised his faith—by the works of an open mind, an eager spirit and a courage undaunted. To him and him only Boston and New York alike owe much of their acquaintance and their pleasure in the rising Britons and Italians, the new Parisians and Spaniards, Germans and Austrians, the whole stimulating and engrossing brood of modernists, Stravinsky at their head. On this score, it is safe to say, no present conductor in Europe or in America has so served and fostered the progress of music as has Pierre Monteux in Boston.

Above all, it is incumbent upon the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to free himself—so far as humanly he may—from every ingrained prejudice or cultivated predilection in the choice of music. He must favor no race, nation, school, cult or clique. Everlastingly and unflaggingly, he must be eager, open and free of mind. In music he should be idealized internationalist, seeking, choosing, propagating, cherishing the best obtainable, even in the America around him, the Boston and the New York at his feet. Yet again beyond every predecessor, Mr. Monteux has drawn near to this ideal. When his audience in Sanders Theatre this evening, in Symphony Hall tomorrow and Saturday, rises to farewell him, it salutes as open a mind, as catholic an ear, as free and ranging a spirit as the profession of conducting has known.

A conductor may not so upbuild an orchestra without also upbuilding himself. He may not so broaden and deepen the practice of his profession without also broadening and deepening his own mind and spirit. Mr. Monteux was an able conductor when he came first to Symphony Hall in the autumn of 1920. In the spring of 1924, he departs with just titles even to eminence. Could recollection span them, there is no need to recall seriatim his finer or his larger achievements—his fervors, his fires with Stravinsky and Strauss; his [illegible] with Debussy and Ravel; his discerning [illegible] new-born Britons and outspreading Italians; the richness of his Russian rhythms and colorings; his songful and romantic warmths with Schumann and Schubert; his light and heat of beauty, his might of power, with Beethoven, the stride of his Handel and Bach, the flow of his Mozart and Haydn. Over many memories are these, the merits of Pierre Monteux, clearly and lastingly written. They coalesce and sum in the image of a conductor whose ear was closely and finely attuned to every voice of his orchestra; whose fellow-players served him in respect and admiration, liking and loyalty; who, in his turn, served the chosen composer, the present piece, that he might release them in integrity, spirit and truth, with life infused, with character projected.

In this image is also reflected the musician, who perceived clearly, who felt sympathetically and sensitively, who measured and designed, wove and shaded, distributed and proportioned, until, so far as he might, music should sound in the ears of hearers even as in the imagination of him who wrote it and of him who conveyed it. Here Pierre Monteux excelled less; there he excelled more. Once and again he fell short; now and again he surpassed belief. Yet always has he been conductor who exalted the arts and the voice of music above himself; who in the glories of his restored orchestra wrought the testimony to his own prowess. Departing in all modesty and gentleness and still regret, Pierre Monteux leaves spacious memories behind him—the savior of an illustrious orchestra, the renewer of its powers and prestige, the sustainer of its standards; the opener of vistas, broad and fair, upon new wealth and new progress.

H. T. P.

Open Mind, Eager Heart, Able Hand

Pierre Monteux

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, October, 1919 — May 1924

(The Drawing by Lake from a Photograph by Purdy)

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

When the excellent Henri Rabaud, as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, led a performance of Henry F. Gilbert's impressively dramatic overture to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," he procured a copy of the tragedy and at once saw in it material for an opera. He told us that he would begin work on it as soon as he returned to Paris.

He made his own translation into French, and his "L'Appel de la Mer," a lyric drama in one act, was produced on April 4 in Paris at the Opera Comique, with Suzanne Balguerie taking the chief part.

The menestrel found that the libretto suggests the force of tortured maternal feeling, "above all the agonizing power of an invisible personage, the sea. Music alone can sustain the prolongation of the thought and this agonizing emotion. Never perhaps has a more decisive example of its sovereign power been affirmed. It is the music which from the beginning of the prelude evokes in broad dissonant chords, the stormy ocean, and at the end prolongs its disturbing appeal; it expresses the tortured state of the aged woman and the battered characters whose musical speech is instinctively allied to naive folk-song." The critic, Paul Bertrand, further says that Rabaud employs the latest musical speech, but it always serves true and intense dramatic expression. "Hence this dynamic force which sweeps the work along in an irresistible crescendo of emotion to the final scene and leaves a poignant impression. The success was triumphal, increased by an interpretation of the first order."

The last concerts of the 43rd season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, when Mr. Monteux will end his present engagement. Beethoven Symphony, C minor; Carpenter, Adventures in a Perambulator; Debussy, The Afternoon of a Faun; Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Fela Rybier, a young Polish pianist of talent, who has been heard here in private houses, will give her first public [illegible] night in Steinert hall.

CAMDEN,
N. J.

MAY 19[illegible]

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are preparing a reception in honor of Pierre Monteux to be given at Symphony Hall, Saturday afternoon. That evening Mr. Monteux will conduct his last Boston Symphony concert.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

Music Here and There.

Pierre Monteux is conducting in Boston today and tomorrow his final concerts as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he has held through five seasons, in the course of one of which the orchestra threatened to go to pieces. The reconstructed orchestra is peculiarly the work of Mr. Monteux.

For his farewell program, played today and tomorrow in Boston's Symphony Hall, he has chosen Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the "Adventures in a Perambulator" suite of John Alden Carpenter, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture. Thus the retiring French conductor takes cognizance of the music of Germany of America and of France.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

ANOTHER HIGGINSON NEEDED?

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Forty-odd years back, Major Higginson organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra. People didn't attend the concerts. It was an expensive body to maintain. Things were discouraging. But for years the major's support never ceased, and finally people began to come. It was they who shouldered this task. Is this a true story? I don't know. But it's the way I like to imagine it.

Last night, Henry Miller gave a curtain speech. He told us Boston was the city he most loved. He spoke of America's need for the resident theatre. He asked us to make a permanent home for himself and the company. He wasn't very long about it, yet I nearly wept during that little speech. I wanted to be a Major Higginson, and to slip behind the scenes and embrace Henry Miller, laying my fortune at his feet.

I was with a friend. This person's opinion I hold extremely high. He said he thought it a very boring curtain speech.

I am wondering if something ran away with me?

But Mr. Miller said he was good for another forty years.

PETER VAN DER M. SMITH

Cambridge, May 1

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Parting and Plaudits

THERE must be fortitude even in farewells, and Mr. Monteux seemed a much-enduring conductor when he stood long on the stage of Sanders Theatre last evening, while a "University Audience," assembled for his final concert in Cambridge, clapped him again and again. He tried to seem remote and resigned; he would stand very still; he would even cultivate an impassive bearing. Perhaps it were truth to say that he half-succeeded. So much for greeting, and at length he could pass to his welcome work. When, however, the final parting came, much of this stiffness had worn away. The company rose; the clapping sounded in volleys —and applause crackles against the wooden walls of the university theatre. Once, twice and thrice the conductor quit the stage. Once, twice and thrice the plaudits brought him back. And now he smiled and bowed, and bowed and smiled, in a happy embarrassment. Yet respite he would have and fondly fancied he had won, when he bade the orchestra rise behind him.

Of course, the clapping forthwith swelled anew. At last it subsided; at last the departing conductor vanished; while someone, doubtless, cut away and carried to him the crimson roses that, twined with green leafage, wreathed his music-stand. Elsewhere than in presidential conventions, there may be "record-breaking applause" as the correspondents judge it—much less prepared and far more honest. Even a "University Audience" is capable of it, as there was proof and to spare in Sanders Theatre yesterday. In Symphony Hall today and tomorrow Boston must look to its and to Mr. Monteux's laurels. Already however, after New York, Providence and Zürich, Baireuth, the Valkyrs' Rock and pressed tight with them.

There was also a concert with Mr. Monteux's orchestra, otherwise the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1924, playing at the top of its mettle. The voices of Ludwig van Beethoven, sometime composer in Vienna, and of Richard Wagner, once of now Cambridge, his smooth brow must be the flowing Rhine, were also heard in the land. There was conducting as well—of Mr. Monteux in the fullness of passion and power, the richness of instrumental song, the ardor of tonal advance, suspense and climax through Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; of Mr. Monteux in full flight of the theatre with the rantin', rovin' clangorous Valkyrs; of him yet again seizing the inwrought beauty, the magical progress, the heroic strain of Siegfried scaling to Brünnhilde, of Siegfried cleaving the singing waters. Besides, there was the Monteux of the "Siegfried Idyl"—the stilled and rainbow music that somehow evades him as it will the best of conductors. But a truce to the reviewer "on his job"; even a hiss or two for him. . . . At least the sensitive and resonant auditorium made amends. For, if the Valkyrs and Siegfried the hero, Beethoven epical and Wagner far-sweeping, sound somewhat pent within these narrow bounds, here was the perfect room for Siegfried the son to Cosima and Richard newly born, weaving traceries of tone from a father's heart into a little orchestra singing under his hand. The fifteen instruments that first gave him voice would have filled this resilient Sanders.

The environment invited to wool-gathering—persistent pastime of student-years—and away drift the listening mind to wonder how this Fifth Symphony of Beethoven may have sounded to the audience that first heard it, in Vienna nearly a century and a quarter ago. Were pedants there who thought only how the music was piercing and sundering nearly every orthodox prescription? No doubt. Yet there must have been more humans to sway with the tumult and outcry of the beginning, to find strange and romantic beauty in the succeeding song, to catch the suspense and the bodment of that wondrous transition from hushed mystery to outflinging exultation.

So, as well with Wagner. For us who would rather leave our years uncounted, in twentieth, thirtieth, time, the Valkyrs ride the skies and swarm their crags, spears, flashing, shields outflung. In our ears their orchestra may still shrill and clang; but not as in those ears, to whom Wagner, in 1924, is opening a new heaven of heroes, a new earth of romance. Before elderly eyes remembering, jostle this Siegfried and that, mounting to the rock of as many Brünnhildes. Along the river speeds his bark to front twenty baleful, brooding Hagens. Yet the discovering youth around hear only the the exhaustless beauty, the endless power of a music in itself outstreaming. Fortunate the departing Monteux, by so much to open it to them.

H. T. P.

Prelude for Shalyapin

Not in opera, as of late, but in one of his wide-ranging concerts does Shalyapin return to Boston next Sunday afternoon. Yet a word about him as singing-actor—for he is such even in Symphony Hall—may be prologue to his coming. Deems Taylor wrote it not long ago in the New York World. It has to do with his Mephistopheles in Gounod's "Faust." Yet it also signals and prefigures the whole man:

The crowd that greeted Feodor Shalyapin in "Faust" filled every seat in the Metropolitan and stood as many deep, upstairs and down, as the laws of the impenetrability of matter and the

Page

Fire Department would allow. His singing was as incomparable as ever, and his acting of Mephistopheles had all of its familiar merits and defects. He still elects to play Mephisto as the lusty devil of Boito's version of the old legend, rather than the polished adventurer that Gounod had in mind. The blunt truth

ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL

MAY 2 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On account of the fact that Ben Franklin will present the Boston Symphony orchestra here and in Schenectady next season, with the new conductor of the organization, Serge Koussevitzky, directing, the following announcement, made by the orchestra management, will be read by music lovers of this section, with interest.

Next autumn Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, will come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers. It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. He has likewise appeared as guest over numerous other European orchestras. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris and in Barcelona.

Serge Koussevitzky will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is named as the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

MAY 3 1924

Boston Symphony to Broadcast Concert

(International Newsreel Photo)

Agide Jacchia, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will inaugurate the 39th season of that organization at Symphony hall, Boston, May 5. The opening concert will be broadcast via station WBZ, thus continuing the popular public concerts which have been in vogue since 1885. This is Jacchia's eighth season as conductor of the orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

BOSTON CONCERT-GOERS PAY TRIBUTE TO PIERRE MONTEUX

Present Letter of Appreciation to the Retiring Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

To express to Pierre Monteux, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their appreciation of what he has accomplished for music in Boston and particularly for the orchestra during the years of his stay here, a large company of music lovers attended the reception given him in Symphony Hall late this afternoon. In addition he was presented a beautifully bound book containing a written expression of appreciation and the names of more than two thousand friends of the distinguished musician, including those of the trustees headed by President Frederick P. Cabot; the members of the orchestra, Mayor Curley, President Lowell and President Emeritus Eliot of Harvard and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson and of about two thousand subscribers to the concerts.

The reception took place upon the stage and in the line, in addition to M. Monteux were Mrs. Higginson, widow of Major Higginson, who for a great many years was the mainstay of the orchestra; the trustees and their wives. Young women from the New England Conservatory of Music were the ushers. There were decorations of flowers and plants and upon the organ the crossed American and French flags. There was no music. The testimonial book was upon a table on the platform and during the reception a number of additional names were placed upon it.

The letter of appreciation reads as follows:

"To Pierre Monteux:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

The book is bound in blue levant, lined with buff moire silk, these being the State colors of Massachusetts. The American and French shields appear in color on the front cover and also inside the book.

All the work was executed by the Boston Society of Arts and Crafts, the illuminated lettering being by Miss Winifred M. Crawford and the binding by John F. Grabau.

At a dinner given last night by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, a handsome bowl also was presented to Mr. Monteux. It was a hand-wrought silver, the work of Arthur J. Stone of the Society of Arts and Crafts.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MAY 4 - 1924

A farewell reception was given to Pierre Monteux in Symphony hall yesterday a few hours before he made his last appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the conclusion of his five-year term.

The reception was given by the trustees, the members of the orchestra, and the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, presented the departing leader in their behalf a volume containing an expression of admiration and gratitude, and bearing the signatures of all present, and others, to the number of 4000. Among those who signed were Mrs. H. L. Higginson, President Lowell and ex-President Eliot of Harvard, Mayor Curley and Mrs. Curley, Lt.-Gov. Fuller and Mrs. Fuller. The text follows:

"To Pierre Monteux:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL

MAY 3 1924

"Opening Pops To Be Broadcast'

An almost never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC, The Shepard Stores, at 7.15 (Standard) p. m., Monday May 5th, from Symphony Hall. The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia. This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America. During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston." "Pops" have been a part of Boston's Music treats since 1885 and the present orchestra is about twice the size of the original orchestra and is surely the finest Symphony Orchestra to be heard in this part of the country, in the warmer season of the year. The concert will also be broadcast from WBZ.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

MAY 1 -

LETTER OF APPRECIATION GIVEN PIERRE MONTEUX

BOSTON, May 3.—Pierre Monteux, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was today presented with a letter of appreciation signed by the trustees and members of the orchestra and more than 5,000 music lovers and supporters of greater Boston.

The letter, consisting of about a hundred words, is in book form to make possible the appending of the thousands of signatures. It is bound and lined with the state colors of Massachusetts and bears the shields of France and this Country.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 4 - 1924

Yesterday afternoon the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reception at Symphony Hall in honor of Pierre Monteux, who last evening conducted his last Boston Symphony concert. Mr. Monteux was presented with a written expression of appreciation signed by many prominent musicians.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

'POPS' OPENING FROM WNAC

A never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC — the Shepard Stores — at 8:15 o'clock, tomorrow evening.

The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia.

This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America.

During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 5 1924

To Broadcast "Pops."

The opening concert of "Pops" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at 8:15 o'clock to-night will be broadcast by WNAC and WEAN, The Shepard Stores, Boston and Providence. The orchestra will be under the direction of Agide Jacchia.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Parting and Plaudits

THERE must be fortitude even in farewells, and Mr. Monteux seemed a much-enduring conductor when he stood long on the stage of Sanders Theatre last evening, while a "University Audience," assembled for his final concert in Cambridge, clapped him again and again. He tried to seem remote and resigned; he would stand very still; he would even cultivate an impassive bearing. Perhaps it were truth to say that he half-succeeded. So much for greeting, and at length he could pass to his welcome work. When, however, the final parting came, much of this stiffness had worn away. The company rose; the clapping sounded in volleys—and applause crackles against the wooden walls of the university theatre. Once, twice and thrice the conductor quit the stage. Once, twice and thrice the plaudits brought him back. And now he smiled and bowed, and bowed and smiled, in a happy embarrassment. Yet respite he would have and fondly fancied he had won, when he bade the orchestra rise behind him.

Of course, the clapping forthwith swelled anew. At last it subsided; at last the departing conductor vanished; while someone, doubtless, cut away and carried to him the crimson roses that, twined with green leafage, wreathed his music-stand. Elsewhere than in presidential conventions, there may be "record-breaking applause" as the correspondents judge it—much less prepared and far more honest. Even a "University Audience" is capable of it, as there was proof and to spare in Sanders Theatre yesterday. In Symphony Hall today and tomorrow Boston must look to its and to Mr. Monteux's laurels. Already however, after New York, Providence and Zürich, Baireuth, the Valkyrs' Rock and pressed tight with them.

There was also a concert with Mr. Monteux's orchestra, otherwise the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1924, playing at th top of its mettle. The voices of Ludwi van Beethoven, sometime composer i Vienna, and of Richard Wagner, once o now Cambridge, his smooth brow must be the flowing Rhine, were also heard in the land. There was conducting as well—of Mr. Monteux in the fullness of passion and power, the richness of instrumental song, the ardor of tonal advance, suspense and climax through Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; of Mr. Monteux in full flight of the theatre with the rantin', rovin' clangorous Valkyrs; of him yet again seizing the inwrought beauty, the magical progress, the heroic strain of Siegfried scaling to Brünnhilde, of Siegfried cleaving the singing waters. Besides, there was the Monteux of the "Siegfried Idyl"—the stilled and rainbow music that somehow evades him as it will the best of conductors. But a truce to the reviewer "on his job"; even a hiss or two for him. . . . At least the sensitive and resonant auditorium made amends. For, if the Valkyrs and Siegfried the hero, Beethoven epical and Wagner far-sweeping, sound somewhat pent within these narrow bounds, here was the perfect room for Siegfried the son to Cosima and Richard newly born, weaving traceries of tone from a father's heart into a little orchestra singing under his hand. The fifteen instruments that first gave him voice would have filled this resilient Sanders.

The environment invited to wool-gathering—persistent pastime of student-years—and away drift the listening mind to wonder how this Fifth Symphony of Beethoven may have sounded to the audience that first heard it, in Vienna nearly a century and a quarter ago. Were pedants there who thought only how the music was piercing and sundering nearly every orthodox prescription? No doubt. Yet there must have been more humans to sway with the tumult and outcry of the beginning, to find strange and romantic beauty in the succeeding song, to catch the suspense and the bodment of that wondrous transition from hushed mystery to outflinging exultation.

So, as well with Wagner. For us who would rather leave our years uncounted, in twentieth, thirtieth, time, the Valkyrs ride the skies and swarm their crags, spears, flashing, shields outflung. In our ears their orchestra may still shrill and clang; but not as in those ears, to whom Wagner, in 1924, is opening a new heaven of heroes, a new earth of romance. Before elderly eyes remembering, jostle this Siegfried and that, mounting to the rock of as many Brünnhildes. Along the river speeds his bark to front twenty baleful, brooding Hagens. Yet the discovering youth around hear only the the exhaustless beauty, the endless power of a music in itself outstreaming. Fortunate the departing Monteux, by so much to open it to them.

H. T. P.

Prelude for Shalyapin

Not in opera, as of late, but in one of his wide-ranging concerts does Shalyapin return to Boston next Sunday afternoon. Yet a word about him as singing-actor—for he is such even in Symphony Hall—may be prologue to his coming. Deems Taylor wrote it not long ago in the New York World. It has to do with his Mephistopheles in Gounod's "Faust." Yet it also signals and prefigures the whole man:

The crowd that greeted Feodor Shalyapin in "Faust" filled every seat in the Metropolitan and stood as many deep, upstairs and down, as the laws of the impenetrability of matter and the

— Page

Fire Department would allow. His singing was as incomparable as ever, and his acting of Mephistopheles had all of its familiar merits and defects. Shalyapin elects to play Mephisto as the jovial devil of Goethe's version of the legend, rather than the polished adventurer that Gounod had in mind. The blunt truth

ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On account of the fact that Ben Franklin will present the Boston Symphony orchestra here and in Schenectady next season, with the new conductor of the organization, Serge Koussevitzky, directing, the following announcement, made by the orchestra management, will be read by music lovers of this section, with interest.

Next autumn Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, will come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier career n Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers. It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. He has likewise appeared as guest over numerous other European orchestras. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris and in Barcelona.

Serge Koussevitzky will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is named as the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
MAY 3 1924

Boston Symphony to Broadcast Concert

(International Newsreel Photo)

Agide Jacchia, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will inaugurate the 39th season of that organization at Symphony hall, Boston, May 5. The opening concert will be broadcast via station WBZ, thus continuing the popular public concerts which have been in vogue since 1885. This is Jacchia's eighth season as conductor of the orchestra.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

BOSTON CONCERT-GOERS PAY TRIBUTE TO PIERRE MONTEUX

Present Letter of Appreciation to the Retiring Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

To express to Pierre Monteux, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their appreciation of what he has accomplished for music in Boston and particularly for the orchestra during the years of his stay here, a large company of music lovers attended the reception given him in Symphony Hall late this afternoon. In addition he was presented a beautifully bound book containing a written expression of appreciation and the names of more than two thousand friends of the distinguished musician, including those of the trustees headed by President Frederick P. Cabot; the members of the orchestra, Mayor Curley, President Lowell and President Emeritus Eliot of Harvard and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson and of about two thousand subscribers to the concerts.

The reception took place upon the stage and in the line, in addition to M. Monteux were Mrs. Higginson, widow of Major Higginson, who for a great many years was the mainstay of the orchestra; the trustees and their wives. Young women from

LEWISTON,
ME.
JOURNAL
MAY 3 1924

"Opening Pops To Be Broadcast'

An almost never failing sign tha summer will soon be here, is th opening at Symphony Hall o "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC, The Shepard Stores, at 7.15 (Standard) p. m., Monday May 5th, from Symphony Hall. The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia. This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America. During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston." "Pops" have been a part of Boston's Music treats since 1885 and the present orchestra is about twice the size of the original orchestra and is surely the finest Symphony Orchestra to be heard in this part of the country, in the warmer season of the year. The concert will also be broadcast from WBZ.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
MA

LETTER OF APPRECIATION GIVEN PIERRE MONTEUX

BOSTON, May 3.—Pierre Monteux, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was today presented with a letter of appreciation signed by the trustees and members of the orchestra and more than 5,000 music lovers and supporters of greater Boston.

The letter, consisting of about a hundred words, is in book form to make possible the appending of the thousands of signatures. It is bound and lined with the state colors of Massachusetts and bears the shields of France and this Country.

Error and Regret

Gibberish That Was Intended as Compliment to a Retiring Conductor

IN a review, printed in yesterday's Transcript of Mr. Monteux's "To Pierre Monteux:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

The book is bound in blue levant, lined with buff moire silk, these being the State colors of Massachusetts. The American and French shields appear in color on the front cover and also inside the book.

All the work was executed by the Bos-

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Yesterday afternoon the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reception at Symphony Hall in honor of Pierre Monteux, who last evening conducted his last Boston Symphony concert. Mr. Monteux was presented with a written expression of appreciation signed by many prominent musicians.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

'POPS' OPENING FROM WNAC

A never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC—the Shepard Stores—at 8:15 o'clock, tomorrow evening.

The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia.

This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America.

During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
5 1924

To Broadcast "Pops."

The opening concert of "Pops" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at 8:15 o'clock to-night will be broadcast by WNAC and WEAN, The Shepard Stores, Boston and Providence. The orchestra will be under the direction of Agide Jacchia.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
MAY 4 - 1924

BID FAREWELL TO PIERRE MONTEUX

Admirers Fill Symphony Hall —4000 Sign Memorial

A farewell reception was given to Pierre Monteux in Symphony hall yesterday a few hours before he made his last appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the conclusion of his five-year term.

The reception was given by the trustees, the members of the orchestra, and the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, presented the departing leader in their behalf a volume containing an expression of admiration and gratitude, and bearing the signatures of all present, and others, to the number of 4000. Among those who signed were Mrs. H. L. Higginson, President Lowell and ex-President Eliot of Harvard, Mayor Curley and Mrs. Curley, Lt.-Gov. Fuller and Mrs. Fuller. The text follows:

"To Pierre Monteux:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Pierre Monteux, and His Service to Music in Boston

By STUART MASON

WHEN Pierre Monteux lays down his baton at the end of tonight's concert he will conclude his five years' engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a period which has perhaps been the most eventful in the history of that organization. It is safe to say that no other conductor has exerted so great and beneficial an influence on the artistic progress of the orchestra with the possible exception of Wilhelm Gericke. But Mr. Monteux has done more than bring his players to technical perfection. He has exerted a decided influence for good on music in this part of the world.

When Mr. Monteux took office as conductor of the symphony concerts they had for years (in fact since their foundation) been under the leadership of Germans, or at least of men trained in the traditions of the German school. No one will deny the value of such men as Nikisch, and particularly of Gericke, but in the years immediately preceding the war there had perhaps been an overemphasis on German music and German methods of interpretation and performance.

Decline of German Music

This was all very well in its way, but unfortunately for us in Boston music was following paths which had been discovered by composers of other nationalities. Russian, French, and Italian musicians (English composers as well) were looking at music from a new angle, whereas German composers and performers were in reality fast losing ground and were displaying in certain of their music many of those qualities which eventually led to their undoing in other lines of endeavor.

Of the almost revolutionary changes which were going on about us in the musical world, we in Boston were allowed to have but little knowledge. Had we depended solely on the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for hearings of modern French music, for example, we should have had but few. Fortunately for us, Mrs. Richard J. Hall organized orchestral concerts which were devoted largely to this school of musical composition, but as regards the music of other moderns we were hopelessly behind the times. More than this, the prestige which the Symphony concerts enjoyed caused many a music lover to regard modern music with suspicion, as he so seldom heard it played in Symphony Hall, which was, rightly or not, looked upon as the fountain head of music in this city.

Thus the coming of Mr. Monteux marked a complete change in the musical life of the Symphony concerts. It had been publicly stated, and by an extremely influential person, that no man unless trained in Germany could conduct a Symphony orchestra. There was, quite naturally, perhaps, a certain resentment on the part of those who were accustomed to the German régime at the advent of a Frenchman. It was no doubt thought by some that as the Germans had exercised so strong a propaganda for the music and musicians of their own country, so would the Frenchman act in favor of his own.

An Agreeable Surprise

They were destined to an agreeable surprise. Far from pursuing that course, Mr. Monteux set himself the task of providing the public with a series of programs which in looking over them are a veritable marvel of catholicity. While not in the least neglecting the well-worn classics he restored a proper balance between them and more novel music, and although possessing a keen appreciation of the new, he proved himself to be, notwithstanding, a sympathetic interpreter of the old.

His playing of Beethoven in particular will always be hard to surpass, even equal. It was said of him in these columns apropos a performance of the "Leonore" overture: "Mr. Monteux has many times given proof of his understanding and sympathetic feeling for the music of Beethoven. From the beginning of his term as conductor of the orchestra here he may be said to have restored the music of the Flemish-German-Austrian master which had under the batons of preceding conductors often suffered from a false and artificial 'tradition.' Mr. Monteux has never sought to give individual readings of Beethoven; rather has he endeavored to bring out the inherent beauty and grandeur of the music, content to let its message speak unhampered, and when all is said and done this is the quality which distinguishes the real interpretative artist."

This may serve as a fair statement of his playing of the music of all composers—of Mozart, of Schubert, of Brahms, of Richard Strauss, to say nothing of Wagner, Debussy and countless others. With him the music itself has been the sole end in view, and we are indebted to him for many a revelation in music which we had long since thought overfamiliar and stale.

His work for American music cannot be too highly appreciated and commended. Before his time the music of American composers was from time to time grudgingly given a place on the symphony programs. Mr. Monteux, apparently alone among the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has seemed to realize that he had a duty to perform toward American music. He alone has recognized that the American composer, to progress, must be played. He alone has had the courage and audacity to present compositions by Americans who were practically unknown in our concert rooms. To be sure, he has often found his swans to be geese, but he has nevertheless given an incentive to the American composer which cannot but be of lasting good to native music.

In the field of modern music he has been no less adventurous. To him we are indebted for our knowledge of the music of the French, English, Italian, and Russian schools of the present day. Whether we like it or not, the music of these men must and deserves to be heard.

Mr. Monteux's work in the reorganization of the orchestra must also come in for its share of praise. Were he remembered only for this, he would still leave a more than remarkable impression. Faced with conditions in the orchestra which a man of lesser courage and determination would have deemed insurmountable, he set bravely to work to develop an ensemble which is now well-nigh perfect.

And so Boston is losing in Pierre Monteux an artist who will be difficult to replace, a man sincerely devoted to the highest artistic ideals, free from self-conceit, to whom his art is of supreme importance, wholly absorbed in his task of making the beautiful apparent. His departure is to be regretted, but his stay among us will ever be remembered with gratitude for the many moments of keen artistic pleasure and inspiration which he has vouchsafed us.

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Pierre Monteux Conducts Final Concert in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its twenty-fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor.
Carpenter—Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator."
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhäuser."

No program could have been better chosen to conclude Mr. Monteux's term as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than this, for it summarized the many qualities which have made these last five years eventful ones in the history of the orchestra. In the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Monteux again showed his sympathetic understanding of that master's music, and in the pieces by Wagner and Debussy he was once again the versatile interpreter of the music of yesterday. And in Carpenter's suite he gave still further proof, if any were needed, of his interest in American music, an interest which he has not hesitated to show on many other occasions. It was a graceful act on his part, however, to include in his final program a work by an American. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a summary of Mr. Monteux's five years as conductor of the orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played with all that beauty of tone and perfection of ensemble which Mr. Monteux has restored to it. Happy indeed should be his successor to find at his disposal so sensitive and reponsive an instrument. Mr. Monteux was recalled again and again by an audience which, now that he is on the point of departure, is just beginning to realize his worth and the great work which he has done for the art of music in this city.

S. M.

From MAY 3 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

47

Pops to Open Monday Night

Next Monday will mark the expiration of the formal concert season, and the opening in Symphony hall of the informal season of Pop concerts. This will be the 39th season of the Pops and the eighth under Agide Jacchia, the most popular of the many illustrious Pops conductors. The orchestra under him will exceed 80 in number. There will be the usual accompaniment of refreshments. Sunday, May 11, will bring the first Sunday Pop concert with a Russian program. The opening program for May 5 follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"...Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounov
Burlesca ..... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
March Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Wildflower" Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance No. 1..... Dvorak

AGIDE JACCHIA

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

1924

MONTEUX'S LAST CONCERT

To the Editor of The Herald:

On Saturday next comes the last Symphony concert, and Mr. Monteux will leave Boston. The address which will be presented to him shows the appreciation of the musical public, but the greater public, of which the musical public is only a part, is indebted to him likewise, in at least two important matters.

First is the attempted unionization of the Boston Symphony orchestra. No one who thinks at all about modern problems fails to realize the great good the unions have done in the past and how necessary they are to protect the workingman. At the same time, the unions have gone far beyond such necessary protection, and, beginning as the foe to tyranny, seem likely to end in becoming tyrants themselves.

In building, for example, every part of the work is now parceled out by the unions between themselves and oftentimes the contest is not between the owners and the unions, but between the different unions as to which will obtain a particular piece of work, while the owner stands by in helpless fashion; and so what we generally think of as freedom is still a long way off. The public is slowly rising to this situation. When the octopus reached out one tentacle to gain control of the police force of this city the public understood the principle involved and the man who backed up Police Commissioner Curtis in enforcing that principle is now in the White House. The octopus reached out another tentacle in the effort to enslave the orchestra. No one who knew how much depended upon the freedom of art could await the result of such a conflict without anxiety. It was quite possible that we should be reduced to the drab and colorless condition in music which obtains wherever the unions in their strength have killed all initiative. The trustees of the orchestra deserve great credit for their stand; and yet the utmost they could do might only wreck the orchestra for a principle—they could not create a new orchestra without a loyal conductor. This, however, Mr. Monteux accomplished, and the community owes him a debt, not only because the union was beaten, but because the union was beaten so thoroughly that we in Boston with a rehabilitated orchestra are still free.

Our second debt to him arises from a possible attitude toward Germany and German music at the end of the war. The German bubble was pricked. The German Ph. D., without which none of us in old times could hope to teach, ceased to be a fetish. The moral degradation of Germany became at last apparent. Yet, as Burke said, it is not possible to indict a whole people. It was quite easy to forget that many Germans in the past were not, after all, Prussians, and that there was a universality about art. We needed some one to bring home to us this evident truth, and this Mr. Monteux has done. No one can say that under him German music has been neglected. On the other hand, he has shown true catholicity in his readiness to give to us not only the best of all nations, but the best that we ourselves have produced. This has been done quietly and with self-effacement.

Therefore the community, which contains many who are not musical and to whom Symphony Hall is terra incognita, owes this man a debt because in the battlefield in which he was placed he has fought for its cause. It is this larger aspect of what he has done for Boston, as a whole, that we may well remember he departs.

GEO. R. NUTTER.

Boston, May 1.

BOSTON TRIBUTE TO RETIRING SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LEADER

Thousands Shake Hands With M Pierre Monteux at Informal Reception—French and American Flags Used in Decorations

The fine esteem in which M Pierre Monteux, retiring leader of the Symphony Orchestra, is held by the music-loving people of Boston was demonstrated yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where he was tendered an informal reception by the trustees.

His hand was shaken by several thousand persons in the course of the two hours between 3:30 and 5:30, and there were few of those who passed in line but had something pleasant and touching to say to the great leader.

The stage was decorated with flowers and potted plants and overhead floated the French and American flags. M Monteux stood in the center of the stage and at his left were several members of the board of trustees, with Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board, at the head of the receiving line. Next in line were Galen Stone and Henry B. Sawyer, also Charles Loeffler.

Mrs Henry L. Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra, sat just behind M Monteux with some friends. She was deeply interested in the proceedings and chatted with many of her friends as they passed.

It was entirely informal. There was no music. Young women ushers guided the visitors and guests up to and on the stage and as the people passed to the extreme right those who desired signed a written expression of appreciation prepared by the trustees. Most of those in line signed the tribute. And M Monteux was deeply affected by the whole affair.

Many of the people who passed across the stage were loath to leave and hundreds of them took seats and saw the whole reception through to the end.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

REVIEW OF THE PAST SEASON

The season which ends today has offered Boston about the usual amount of musical entertainment of about the usual degree of merit. Those who have already learned to care for music of various sorts have had many chances to listen to good performances of masterpieces by composers all the way from Palestrina to Sousa.

The 90 percent who have never bought a concert ticket are to be duly exhorted and encouraged during the coming week, which has been designated as "Music Week," and officially blessed as such by President Coolidge, Gov Cox, and Mayor Curley. But it's no use giving tracts to a missionary. One hopes that everybody likely to read this column is already at least an occasional purchaser of concert and opera tickets, and tells his friends about the fun he gets out of hearing good music well played.

The moral influence of music is dubious. But can anything in the world give more intense and less harmful enjoyment?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained under Mr Monteux' patient and painstaking leadership much of its old quality and prestige. He has now conducted his last concert here. Serge Koussevitsky, who will take his place next season, may prove a more brilliant and magnetic leader, but there are merits in Monteux which will not soon be forgotten.

His programs have often slighted the great classic symphonies. But no other conductor anywhere in the world has performed a wider and more representative selection of modern pieces. After five years one does not know from programs or performance what group of moderns Monteux most admires. He has not been guided by his personal preferences or by his national limitation.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

PIERRE MONTEUX

The courage, the endurance and the vision of Pierre Monteux, the departing conductor of the Symphony, are brilliantly witnessed by his achievement. An orchestra torn by the war, decimated by internal strife and weakened by six months of ineffective leadership, seemed far from an alluring field for the rare gifts of M. Monteux, but the very difficulties of his task were the opportunity of his genius. Unswervingly and ably, he has reconstructed the personnel; tirelessly and with amazing instinct for the best he has sought out, whether old or new, known or obscure, music which has stirred not only Boston but New York to ringing enthusiasm.

He has been pre-eminently a live and animating force. Fortunate is Boston to have his finely chosen and trained orchestra; but thrice blessed M. Monteux himself thus to have achieved, and to go forth acclaimed by all who know his work.

48

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

PRESENT GIFTS TO MONTEUX

Given Reception by Symphony Trustees and Subscribers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As the time of Mr. Monteux's departure drew nigh, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra deemed that the usual channels through which concert audience express their regard for a conductor would on this occasion scarcely suffice.

Accordingly they caused to be made a book in which they themselves, the officials and members of the orchestra and as many of the subscribers as cared so to do, might sign a letter of appreciation.

RECEPTION FOR MONTEUX

For some time this letter, now bound in blue leather and bearing upon its cover the linked shields of France and the United States, has been available for signatures both at Symphony Hall and at the rooms of the Arts and Crafts Society, and yesterday afternoon the official presentation to Mr. Monteux was made by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, at a reception tendered the departing conductor in Symphony Hall.

To this reception were invited the subscribers of both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and those of the Monday evening series and of the series held in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, as well. Upon the flower-banked stage were ranged in a receiving line Mr. Monteux, the trustees and their wives, and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, wife of the founder of the orchestra. And although he had before him a concert last evening, Mr. Monteux, with characteristic cordiality, volunteered to shake the hands of all who wished so to greet him, and offering by turn his right hand and his left, lest the former become too lame to wield a baton, Mr. Monteux thus saluted most of the 2500-odd guests who were present.

The Souvenir Letter

In making the presentation of the Letter of Appreciation, which bears in all more than 5000 signatures, Judge Cabot, after a few words of greeting, first explained the nature of its contents and then read the text as follows:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

Other Gifts for Monteux

With admirable command of the language that for the past few years he has made his own, Mr. Monteux thanked the trustees and the patrons of the orchestra for their kindness to him, and expressed his pleasure and satisfaction in the cordiality that has of late been so generally extended.

This letter of appreciation, it may be added, is not the only tangible mark of regard which Mr. Monteux has received in the course of the last week. Tuesday evening in Providence the subscribers to the series of concerts in that city presented him with a replica of Cyrus Dallin's familiar statue, "The Call of the Great Spirit," that stands at the entrance to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; Friday evening, Judge Cabot entertained the trustees and their wives at a dinner at which Mr. Monteux was guest of honor and at which he was presented with a silver punch-bowl suitably inscribed; and finally last evening, during the intermission in the concert, the members of the orchestra proffered to Mr. Monteux a silver loving-cup as parting token of their esteem.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records The Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhäuser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4,000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after five years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

During the past season these compositions were performed for the first time, anywhere: Converse, "Song of the Sea"; Leginska, two short pieces; Mason, Bergeric. And the works performed for the first time in America were: Bliss, a color symphony; Bowen, concerto, C minor, for viola (Lionel Tertis), and orchestra; Bridge, suite, "The Sea"; De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for pianoforte and orchestra. (Henrich Gebbard, pianist.)

5-19

From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

TO BROADCAST POPS OPENING

WBZ to Put Noted Musical Event at Symphony Hall on Air Tonight

Tonight's broadcast from WBZ will enable listeners throughout the country to hear what up to this time has been reserved for the select few, that is, the Pop concert to be given under the direction of Agide Jacchia to be broadcast, commencing at 8:15 P. M. The Pops is without question one of the most popular concert features of Boston and the opening night represents one of the biggest nights of the Boston music season.

AGIDE JACCHIA

In 1885 this project of a supplementary series of concerts to the regular season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was instigated. Thirty-seven seasons have passed, during which time the "Pops" have become so popular they now represent as much a part of Boston as the world-famed Boston Symphony itself.

The very fact that these concerts are under the direction of Agide Jacchia and that it is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will leave no doubt in the mind of any one as to the excellency of the concerts. Conductor Agide Jacchia has toured from coast to coast, and from Canada to Central America, conducting operatic and symphonic scores. During the season of 1914-15 he was principal conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

After Many Years "Nerone"

Toscanini Sponsors Production of Boito's Posthumous Opera at La Scala.

By Pitts Sanborn.

At last "Nerone" has been staged. The "world premiere" at the famous Scala Theatre in Milan night before last may be set down without hesitation as the most important production that historic house has sheltered since the "world premiere" of Verdi's "Falstaff" in February, 1893. And, of course, there is a relation between the two. Boito, Verdi's librettist for "Otello" and "Falstaff," wrote both the poem and the music for "Nerone." Boito's other opera, "Mefistofele," dates back over fifty years. Almost since the first production of "Mefistofele" there have been rumors of the opera that was to succeed it with the Emperor Nero as its chief figure and name-giver. But the years became decades and the decades multiplied, and the anxiously awaited "Nerone" never issued from the privacy of Arrigo Boito's desk.

A few years ago Boito died. It was said that he had left the score of his "Nerone" unfinished. Next it was reported that Arturo Toscanini, at the head of the Scala Theatre, would put the finishing touches on the opera and at length bring it out. And now he has done so. The occasion was in the highest degree sensational. Nothing seems to have been left undone that could add to the spectacular side of the production. Signor Toscanini himself conducted, and singers travelled from Paris, and even from Chicago to fortify the cast.

Cabled reports tell of ordinary seats for this occasion bringing 7,000 lire, boxes selling at from 25,000 lire up, a loss to the management of two million lire through the closing of the theatre during the fortnight previous to the first performance so that nothing need interfere with the rehearsals of the new opera. Half that loss seems to have been made up, however, in the receipts of the first night, which amounted to a cool million. Of course, all Italy, and much that is not Italy, flocked to the Scala for the event.

Boito has not taken for his central figure the young Nero of Racine's "Britannicus," but Nero the matricide and burner of Rome. The scene of Rome's burning, however, which was to have made the final tableau of the opera, Boito finally decided to omit. The opera ends with a scene of Christian martyrdom in a vault beneath the circus, for the struggle between the old religion and the new has its part in the complicated action. Of course, there is a love element, consisting of the infatuation of the priestess Asteria for the Emperor.

In the Scala cast, Aureliano Pertile, a tenor whom we remember at the Metropolitan as a mediocre vocalist, but a singing-actor of uncommon intelligence, appeared as Nero. The Asteria was Rosa Raisa, who hastened away from Chicago a few weeks ago in the interest of this important creation. A former Chicago singer, in the role of the Christian apostle Fanuel, was the Italian barytone Carlo Galeffi. For Simon Magus, the gnostic philosopher, Marcel Journet, the famous basso of the Paris Opera, who used to be well known to New York audiences, was brought to Milan. The stage manager was Gioachino Forzano.

Whatever may be the ultimate opinion as to the value of Boito's posthumous opera, it is pratically sure to make the tour of the world. If it is not produced in this country next season, there is no reason to doubt that the delay will be for one season only.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to be fearful lest an idea gain widespread credence that Sergei Koussevitzky, the next conductor of that orchestra, is exclusively a modernist, under whose baton the classics will suffer neglect and worse. The following pronouncement from the management of the orchestra is therefore deserving of special attention:—

"There seems to be an impression in America that Sergei Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who is to come to America next autumn to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an exclusive modernist as a program maker.

"This impression has probably arisen from the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky is the founder and head of a musical publishing firm in Russia, devoted to the principal worthy contemporary music of Russian and other composers. Mr. Koussevitzky has always been a champion of true genius, whether of our century or another.

"Nor has he favored any particular epoch or school. When he conducted his own orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd he gave special series devoted to the masterpieces of Bach, of Beethoven, and other masters."

Attention is further called to a statement of opinion by the English critic D. C. Parker, which appeared recently in "Musical America." Here is its summarizing close:—

"All that I heard Koussevitzky do convinces me that he will have no small vogue in America. He did not lead his forces through a single piece that had not benefited from the care he bestowed upon it—a care so solicitous for the welfare of the music that it extended to the smallest detail. More than most conductors, he made me confident that he felt the music. His was no humdrum routine job, no apathetic or desultory jog-trot to the double-bar. Each time he gave the signal for attack, it seemed as though the artist in him had begun anew the endless battle for what is great and noble in his world. But if it is within Koussevitzky's power thus to reach and dwell upon the heights, the altitude is attained at the price of no blighting uniformity. His Mozart, as exemplified in 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik,' is authentic Mozart—and how seldom one encounters it! His 'Venusberg Music' from 'Tannhauser,' has all the surge, lure and color which Wagner imparts. He catches the poetry which lies at the core of Bax's 'Garden of Fand.' And I should place conspicuous among his merits the ability to do full justice to the program of such a piece as 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and the emotional scheme of such a piece as 'The Poem of Ecstasy' without allowing the music to suffer thereby.

"Personality counts, but it is a power which, like other powers, can be used both profitably and unprofitably. Koussevitzky has it in generous measure. His heart and soul are at the end of his baton. I left his concerts sure that he knew the difficulties standing in the way of subtle and superior interpretation; that he was the last man in the world to take the quick and easy path which leads only to a passing notoriety with the unreflective. He realizes that without dust there can be no palm; that without devotion and concentration the triumph dare not be expected. He might well say, varying the words of a French king, 'L'orchestre, c'est moi,' for he makes the most of the material in his hands and welds his orchestra into one sensitive and responsive instrument. In gesture and movement he is neither reticent nor flamboyant. All he does has its significance. I see him still, drawing out of the orchestra those magic strains of Wagner in that peculiar way of his, as though he coaxed them from another sphere. Without a shadow of doubt, Koussevitzky is a born conductor, who will take his place among the notable personalities to whom the American public owes so much."

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

AGIDE JACCHIA, conductor, who will lead the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight in the first concert in the history of its thirty-eight seasons to be broadcasted by radio.

—International Newsreel Photo.

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

MAY 5-19

Saturday Audience Bids Farewell to Mr. Monteux

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of the twenty-fourth pair of concerts given in Symphony Hall Saturday evening. The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large silver loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhäuser" overture) the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after five years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

48 BOSTON, MASS. POST

PRESENT GIFTS TO MONTEUX

Given Reception by Symphony Trustees and Subscribers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As the time of Mr. Monteux's departure drew nigh, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra deemed that the usual channels through which concert audience express their regard for a conductor would on this occasion scarcely suffice.

Accordingly they caused to be made a book in which they themselves, the officials and members of the orchestra and as many of the subscribers as cared so to do, might sign a letter of appreciation.

RECEPTION FOR MONTEUX

For some time this letter, now bound in blue leather and bearing upon its cover the linked shields of France and the United States, has been available for signatures both at Symphony Hall and at the rooms of the Arts and Crafts Society, and yesterday afternoon the official presentation to Mr. Monteux was made by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, at a reception tendered the departing conductor in Symphony Hall.

To this reception were invited the subscribers of both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and those of the Monday evening series and of the series held in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, as well. Upon the flower-banked stage were ranged in a receiving line Mr. Monteux, the trustees and their wives, and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, wife of the founder of the orchestra. And although he had before him a concert last evening, Mr. Monteux, with characteristic cordiality, volunteered to shake the hands of all who wished so to greet him, and offering by turn his right hand and his left, lest the former become too lame to wield a baton, Mr. Monteux thus saluted most of the 2500-odd guests who were present.

The Souvenir Letter

In making the presentation of the Letter of Appreciation, which bears in all more than 5000 signatures, Judge Cabot, after a few words of greeting, first explained the nature of its contents and then read the text as follows:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

Other Gifts for Monteux

With admirable command of the language that for the past few years he has made his own, Mr. Monteux thanked the trustees and the patrons of the orchestra for their kindness to him, and expressed his pleasure and satisfaction in the cordiality that has of late been so generally extended.

This letter of appreciation, it may be added, is not the only tangible mark of regard which Mr. Monteux has received in the course of the last week. Tuesday evening in Providence the subscribers to the series of concerts in that city presented him with a replica of Cyrus Dallin's familiar statue, "The Call of the Great Spirit," that stands at the entrance to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; Friday evening, Judge Cabot entertained the trustees and their wives at a dinner at which Mr. Monteux was guest of honor and at which he was presented with a silver punch-bowl suitably inscribed; and finally last evening, during the intermission in the concert, the members of the orchestra profemred to Mr. Monteux a silver loving-cup as parting token of their esteem.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records The Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhäuser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4,000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after five years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

During the past season these compositions were performed for the first time, anywhere: Converse, "Song of the Sea"; Leginska, two short pieces; Mason, Bergeric. And the works performed for the first time in America were: Bliss, a color symphony; Bowen, concerto, C minor, for viola (Lionel Tertis), and orchestra; Bridge, suite, "The Sea"; De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for pianoforte and orchestra. (Henrich Gebbard, pianist.)

From TRAVELER Boston, Mass. MAY 5-19

TO BROADCAST POPS OPENING

WBZ to Put Noted Musical Event at Symphony Hall on Air Tonight

Tonight's broadcast from WBZ will enable listeners throughout the country to hear what up to this time has been reserved for the select few, that is, the Pop concert to be given under the direction of Agide Jacchia to be broadcast, commencing at 8:15 P. M. The Pops is without question one of the most popular concert features of Boston and the opening night represents one of the biggest nights of the Boston season.

AGIDE JACCHIA

In 1885 this project of a summer series of concerts [illegible] season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was instigated. Many seasons have passed, but the "Pops" have become what they now represent in the life of Boston as the world famous symphony itself.

The very fact that the concerts under the direction of Agide Jacchia and that it is the first concert of the Boston Symphony season leave no doubt in the minds of as to the [illegible] Conductor Jacchia has come from coast to coast, from Canada to Central America, and symphony season of 1914 he was conductor at the Hippodrome in New York. He is the

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

After Many Years "Nerone"

Toscanini Sponsors Production of Boito's Posthumous Opera at La Scala.

By Pitts Sanborn.

At last "Nerone" has been staged. The "world premiere" at the famous Scala Theatre in Milan night before last may be set down without hesitation as the most important production that historic house has sheltered since the "world premiere" of Verdi's "Falstaff" in February, 1893. And, of course, there is a relation between the two. Boito, Verdi's librettist for "Otello" and "Falstaff," wrote both the poem and the music for "Nerone." Boito's other opera, "Mefistofele," dates back over fifty years. Almost since the first production of "Mefistofele" there have been rumors of the opera that was to succeed it with the Emperor Nero as its chief figure and name-giver. But the years became decades and the decades multiplied, and the anxiously awaited "Nerone" never issued from the privacy of Arrigo Boito's desk.

A few years ago Boito died. It was said that he had left the score of his "Nerone" unfinished. Next it was reported that Arturo Toscanini, at the head of the Scala Theatre, would put the finishing touches on the opera and at length bring it out. And now he has done so. The occasion was in the highest degree sensational. Nothing seems to have been left undone that could add to the spectacular side of the production. Signor Toscanini himself conducted, and singers travelled from Paris, and even from Chicago to fortify the cast.

Cabled reports tell of ordinary seats for this occasion bringing 7,000 lire, boxes selling at from 25,000 lire up, a loss to the management of two million lire through the closing of the theatre during the fortnight previous to the first performance so that nothing need interfere with the rehearsals of the new opera. Half that loss seems to have been made up, however, in the receipts of the first night, which amounted to a cool million. Of course, all Italy, and much that is not Italy, flocked to the Scala for the event.

Boito has not taken for his central figure the young Nero of Racine's "Britannicus," but Nero the matricide and burner of Rome. The scene of Rome's burning, however, which was to have made the final tableau of the opera, Boito finally decided to omit. The opera ends with a scene of Christian martyrdom in a vault beneath the circus, for the struggle between the old religion and the new has its part in the complicated action. Of course, there is a love element, consisting of the infatuation of the priestess Asteria for the Emperor.

In the Scala cast, Aureliano Pertile, a tenor whom we remember at the Metropolitan as a mediocre vocalist, but a singing-actor of uncommon intelligence, appeared as Nero. The Asteria was Rosa Raisa, who hastened away from Chicago a few weeks ago in the interest of this important creation. A former Chicago singer, in the role of the Christian apostle Fanuel, was the Italian barytone Carlo Galeffi. For Simon Magus, the gnostic philosopher, Marcel Journet, the famous basso of the Paris Opera, who used to be well known to New York audiences, was brought to Milan. The stage manager was Gioachino Forzano.

Whatever may be the ultimate opinion as to the value of Boito's posthumous opera, it is pratically sure to make the tour of the world. If it is not produced in this country next season, there is no reason to doubt that the delay will be for one season only.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to be fearful lest an idea gain widespread credence that Sergei Koussevitzky, the next conductor of that orchestra, is exclusively a modernist, under whose baton the classics will suffer neglect and worse. The following pronouncement from the management of the orchestra is therefore deserving of special attention:—

"There seems to be an impression in America that Sergei Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who is to come to America next autumn to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an exclusive modernist as a program maker.

"This impression has probably arisen from the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky is the founder and head of a musical publishing firm in Russia, devoted to the principal worthy contemporary music of Russian and other composers. Mr. Koussevitzky has always been a champion of true genius, whether of our century or another.

"Nor has he favored any particular epoch or school. When he conducted his own orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd he gave special series devoted to the masterpieces of Bach, of Beethoven, and other masters."

Attention is further called to a statement of opinion by the English critic D. C. Parker, which appeared recently in "Musical America." Here is its summarizing close:—

"All that I heard Koussevitzky do convinces me that he will have no small vogue in America. He did not lead his forces through a single piece that had not benefited from the care he bestowed upon it—a care so solicitous for the welfare of the music that it extended to the smallest detail. More than most conductors, he made me confident that he felt the music. His was no humdrum routine job, no apathetic or desultory jog-trot to the double-bar. Each time he gave the signal for attack, it seemed as though the artist in him had begun anew the endless battle for what is great and noble in his world. But if it is within Koussevitzky's power thus to reach and dwell upon the heights, the altitude is attained at the price of no blighting uniformity. His Mozart, as exemplified in 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik,' is authentic Mozart—and how seldom one encounters it! His 'Venusberg Music' from 'Tannhauser,' has all the surge, lure and color which Wagner imparts. He catches the poetry which lies at the core of Bax's 'Garden of Fand.' And I should place conspicuous among his merits the ability to do full justice to the program of such a piece as 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and the emotional scheme of such a piece as 'The Poem of Ecstasy' without allowing the music to suffer thereby.

"Personality counts, but it is a power which, like other powers, can be used both profitably and unprofitably. Koussevitzky has it in generous measure. His heart and soul are at the end of his baton. I left his concerts sure that he knew the difficulties standing in the way of subtle and superior interpretation; that he was the last man in the world to take the quick and easy path which leads only to a passing notoriety with the unreflective. He realizes that without dust there can be no palm; that without devotion and concentration the triumph dare not be expected. He might well say, varying the words of a French king, 'L'orchestre, c'est moi,' for he makes the most of the material in his hands and welds his orchestra into one sensitive and responsive instrument. In gesture and movement he is neither reticent nor flamboyant. All he does has its significance. I see him still, drawing out of the orchestra those magic strains of Wagner in that peculiar way of his, as though he coaxed them from another sphere. Without a shadow of doubt, Koussevitzky is a born conductor, who will take his place among the notable personalities to whom the American public owes so much."

NEW YORK N. Y. TELEGRAM

BALTIMORE, MD. AMERICAN

AGIDE JACCHIA, conductor, who will lead the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight in the first concert in the history of its thirty-eight seasons to be broadcasted by radio.

—International Newsreel Photo.

BOSTON, MASS. CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

MAY 5 - 19

Saturday Audience Bids Farewell to Mr. Monteux

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of the twenty-fourth pair of concerts given in Symphony Hall Saturday evening. The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large silver loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhäuser" overture) the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after five years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
MAY 5 - 1924

Lightning Conductor' Coming

Serge Koussevitzky, Dynamic Russian, Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra in Autumn.

Probably no announcement of recent years has created more interest among music lovers than the one telling of the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky, the dynamic Russian conductor, to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next autumn. M. Koussevitzky's European fame has been growing so rapidly and so much has been reported of his striking personality that his coming to America is considered an event of the first importance.

In general he has been considered a modern of the moderns, and his connection with such a fine old institution as the Boston organization seems likely to make musical history. Ever since the dismemberment of his own orchestra by the revolution in Russia he is known to have wished for a genuine opportunity in this country, and conductorship of the Boston Symphony certainly will give him all the scope for his peculiar genius that he could desire.

For some time post he has been conducting the London Symphony Orchestra, where his work has attracted the attention of the foremost critics in Europe. One of the most interesting articles about him was written recently for the Christian Science Monitor by Herbert Antcliffe.

"Lightning Conductor."

Mr. Antcliffe declares that the description of "lightning conductor," which has been applied to him, is banal and scarcely exact. The nickname was invented, he explains, not because M. Koussevitzky takes the music at a quicker rate than other conductors or because his movements are of a more startling character, but because his engagements are so many and in such a widespread area that he is extremely difficult to catch.

The writer told of some amusing adventures in his attempt to get the conductor off to one side for a leisurely chat. He finally caught him atfer a concert.

"First of all," wrote Mr, Antcliffe, "he expressed his intense pleasure at the prospect of visiting America, and particularly of conducting there so fine and famous an orchestra. He had long wished to go to the New World, but there had been various difficulties, most of them concerned with artistic matters or with his engagements in Europe, that had prevented him from getting over previously, and now he was hoping to give his very best to a people who he knew would appreciate it.

"As one looked at him after a long and elaborate program, at the end of a strenuous season, and observed in him the same enthusiasm for his work and the same charm of manner as if he were just ready for the work instead of finishing it, there could be no question of his giving to the utmost of his ability. He is of a type that finds it impossible to give anything else.

Tours by Boat.

"It is this which has made possible the splendid series of concerts he gave when first he took up conducting for the benefit of his fellow countrymen, to whom he had to take music and musicians by boat down the lonely rivers of Russia. It is this that makes and keeps him famous the world over today.

"But he would tell me something of his ideas with regard to a season of orchestral music, some of which, if not all, he hoped to be able to put into practice at Boston. Primarily his aim in accepting the offer to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have a body of players under his regular control whom he can mould to his own artistic feelings, and with the Boston players, who have the reputation of being the finest orchestra in the world, he feels he will have this.

"Ever since the Russian revolution, which resulted in the disbandment of his own orchestra, he has been looking for something of the kind that would come up to his ideals, and he thinks he has now found it. It is only by having at his disposal such an orchestra that an artist can produce his most satisfying work, and with him all other aims are subservient to this.

Cannot Ignore It.

"It was a mistake," said Mr Koussevitzky, to imagine that he was a modernist in any exclusive sense. A glance at his programs with the London Symphony Orchestra for the present season, which included two symphonies of Beethoven, one of Haydn, one of Brahms, one of Boccherini and one of Tschaikowsky, was sufficient to contradict this idea. In Boston he would continue his work of giving his own conceptions of the classics, for he believed that every artist should have his individual and personal interpretation of these works.

"Nevertheless, he thinks that modern music must not be ignored or omitted from programs, for, apart from the question of providing proper openings for the stream of current art, it is only keeping up with the work of contemporary writers that an interpreter can give the best readings of the classics.

"Speaking of modern composers, he thought that at the present moment there were many highly talented musicians, France and England perhaps just now holding the lead, though other countries were not lacking in creative talent. As to America, he hopes that a more intimate association will result in his finding that the few works known in Europe are but the adumbration of a bright galaxy of compositions which have remained in their own country.

"Mr. Koussevitzky reiterated several times, because of some misapprehension that has arisen, that he is not out for propaganda, either on behalf of any nation or school of composers or for finincial purposes. He considers that the classics are the established basis of musical beauty, and that at the same time music cannot stand still.

"The modernists who have something to say and say it in a worthy manner must be heard alongside the classics, for they are the classics of tomorrow. And it is for the exercise of his own artistic feelings in both of them that he is accepting the post in Boston. In other words, he is an artist who is seeking the finest instrument and the best circumstances for the expression of his art, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston audiences he is sanguine that he has found them."

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

PERSONALS

MR. MONTEUX LEAVES BOSTON

Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Sails on Wednesday for Europe, Probably Will Never Return to This City

Pierre Monteux who on Saturday evening brought the season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a close, said farewell to this city today, when he left for New York to sail on Wednesday on the Cunard Line steamship Aquitania for his home in Paris, where Mrs. Monteux preceded him some months ago, called to France because of the illness of her mother, which proved fatal. It is probable that Mr. Monteux may never again come to Boston, now that he has finished his service here as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. His furniture and other household belongings were sent to Paris some time ago. He expects to conduct a series of five of six concerts this summer at Scheveningen, an annual musical event at that watering place in the Netherlands.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
MAY 5 - 1924

IN TO-DAY'S MAIL

M. MONTEUX'S GRATITUDE

To the Editor of The Evening Tribune:

May I be permitted through your columns to express my deep gratitude to those who so honored me at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall, Providence, last Tuesday evening? I most highly prize the handsome bronze which was presented, and I should like to acknowledge more especially the cordial friendliness which prompted the gift.

During the past five years I have greatly enjoyed my visits to Providence, always conscious of the sympathetic contact of my audience.

Yours sincerely,
PIERRE MONTEUX.

May 3, 1924.

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

Thanks from Pierre Monteux

To the Editor of The Providence News:

May I be permitted through your columns to express my deep gratitude to those who so honored me at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall, Providence, last Tuesday evening? I most highly prize the handsome bronze which was presented, and I should like to acknowledge more especially the cordial friendliness which prompted the gift.

During the past five years I have greatly enjoyed my visits to Providence, always conscious of the sympathetic contact of my audience.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Boston, May 4, 1924.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
MAY 5 - 1924

The opening concert of "Pops" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at 8:15 o'clock to-night will be broadcast by WNAC and WEAN, The Shepard Stores, Boston and Providence. The orchestra will be under the direction of Agide Jacchia.

NEW YORK
MAY 5 1924

"Victory Ball"

A novelty in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 22nd concert of its regular series was Ernest Schelling's tone-poem A Victory Ball. A peculiar enthusiasm for this work seems to have seized conductors this season. Pierre Monteux was one of the last to succumb. The Schelling opus is an interesting ex-

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Providence, [illegible]

FROM MR. MONTEUX

To the Editor of the Journal:

May I be permitted through your columns to express my deep gratitude to those who so honored me at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall, Providence, last Tuesday evening? I most highly prize the handsome bronze which was presented, and I should like to acknowledge more especially the cordial friendliness which prompted the gift.

During the past five years I have greatly enjoyed my visits to Providence, always conscious of the sympathetic contact of my audience.

Yours sincerely,
PIERRE MONTEUX.

Boston, May 5, 1924.

Boston Post
MAY 7

season for the organization.

Pierre Monteux Sails for His Home Today

Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who concluded the season at Symphony Hall last Saturday to a rousing ovation by Boston music lovers, will be a passenger on the Cunard Line steamer Aquitania sailing from New York today for Cherbourg and Southampton. Others of note leaving by the Aquitania will be John Hays Hammond, of Gloucester and Washington, the celebrated mining engineer, with Mrs. Hammond and Miss Natalie Hammond, who will spend the summer abroad; Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus L. Sinadinio, of Boston.

The Aquitania has one of the largest eastbound passenger lists of the present year.

periment, but scarcely a heaven-storming masterpiece. Based on a poem* by Alfred Noyes, which first appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, it tells, in music, the tale of the return to earth

© Paul Thompson
ALFRED NOYES
"Shadows of dead men stand by the wall"

of the spirits of soldiers slain in the late War. Instead of the solemn masses, purity, virtue, which they expect to find as a result of their sacrifices, they discover shameful and riotous dancing, sinful and boisterous merrymaking. The music is a fairly effective translation of this situation into sound. The mood throughout is one of gruesome hilarity. Ordinary dance-rhythms alternate with the booming of guns and the spirited tarantaras of the military bugle.

*Specimen stanzas:

I.
The cymbals crash,
And the dancers walk.
With long white stockings
And arms of chalk,
Butterfly skirts,
And white breasts bare,
And shadows of dead men
Watching 'em there.

II.
Shadows of dead men
Stand by the wall,
Watching the fun
Of the Victory Ball.
They do not reproach,
Because they know,
If they're forgotten
It's better so.

IV.
Fat wet bodies
Go waddling by,
Girdled with satin,
Though God knows why:
Gripped by satyrs
In white and black,
With a fat wet hand
On the fat wet back.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

PIERRE MONTEUX SAILS ON AQUITANIA TODAY

Pierre Monteux, who has terminated his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be among the passengers on the Cunarder Aquitania when she leaves New York today for Cherbourg and Southampton. Other local passengers will be Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond and their daughter, Natalie, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis.

PORTLAND,
ME.
ADVERTISER
7 1924

Monteux Left Today For Paris

Pierre Monteux sailed today from New York City on the Cunard Line Steamship Aquitania for Paris where he will pass some time. Mr. Monteux severed his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening after serving many years as its director. Mr. Monteux was in Portland with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its appearance this year and Mrs. Monteux and Madame Monteux were Portland visitors this Winter, and they were met by many of Portland's social set during their stay. Mrs. Monteux is now in Paris, having been called there suddenly by the illness of her mother who passed away. Monteux' work as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will linger in the memory of all musicians who were fortunate enough to witness his performance.

Miss Robinson Entertains

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE 49

NEW ENGLANDERS LEAVE TODAY ON S. S. AQUITANIA

The Cunard steamship Aquitania, sailing from New York today for Cherbourg and Southampton, will carry a large passenger list including many from New England. Among those booked are Pierre Monteux, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; John Hays Hammond, Mrs Hammond, Miss Natalie H. Hammond of Gloucester; Mr and Mrs Charles P. Curtis, Mr and Mrs Augustus L. Sinadinio and Themistocles A. Sinadinio of Boston.

The White Star Liner Homeric, making her first voyage since being converted into an oil burner, is due at New York early tomorrow from Southampton and Cherbourg. On board are Rear Admiral and Mrs Livingston Hunt, David W. Griffith and Mrs Samuel Carr of Boston.

LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAY 1924

Ellen Blinkhorn, one of Mrs. Toye's pupils, will accompany Elizabeth Blinkhorn in a reading to be given at St. Michael's school hall on Thursday and Friday evenings of this week.

Pierre Monteux, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sails today from New York on the Aquitania for his home in Paris. Mrs. Monteux on account of the illness of her mother preceded him some months ago. He expects to direct a series of concerts this summer at Scheveningen, the seashore resort near The Hague. His farewell concerts in Boston last week were made the occasion for unusual and spontaneous tributes of appreciation for his service in Boston, where he brought the famous orchestra back to the high standard of excellence which it had maintained before the war.

BROCKTON
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
1924

Heard in Brockton.

Although we no longer shall have the privilege of hearing the orchestra directly under Mr. Monteux's baton, we can still listen to an orchestra from which the influence of that baton will not soon have departed. The orchestra as he leaves it remains a perfect structure which can only glorify the efforts of the next man privileged to be its leader.

We in Brockton can count ourselves fortunate that we have three times had the opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Monteux's work has not been confined to his native France and the United States. He has conducted in Covent Garden and Drury Lane in London and in Vienna, Berlin and Budapest. He received his training at the Conservatoire de Paris where he studied solfeggio and harmony, counterpoint and fugue, besides the violin. From 1894 he conducted concerts in Paris, founding a series at the Casino de Paris to bring out examples of ultra-modern French music. In that city he also conducted at the Odeon, the Theatre de Champs Elysees and at the Chatelet. In 1916 he came to New York as conductor of the Russian Ballet and led the concerts of the Civic Orchestral Society in the summer of 1917. Between 1917 and 1919 he conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House and in the fall of 1918 took charge of the first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra pending the arrival of Rabaud, whom in 1919 he was elected to follow as permanent conductor.

50

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF

MAY 8 1924

Pop Concerts Open with 90-Piece Symphony

Radio fans will be able to hear the opening Pop concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be broadcast by station WBZ. These concerts are conducted by Agide Jacchia directing a symphony of eighty players, which is adequate for playing the most elaborate modern score.

These Pop concerts are as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden-domed State House and they are unique in the fact that there is nothing like them anywhere in this country. In the Summer of 1885 the propect of a supplementary series of concerts to the regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of popular character to suit the warmer season, was inaugurated. After the example of the Bilse concerts in Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed, tables installed and refreshments were served.

The experiment was an instant success. The "Promenade Concerts" soon came to be called the "Pops." While the Pops of this, the thirty-ninth season, follow the original idea to some extent, the idea has been enlarged to a great extent. In the first place, the orchestra has grown considerably—its full symphonic proportions are adequate and the music is taken somewhat more seriously, although light trifles for encores, waltzes, operetta selections, remain an integral part of the Pops.

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Retirement of M Monteux as Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

Correspondence of The Republican

Boston, May 7—The past week marked the ending of the engagement of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At the last rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and at the concert Saturday evening the profound regret of the large audiences was felt even through the vigorous applause showered on the departing leader. With the co-operation of the trustees of the orchestra, under the chairmanship of Judge Cabot, M Monteux has shown that no music is alien to him, that he is ready to produce a fine thing regardless of the nationality of the composer, that he is willing to revive an old thing though at present it is hardly remembered by the musical public, that he is able to maintain harmonious relations with his orchestra, and to keep its members on good terms with one another.

On Saturday afternoon, a few hours before the last concert, a farewell reception was given M Monteux, at which Judge Cabot made an address and presented the retiring conductor with an album in which the sentiments of his admirers were expressed and to which the signatures of all present were appended and of many more men and women representing the best in artistic, musical, literary and civic circles—in all more than 4000 signatures in a volume that M Monteux is carrying back proudly to Paris. Now the patrons of the Symphony concerts are turning their thoughts toward the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, for whom M Monteux has so thoroughly prepared the way.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

1 1924

Concerning Koussevitzky, New Boston Conductor

There seems to be an impression in America that Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who is to come to America next autumn to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an exclusive modernist as a program maker.

This impression has probably arisen from the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky is the founder and head of a musical publishing firm in Russia devoted to the principal worthy contemporary music of Russian and other composers.

Nor has he favored any particular epoch or school. When he conducted his own orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd he gave special series devoted to the masterpieces of Bach, of Beethoven, and other masters. His concert as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra last month included Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and symphonies by Brahms, Haydn, Schubert, Boccherini and Tchaikovsky.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 11 1924

Symphonic Summing-Up

Already in these columns there have appeared the respective records of the accomplishments during the year of our two Symphony Orchestras, both of which ended the season crowned with fresh laurels, with new standards of performance attained. And in the case of the Boston Symphony there stands forth as deserving of second and particular mention the remarkable and impressive conducting of George Schneevoigt at a pair of concerts in March; the admirable double performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund; the appearance of the English composer, Frank Bridge, and the American, Ernest Schelling, as conductors in their own music; the presence at a pair of concerts of Arthur Bliss, most dynamic of the younger Englishmen, on the occasion of the first American performance of his notable "Color Symphony"; the initial hearing in this city of Mahler's melodious First Symphony; the successful revival and repetition of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica"; and finally such welcome additions to the list of soloists as Vera Janacopulos, Wanda Landowska, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Lionel Tertis and Roland Hayes.

Likewise should mention be made, under the head of Symphony concerts, of the pleasing "candlelight concerts" of Mr. Martino's 18th Century Orchestra, and of the orchestral concert, at the St. James Theatre, in which John Pompeo led in animated fashion the band of 70-odd that bore his name.

NEW YORK
WORLD

MAY 11 1924

Spalding to Play New Concerto in Paris.

Albert Spalding, who has been on concert tour of Europe since April , when he opende his present tour at Amsterdam as soloist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, has just been engaged by Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Paris Orchestra, to give the first performance in Paris of the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto for violin and orchestra at the Opera in Paris on Thursday.

Negotiations are now under way to have Mr. Spalding play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Of a program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which contained Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune," Philip Hale remarked that "the fame of Debussy will probably rest on 'Pelleas et Melisande,' one of the few great operas of the world, 'The Afternoon of a Faun,' and a few songs and piano pieces."

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

SAY ADIEU TO NOTED MUSICIAN

Mrs. C. A. Huber and Miss Charlotte Gregg, Pianistes, Aid in Sendoff to Monteaux

TWO Rochester pianistes, Mrs. C. A. Huber of Monroe avenue and Miss Charlotte Gregg of the Sagamore, were in an assemblage of artists who attended the recent farewell reception in New York for Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many of the most famous artists of the concert stage and the Metropolitan musical world gathered at the home of Mrs. Frederick Steinway at the Algonquin Hotel to honor the departing genius.

Ernest Schelling was master of ceremonies and other famous guests included Alma Gluck, Alexander Lambert, Yolando Mero, Conductor Gloschmann of the Swedish Ballet and Moritz Rosenthal, who appeared as soloist in the final concert of the Boston Symphony.

The overwhelming success attained by Rosenthal in his appearance with the symphony players was especially gratifying to Miss Gregg and Mrs. Huber, both of whom were his pupils. He greeted them following his recital at Carnegie Hall and said he was looking forward to the recital he is to give at the Eastman Theater next season.

The Rochester musicians also enjoyed an unusual musical evening with Vladimir DePachman, veteran Russian virtuoso, as the guests of Signora Alice Palleotelli, who is in New York on a mission from the Mussolini government.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

Pierre Monteux has left Boston for Europe with barrels full of laurels after his several immensely successful years as conductor of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, whose original conductor, let it not be forgotten, was our own Sir George Henschel. Hail and farewell! they are saying over there. Meanwhile, his successor, Sergei Kusewitzky, has declared his intention to "introduce the American public to some modern Russian music, which I consider most interesting. German music is in decadence now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years," he declared to a reporter, adding that "the new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France"—the which, I take leave to say, is surely a little ungrateful to the music of this country, in which Kusewitzky made a reputation for himself as conductor before France and Spain had known him for anything but an expert double-bass virtuoso. But 'twas ever thus.—Daily Telegraph.

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

Albert Spalding has been engaged by Serge Koussevitzky to give the first Paris performance of Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra at the Opera this Thursday evening. Negotiations are under way for Mr. Spalding to give the first New York and Boston performances of the work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, next season.

MEMPHIS
TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

MAY 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, a dominating figure among orchestral conductors of Europe, who has been engaged to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

MONTEAUX AND GILBERT

At a dinner given to Mr. Monteux by the Composers' Club of Boston shortly before the last Symphony concert, Henry F. Gilbert, the president of the club, spoke as follows:

"My dear, Mr. Montaux, before saying good-by and God-speed to you, there are one or two points on which I feel that I should like to compliment you. I feel that I can do so, not only as expressing my individual opinion, but as representing the feeling and thought of many of us.

"Aside from the integrity and delicacy of your musical interpretations, I think you are particularly to be applauded for the sane and balanced catholicity of the programs which you have given us during the last five years. I made a study of one year's programs, a couple of years ago, the result of which aroused my admiration for the fair-minded and unprejudiced manner in which you had presented to us the music of the world.

"Then again, speaking as one who is greatly interested in the art of musical composition in America, I must sincerely applaud your presentation during the last few years of such a large number of compositions by American composers. Publicity is certainly the best friend of the composer. Without it he is nothing, and his growth or development is most seriously interfered with. Therefore in pursuing this generous policy you have in my opinion, definitely helped along the art of musical composition in America.

"Now owing to the present arid state of affairs, we shall not be able to drink your health in anything stronger than ginger ale. But do not be confused and get the feebleness of the beverage mixed up in any way with the character of our sentiments. I now propose that we drink to the continued health, happiness and prosperity of Pierre Monteux."

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Rumania Decorates New Yorkers.

Several New York men, including Major Gen. John F. O'Ryan, have been decorated by King Ferdinand of Rumania, according to word received by the Rumanian Consulate in this city. Decorations, some of which have been awarded to residents of other cities, are: Commander of the Crown of Rumania, Major Gen. Roy Hoffman. Officers of the Crown of Rumania, Louis Wiley, S. A. McClung, former Honorary Consul of Rumania in New York; Dr. Leopold Stokowski, Conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ossip Gabrilowitch, pianist; Major Gen. O'Ryan, Richard L. Cook. Cavaliers of the Crown of Rumania, Bernard A. Flood, Major Thomas C. McDonald, John Wells, Cavalier of the Star of Rumania, Richard W. O'Neill, author.

Albany News
MAY 14 1924

Harold Bauer, pianist, who will give the entire program on the second evening of the May festival of the Albany Mothers' club Wednesday night in Chancellor's hall, Education building, was born in England of a family of which every member was musical. As a boy his gifts attracted wide attention, particularly his violin playing and a violinist's career was uppermost in his mind until Paderewski persuaded him that his greater talent was for the piano. After a period of study in Paris, for many years his home, Mr. Bauer's debut was made under most propitious circumstances. In America, Bauer made his first appearance in 1900 with the Boston Symphony orchestra and since then has played with every symphony orchestra in America and has given recitals in every important musical center in the United States.

The seat sale for the May festival Tuesday and Wednesday nights opened this morning at Cluett's. Proceeds of the two evenings of music will be devoted to child welfare work.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

Kussevitsky as a Magnetic Personality —Prokofieff and the Powers of Evil

N.Y. Times, June 15, 1924

By OLIN DOWNES.

PARIS, May 30.—It is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this Spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naïveté. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his Spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

Kussevitsky a Storm Centre.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides a irresistible sensation or two for an or[illegible] entitled a public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anyhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause. "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have a certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus and orchestra, "Sept, ils sont sept," after an invocation of the seven gods of evil found in a cuneiform inscription of the pre-Babylonian era. Schmitt has two new compositions, short orchestral pieces, the first of which is "La Tristesse de Pan," an orchestral version of the piano piece which he, in common with Stravinsky, Dukas, Malapiero, Bartols and others, composed when Debussy died under the collective title of "Tombeau de Debussy," and a second piece, "La Tragique Chevauchée," a modern French musical fantasy inspired by the ride of Byron's "Manfred." Of other times and tastes, and also for music of a simplicity and beauty very grateful by contrast to the ear, are Corelli's first "concerto grosso" for strings; the three nocturnes of Debussy, including the last, the "Sirènes," for voices and orchestra, and the superb dances from Borodine's "Prince Igor," in which, again, the chorus is employed.

A half hour or thereabouts after the time announced for the beginning of the concert Kussevitsky enters, steps quickly through the orchestra to his stand, raps for attention and commences without more ado the Corelli concerto. There are strong divisions of opinion here, as there will be in America, concerning his conducting; but there can be no question of his arousing keen public interest as man and musician; and, whether or not one agrees with his conceptions, it is hardly possible, after listening and talking to him, to doubt his sincer[illegible] On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes. And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions, a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one to a conductor whose name also contains the letters [illegible] and [illegible] in its final syllable. [illegible] he has the habit of [illegible] allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

[illegible] Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necessary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heyday of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetic to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the program, may be roughly indicated as follows:

Telal! Telal! Telal! Telal!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven * * *
They know neither kindness nor mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse,
They are deaf to prayers or to supplications * * *
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Nôtre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opéra, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch against complicated opposing forces. The voice glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equaled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another age or planet, groomed and dressed in the style of today—come to examine a world upon which he may have sinister designs! A queer fellow, who seems to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helplessness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Stravinsky Concerto.

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concert exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in this concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator — to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Kussevitsky's Interpretations.

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next Winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programs for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programs for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the Fifth Symphony.

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

HIPOLITO LAZARO.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish [illegible] gave a recital on Thursday evening, June 19, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Lazaro is a member of the Metropolitan Opera after a four years' engagement at the close of the present season. He joined Mascagni in Italy and created the tenor rôle at the première at La Scala of a new opera, "Il Piccolo Marat" (written expressly for this singer). Mr. Lazaro appeared in it more than seventy times, in Italy, Spain and Argentina. In Italy the Order of the Crown of Italy was conferred on him, and in Spain he received the Order of El Cordon de Alfonso XIII. In his operatic tour through Italy, Spain and South America, the Metropolitan tenor added another success in "La Parisina," also written for him. Mr. Lazaro will make New York his home for the summer months.

For the last four years S. L. Rothafel has directed the artistic destinies of the Capitol Theatre. Mr. Rothafel has been associated for ten years with motion picture theatres on Broadway. It was he who first coordinated a symphonic orchestra with motion pictures, adding solos and a ballet, an example which has been followed by all important cinema theatres. The Capitol Theatre has an orchestra of seventy-five pieces, a ballet of soloists, and gives opera in a condensed form. Many artists who now are known on the concert or opera stage graduated from the motion picture theatre.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish Tenor, Gives Recital at Carnegie Hall, June 19.

Photo by White Studio.

S. L. Rothafel of the Capitol Theatre, Who Introduced Symphonic Orchestras in to Picture Houses.

Ravinia Park Begins Season June 21 Personnel of Stadium Orchestra

THE thirteenth season of opera and concerts at Ravinia Park opens June 21 with the double bill of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," sung by all-star casts. Louis Eckstein, the responsible head, has spared no pains to insure the success of the ten weeks. The répertoire of thirty-four operas, besides standard works, will include several novelties to the public. "La Légende du Point d'Argentan," by Fourdrain, will receive its American première.

Conductors—Eric De Lamarter, Louis Hasselmans, Gennaro Papi, Wilfrid Pelletier and Giacomo Spadoni. Stage Director—Armando Agnini. Singers—Lucrezia Bori, Florence Easton, Margery Maxwell, Graziella Pareto, Thalia Sabanieva, Merle Alcock, Ina Bourskaya, Anna Correnti, Philine Falco, Jeanne Gordon, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Giovanni Martinelli, Armand Tokatyan, Giordano Paltrinieri, Vicente Ballester, Mario Basiola, Giuseppe Danise, Louis D'Angelo, Desire Defrene, Paolo Ananian, Virginio Lazzari and Leon Rothier.

Such an array of talent permits of an extensive répertoire, with frequent changes of cast, and this policy, inaugurated last year, will be followed throughout the coming season.

A series of four open-air operas will be given under the auspices of the Civic Opera Association of New York at the Polo Grounds on the nights of June 19, June 24, July 1 and July 8. Many of this country's artists will be heard in some of their favorite rôles. On the opening night Mme. Frances Peralta will appear for the first time in the title rôle of Carmen. Others in the cast will be Dmitry Dobkin, Grace Anthony, William Gustafson, Gertrude Wieder and Martin Horodas.

On the third night of the series—July 1—Carmela Ponselle will make her début as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Miss Ponselle will be assisted by H. Haesler, Dmitry Dobkin, Vito Moscato and Gertrude Wieder.

Eight weeks of Summer grand opera is announced for Cincinnati. The Zoo Opera Company will open the season Monday evening, June 22, and will present six performances each week.

The operas selected are "Mefistofele," "Rigoletto," "Butterfly," "Barber of Seville," "Bohème," "Martha," "Manon" (by Massenet), "Lakmé," "Lohengrin," "Traviata," "Aïda," "Carmen," "La Gioconda," "L'Elisir d'Amore."

Artists engaged are Mmes. Edith De Lys, Anita Klinova, Ludovico Tomarchio, Mario Valle, Italo Picchi, Natale Cervi, Josephine Lucchese, Stella De Metta, Rogelio Baldrici and Milo Picco. Forty-five musicians from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra have been engaged.

Philharmonic patrons will see several new faces on the platform when the orchestra assembles again for the opening of the Stadium concerts July 3, but almost all of the old familiar faces will be present. The whole orchestra for the season of 1924-25 is now under contract, and the personnel for the Stadium series will be identical with that for next Fall, with a few exceptions.

The only new "first desk" man for the coming season is Hans Lange, who will be assistant concertmaster. Mr. Lange, who has been with the orchestra for several years, was formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor with Willem Mengelberg in Frankfurt. Scipione Guidi will continue as concertmaster and will make his first Stadium appearance in that capacity this Summer.

Leo Schulz and Cornelius Van Vliet again will share the solo cello work, Mr. Schulz occupying that post in the first half of the season and Mr. Van Vliet in the second half. Mr. Schulz, who celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary with the Philharmonic last Winter, will take a vacation this Summer, and will be the only "first desk" man missing from the Stadium personnel. A. Bass and Oswaldo Mazzucchi, both of whom have been with the orchestra for several years, have been appointed assistant solo cellists. Mr. Mazzucchi is a member of the Philharmonic String Quartet. Umberto Buldrini and Anselme Fortier will again be solo basses.

There will be three newcomers in the wood-wind section. R. Mortimer Willson, considered one of the most promising of American flutists, will join the Philharmonic this Summer, as will Paul Gerhardt, oboe, and Jacob Gehrhardt, E flat clarinet. John Amens, who joined the orchestra last season, will continue as first flute and will make his Stadium début this Summer. E. F. Wagner will again be piccolo player; Bruno Labate, solo oboe; Peter Strano, English horn; Sem Bellison, solo clarinet, and Edmond Roelofsma will be bass clarinet and assistant solo clarinet. Benjamin Kohon continues as solo bassoon, Roberto Sensale as assistant solo bassoon and Oskar Modess as contra bassoon.

Bruno Jaenicke remains solo horn, with Maurice Van Praag as alternate solo horn, and the brass section will be headed by Harry Glantz, solo trumpet; Mario Falcone, solo trombone, and Fred Gelb, tuba. Albert Friese, the celebrated Philharmonic tympanist, will again be seen in action, and Theodore Cella and Miss S. Goldner will be harpists. Henry Boewig will continue to rule over the Philharmonic library, with Emil Greinert as his assistant, and the inimitable "Jimmy" Carroll will again be baggagemaster. Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the orchestra for several seasons, will continue to act in that capacity.

Mme. Schumann-Heink gives a concert at the Hollywood Bowl today under the auspices of the American Legion. The concert will be a birthday celebration, as this will be the sixty-third birthday of Mme. Schumann-Heink.

The postponement of the Bach Festival at Bethlehem has created much sympathy for Dr. Fred Wolle, whose physicians have ordered a complete rest. It will probably be October before he can resume work with his chorus. It is understood that there will be no festival this year, but that the event will take place in 1925 at the usual date.

Mme. Gadski has signed a contract with the Keith vaudeville for a tour to begin shortly. It is understood that she will play only in the larger cities of the East. Mme. Gadski for many years was one of the artists of the Metropolitan, and is also known as a concert singer.

"Der Rosenkavalier" in England

PEOPLE are still debating whether 'Salome' is Strauss's worst opera or not," writes The London Times critic, "but there can be little doubt that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is his best. The reason is that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is Strauss and only Strauss; it had no existence without him. His librettist gave him just enough to set his fancy roving. He could be just as fantastic and extravagant as he liked, and he let himself go. The great joy of the performance, surely one of the best of any opera which has been seen and heard at Covent Garden within present memory, lay in the way Herr Bruno Walter and his players handled the good gifts of the composer. The range of tone was enormous, and yet the general impression of the score, at any rate through two-thirds of the opera, was one of extraordinary lightness. The opera was almost as finely sung as played, for not only was it an admirably chosen cast, but the whole was exquisitely dovetailed together. First among the principals was Herr Richard Mayer, whose Baron Ochs is famous, but who was seen and heard in this country now for the first time. The three principal ladies, Mme. Lotte Lehmann, Mme. Delia Reinhardt and Mme. Elizabeth Schumann, all sang with purity and complete understanding of their parts."

The first Italian opera since 1914 began a four weeks' season at Covent Garden June 4 with "Rigoletto." Alfred Piccaver, who sang the title part, is claimed by The London Daily Telegraph as a native of Lincolnshire and not Chicago. The répertoire includes "Bohème," "Lucia," "Butterfly," "Manon Lescaut," &c. Among the artists are Mmes. Louise Edvina, Delia Reinhardt, Norina, Virginie Perry, Selma Kurtz and Maria Ivogun; Messrs. Joseph Hislop, Cesare Formichi, Edouard Cotreuil, Dinh Gilly, Harold Williams and Sampieri. Musical director, Panizza. Maria Ivogun appeared in "Rigoletto" with great success.

Zandonai's new violin concerto "Romantic" was played in London by Emilio Tromben. The Times thought that the actual themes seemed hardly significant enough to bear the weight of so large a work. "This remark applies especially to the first theme, which recurs in the last movement and gives a kind of unity to the whole. There are three movements, the first of which is very strenuous but without real strength; the second is marked con dolore profondo, and contains, after a good deal of uninteresting material, one passage of considerable if rather facile beauty; the finale is the least satisfactory, being mainly taken up with not very felicitous virtuoso passages for the violin."

Casella's "Cadences"

THE London Daily Telegraph gives a brief résumé of a treatise by Casella on the "Evolution of Music."

"He has put together an original work that must be as useful to the student of composition as it is entertaining to the real amateur of music; and his publishers are so certain of its wide appeal that they have issued it in three languages—Italian, French and English, preface, text and all—under one cover. Casella's aim has been to trace the 'gradual formation and development, during the slow course of centuries, of the principal elements of our magnificent edifice of modern music.' On the face of it such a proposition would appear to be altogether too tedious and, in one volume, impracticable. Our author saw that some technical formula was necessary, something that would summarize the chief features of the modern tonal system. So he selected the 'perfect cadence,' that 'full close' of musical grammar, and chose 100 'perfect cadences' from the fourteenth century to the present day. And the result is a masterpiece of condensation. A brief historical and theoretical essay on the nature and formation of 'modern' music, 100 illustrations in chronological order, curtly annotated, and the thing was done. What Casella means by a 'perfect cadence' may be understood when it is remarked that certain contemporary specimens are quoted from pages of Zoltan Kodaly, Malipiero, Erik Satie, Lord Berners and Arnold Schönberg."

The history of the new opera, "Anna Karenine," of Robbiani, given for the first time in Rome a week after "Nerone" in Milan, illustrates the huge difficulties that accompany the production of modern operas, says The London Daily Telegraph correspondent. "Robbiani, who had already produced an operatic work, 'Esvella,' given in Rome in 1911, had finished his next opera, 'Anna Karenine,' in 1915, and it took nine long years of patient waiting before it could see the light of a public performance. It is some consolation to think that 'Nerone' was nearly fifty years in preparation. Fortunately Robbiani's fate has not been quite so bad. His new opera is naturally taken from the novel of Tolstoi, from which it selects the four most salient incidents.

"The situations are of great dramatic effect, and Robbiani made laudable efforts to interpret them with realistic dramatic music. The orchestration seemed at times disconnected, confusing and noisy, but is generally effective. The composer is far more successful in the quiet, romantic scenes and when portraying the softer emotions, and there are passages in the new opera worthy of a really great master, which elicited unstinted applause. The opera was awarded one of the State prizes last year given to encourage operatic productions."

Twelve Orchestral Conductors

TWELVE orchestral conductors" are considered by M. Dominique Sordet in a book of this title issued in Paris. Orchestra leaders, it seems, are a curious race of virtuosi, endowed by nature with a species of radioactivity which enables them to exercise a secret collective pressure on the subconsciousness of any group of instrumentalists which disciplines their wills. It is known that several remarkable directors are mediocre musicians and that many first-class musicians are quite unable to conduct. Directors are "wizards"; they utilize this mysterious magnetic reaction. There are directors who are disliked by their men, who, nevertheless, in the course of a performance obtain from them a devotion which is more than mere professional pride; this magnetic fluid operates unnoticed. The writer thinks "that the great symphonic orchestras of today are unique; tomorrow they may no longer exist in their present state of perfection, because the spirit which animates them is dying out; the musicians no longer work disinterestedly for the love of art; they have become commercialized. An audience may not be highly educated musically, but it will not escape the boredom which is diffused by a mediocre concert. If the musicians lower their standards, the audiences will vanish. M. Sordet chooses for his portraits the following conductors: Koussevitzky, one of the magnetic virtuosi; Gabriel Pierné of the Concerts Colonne, one of the best interpreters of Debussy, Rhené-Baton, Paul Paray, Golschmann and André Caplet; Camille Chevillard, one of the most severe and redoubtable of conductors; then the director of theatres, Albert Wolff; Ruhlmann, Busser, Frigara, Philippe Gaubert and Ingelbrecht."

The Mozart Festival organized in Paris by Mme. Walska and Walter Straram at the Théatre des Champs Elysées must be distinguished from the performances of the Vienna Opera. The former gave "Don Giovanni," "Cosi fan Tutte" and "Les Nozze di Figaro." Two symphonic concerts were scheduled for June 10 and 17, besides a special performance of the "Requiem." Irene Williams was engaged to sing the prima donna rôle in "Cosi fan Tutte" and will also sing in the "Requiem." The orchestra was chosen from the pick of the Concerts du Conservatoire, Colonne and Lamoureux.

The artistic season of the Eighth Olympiad pursues its course; Pavlowa at the Théatre des Champs Elysées danced for Paris in May, Pablo Casals directed his Barcelona symphonic orchestra in a concert, assisted by Thibaud and Cortot. The Russian ballet from Monte Carlo, organized by Serge Diaghilev, appeared in "Les Tentations de la Bergère," directed by Henri Cassadesus, who had [illegible]orchestrated the score of Monteclair; "Les Biches (by Francis Poulenc), directed by Messager, and "Les Noces" of Stravinsky, directed by Pierre Monteux. Josef Hofmann also gave a piano recital.

M. George Hüe, member of the Institute, has finished the music for "Riquet a la Houppe," a lyric comedy in three acts and a prologue, taken from "Les contes de Perrault," by M. Raoul Gastambide.

Music Notes Afield

THE Goldman Band Concerts will continue their performances on the Mall, Central Park, as usual next week, excepting Tuesday and Thursday. Today they will give a sacred program with Wiano Kauppi as soloist. Lotti Madden will be the soloist Monday evening in a miscellaneous program, on Wednesday evening there will be a Russian program, Friday evening will be devoted to Beethoven. Frances Sabel will sing on Saturday and Miriam Fine on Sunday.

Ernest Bloch, the American composer, has been notified by Eduard Mörike that his "Two Psalms" will be performed at the Berlin and Dresden concerts next Winter.

Queen Elena, the Princesses Maria and Mafalda and the court attended the operetta, "The Sleeping Beauty," at the Teatro del Piccoli, Rome. Vittorio Podrecca and Romano Fidora received their royal Highnesses and have been commanded to give a performance at the Quirinal.

The new concerto for piano and orchestra which Leo Ornstein has finished has been accepted by Leopold Stowkowski for first performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra next season. Mr. Ornstein will play the piano part.

The music written by Richard Strauss for the wedding of his son in Vienna last January has been published.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah," dramatized by William Dodd Chenery, was given at the Boston Opera House May 16. Nearly 400 persons took part.

Charles Martin Loeffler, the Bostonian composer, has won the prize of $1,000 offered this Spring by the North Shore Festival Committee of Evanston with a new orchestral piece, "Memories of Childhood: Life in a Russian Village." It was played by Frederick Stock and his orchestra.

Dusolina Giannini will make her London début in a recital at Queen's Hall on June 19. This will be followed by an orchestral appearance at the same hall on July 1 with the London Symphony, under the leadership of Henri Verbrugghen.

Singapore

SINGAPORE has become the musical base of the British Asiatic Empire. The Morning Post publishes a résumé of the activities of Major St. Clair, who founded the Singapore Philharmonic Society and the Singapore Orchestra, of which he was conductor for many years. He is now 75. Singapore started its free concerts for children in 1899 and with a small Government gift they are self-supporting. Children of every race attend these concerts. Europeans, Eurasians, Chinese, Malays, Cingalese and Indians are brought under the spell of the greatest art the modern Western world has produced.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WE

Kussevitsky as a Magnetic Personality —Prokofieff and the Powers of Evil

N.Y. Times, June 15, 1924

By OLIN DOWNES.

PARIS, May 30.—It is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this Spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naïveté. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his Spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

Kussevitsky a Storm Centre.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an orchestra [illegible] men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anyhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus "Prince Igor," in which, again, the chorus is employed.

A half hour or thereabouts after the time announced for the beginning of the concert Kussevitsky enters, steps quickly through the orchestra to his stand, raps for attention and commences without more ado the Corelli concerto. There are strong divisions of opinion here, as there will be in America, concerning his conducting; but there can be no question of his arousing keen public interest as man and musician; and, whether or not one agrees with his conceptions, it is hardly possible, after listening and talking to him, to doubt his sincerity.

On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes. And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters [illegible] and [illegible] in its final syllable, [illegible] he is the habit of that conductor is he [illegible] allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

[illegible] Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necessary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heyday of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamentally [illegible] to its orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Nôtre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opéra, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch against complicated opposing forces. The voice glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equaled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another age or planet, groomed and dressed in the style of today—come to examine a world upon which he may have sinister designs! A queer fellow, who seems to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helplessness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Stravinsky Concero.

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concert exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in this concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish Tenor, Gives Recital at Carnegie Hall, June 19.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programs for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programs for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the [illegible] massive and powerful, and there [illegible] need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

HIPOLITO LAZARO.

[illegible]ito Lazaro, the Spani[illegible] [illegible]evening, [illegible] give[illegible] [illegible]e 19, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Lazaro [illegible] the Metropolitan Opera after a four [illegible]rs' engagement at the close of the [illegible]l season. He joined Mascagni in [illegible]y and created the tenor rôle at the [illegible]nière at La Scala of a new opera, "Il [illegible]olo Marat" (written expressly for [illegible] singer). Mr. Lazaro appeared in it [illegible]e than seventy times, in Italy, Spain [illegible] Argentina. In Italy the Order of [illegible] Crown of Italy was conferred on [illegible] and in Spain he received the Order [illegible]El Cordon de Alfonso XIII. In his [illegible]atic tour through Italy, Spain and [illegible]h America, the Metropolitan tenor [illegible]ed another success in "La Pari[illegible]," also written for him. Mr. Lazaro [illegible] make New York his home for the [illegible]mer months.

[illegible] the last four years S. L. Rothafel [illegible]has directed the artistic destinies of the C[illegible]ol Theatre. Mr. Rothafel has been [illegible]ated for ten years with motion pic[illegible]e theatres on Broadway. It was he [illegible]who first coordinated a symphonic or[illegible]ra with motion pictures, adding so[illegible] and a ballet, an example which ha[illegible]been followed by all important cin[illegible]e theatres. The Capitol Theatre has

Ravinia Park Beg[illegible] Personn[illegible]

THE thirteenth season of opera and concerts at Ravinia Park opens June 21 with the double bill of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," sung by all-star casts. Louis Eckstein, the responsible head, has spared no pains to insure the success of the ten weeks. The répertoire of thirty-four operas, besides standard works, will include several novelties to the public. "La Légende du Point d'Argentan," by Fourdrain, will receive its American première.

Conductors—Eric De Lamarter, Louis Hasselmans, Gennaro Papi, Wilfrid Pelletier and Giacomo Spadoni. Stage Director—Armando Agnini. Singers—Lucrezia Bori, Florence Easton, Margery Maxwell, Graziella Pareto, Thalia Sabanieva, Merle Alcock, Ina Bourskaya, Anna Correnti, Philine Falco, Jeanne Gordon, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Giovanni Martinelli, Armand Tokatyan, Giordano Paltrinieri, Vicente Ballester, Mario Basiola, Giuseppe Danise, Louis D'Angelo, Desire Defrene, Paolo Ananian, Virginio Lazzari and Leon Rothier.

Such an array of talent permits of an extensive répertoire, with frequent changes of cast, and this policy, inaugurated last year, will be followed throughout the coming season.

A series of four open-air operas will be given under the auspices of the Civic Opera Association of New York at the Polo Grounds on the nights of June 19, June 24, July 1 and July 8. Many of this country's artists will be heard in some of their favorite rôles. On the opening night Mme. Frances Peralta will appear for the first time in the title rôle of Carmen. Others in the cast will be Dmitry Dobkin, Grace Anthony, William Gustafson, Gertrude Wieder and Martin Horodas.

On the third night of the series—July 1—Carmela Ponselle will make her début as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Miss Ponselle will be assisted by H. Haesler, Dmitry Dobkin, Vito Moscato and Gertrude Wieder.

Eight weeks of Summer grand opera [illegible] announced for Cincinnati. The Zoo [illegible]pera Company will open the season [illegible]nday evening, June 22, and will pre[illegible] six performances each week.

[illegible]e operas selected are "Mefistofele," [illegible]oletto," "Butterfly," "Barber of [illegible]le," "Bohème," "Martha," "Ma[illegible] (by Massenet), "Lakmé," "Lohengr[illegible]," "Traviata," "Aïda," "Carmen," "L[illegible]ioconda," "L'Elisir d'Amore."

A[illegible]ts engaged are Mmes. Edith De Ly[illegible]Anita Klinova, Ludovico Tomarchio[illegible]Mario Valle, Italo Picchi, Natale Cerv[illegible]Josephine Lucchese, Stella De Mett[illegible]Rogelio Baldrici and Milo Picco.

Fo[illegible]-five musicians from the Cincinnati [illegible]mphony Orchestra have been engage[illegible]

Philharmonic patrons will see several new[illegible]hen on the platform when the orc[illegible]tra assembles again for the opening [illegible] the Stadium concerts July 3, but a[illegible]st all of the old familiar faces will [illegible]present. The whole orchestra for the season of 1924-25 is now under contract, and the personnel for the Stadium series will be identical with that for next Fall, with a few exceptions.

The only new "first desk" man for the coming season is Hans Lange, who will be assistant concertmaster. Mr. Lange, who has been with the orchestra for several years, was formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor with Willem Mengelberg in Frankfurt. Scipione Guidi will continue as concertmaster and will make his first Stadium [illegible]appearan[illegible]mer.

Leo S[illegible]again w[illegible]Mr. Sch[illegible]first ha[illegible]Vliet in[illegible]who cele[illegible]sary wit[illegible]will tak[illegible]will be t[illegible]ing fro[illegible]Bass an[illegible]whom h[illegible]several [illegible]sistant [illegible]a memb[illegible]Quartet. Fortier [illegible]

There [illegible]wood-wi[illegible]consider[illegible]America[illegible]monic t[illegible]hardt, o[illegible]clarinet, [illegible]orchestr[illegible]first flu[illegible]début th[illegible]again be[illegible]solo obo[illegible]Sem Bel[illegible]Roelofsm[illegible]sistant [illegible]continue[illegible]sale as [illegible]Modess [illegible]Bruno [illegible]with Ma[illegible]solo hor[illegible]

"D[illegible]

PEO[illegible]'S[illegible]or[illegible]critic, '[illegible]that 'De[illegible]reason [illegible]Strauss [illegible]istence [illegible]him just[illegible]He coul[illegible]travagan[illegible]go. The[illegible]surely c[illegible]which h[illegible]vent Ga[illegible]In the w[illegible]players [illegible]compose[illegible]mous, a[illegible]of the s[illegible]thirds o[illegible]dinary I[illegible]as finel[illegible]was it [illegible]the who[illegible]gether. Herr R[illegible]is famou[illegible]in this [illegible]The thr[illegible]Lehman[illegible]Mme. El[illegible]purity [illegible]their pa[illegible]

The f[illegible]began a[illegible]Garden [illegible]fred Pic[illegible]is claim[illegible]graph a[illegible]not Chi[illegible]"Bohèm[illegible]non Les[illegible]are Mm[illegible]hardt, [illegible]

Twelve Orchestral [illegible]

TWELVE orchestral conductors" are considered by M. Dominique Sordet in a book of this title issued in Paris. Orchestra leaders, it seems, are a curious race of virtuosi, endowed by nature with a species of radioactivity which enables them to exercise a secret collective pressure on the subconsciousness of any group of instrumentalists which disciplines their wills. It is known that several remarkable directors are mediocre musicians and that many first-class musicians are quite unable to Poulenc[illegible]"Les N[illegible]Pierre [illegible]gave a [illegible]

M. Ge[illegible]tute, has[illegible]a la Ho[illegible]acts an[illegible]contes o[illegible]tambide[illegible]

Mu[illegible]

MMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

ersonality wers of Evil

hestral combinations and harmonies jagged and unbeautiful as the gar-les on Nôtre Dame. The task of solo tenor, admirably executed by Fabert of the Opéra, is really htful. He must intone his lines in manner sometimes verging on ch, or yells, instead of song, and with a dramatic intensity that will him physically as well as emotion-, to say nothing of maintaining thm and pitch against complicated osing forces. The voice glides ough intervals that cannot be re-ed to notation, and with a barbaric ness difficult to describe. Few ld have equaled M. Fabert in his . The orchestra thuds and seethes erupts. A strange piece with a sognomy all its own, and a re-kable conclusion.

ne listened to that crude, savage, f-articulate music and glanced up-d at the loge where Prokofieff was ing—Prokofieff, the front of whose d is bald, whose face, nevertheless, ms incredibly young and very cere-i, like a being who has come from ther age or planet, groomed and ssed in the style of today—come to mine a world upon which he may e sinister designs! A queer fellow, o seems to be delving, musically, in certain hinterland of the human sciousness, listening to what he discovered there, with as much nness and detachment as if he had n a scientist discussing the theory evolution e rose from his seat and bowed as iably as you please to enormous ap-use, as the composition came to an d—a sudden hush that falls over rus and orchestra, an effect of ut-prostration and helplessness in the sence of unfathomable mystery. e murmurs of the chorus are heard tantly, from far off, through the rdium of the orchestra. A curious siness!

Stravinsky Concero.

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, remely self-possessed, who played concert exactly as we knew he uld before he even entered the hall, h a clean-cut, electrical vigor that d no softness or sentiment in it, with precision and rhythmical force in-arable from the composer of "The es of Spring." His finger technic s as clean as a steel blade, and his sical thinking, as composer and former, was as clean as that, too. ain, in this concerto, he has done a w thing, and this by means of a e that is essentially classic. There n opening theme in the manner of horale. It is developed frugally, h great vigor and life, and with ny a fine grinding dissonance, adly speaking, after the manner of ch. The treatment is lengthy and borate, incisive and full of contra-ntal resource. The slow movement s more lyrical qualities, though not ry much of sensuous beauty. The ale resumes contrapuntal proce-re. Toward the last the composer kes bold employment of syncopa-n somewhat in the manner of Amer-n ragtime, in which, as we know, ravinsky, with other leading Euro-an composers, has been much in-rested. With more and more rhyth-cal force and accumulation of althy power the concerto comes to end. It had an electrifying per-rmance, particularly on the part of ravinsky himself, who played with ending technic and endurance, at-cking great chords in a manner veri-bly suggestive of the paws of a Rus-n bear, though always with a poise ich is one of the astounding quali-s of his musical nature. The con-to is one of many new departures Stravinsky. The "Symphonies ur instruments de vent," which as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish Tenor, Gives Recital at Carnegie Hall, June 19.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programs for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programs for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the massive and powerful, and there need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

HIPOLITO LAZARO.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish tenor, will give a recital this evening, June 19, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Lazaro is the Metropolitan Opera after a four years' engagement at the close of the 1921 season. He joined Mascagni in Italy and created the tenor rôle at the première at La Scala of a new opera, "Il Piccolo Marat" (written expressly for the singer). Mr. Lazaro appeared in it more than seventy times, in Italy, Spain and Argentina. In Italy the Order of the Crown of Italy was conferred on him, and in Spain he received the Order of El Cordon de Alfonso XIII. In his operatic tour through Italy, Spain and South America, the Metropolitan tenor scored another success in "La Parisina," also written for him. Mr. Lazaro will make New York his home for the summer months.

For the last four years S. L. Rothafel has directed the artistic destinies of the Capitol Theatre. Mr. Rothafel has been associated for ten years with motion picture theatres on Broadway. It was he who first coordinated a symphonic orchestra with motion pictures, adding solos and a ballet, an example which

Ravinia Park Begins Season June 21 Personnel of Stadium Orchestra

THE thirteenth season of opera and concerts at Ravinia Park opens June 21 with the double bill of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," sung by all-star casts. Louis Eckstein, the responsible head, has spared no pains to insure the success of the ten weeks. The répertoire of thirty-four operas, besides standard works, will include several novelties to the public. "La Légende du Point d'Argentan," by Fourdrain, will receive its American première.

Conductors—Eric De Lamarter, Louis Hasselmans, Gennaro Papi, Wilfrid Pelletier and Giacomo Spadoni. Stage Director—Armando Agnini. Singers—Lucrezia Bori, Florence Easton, Margery Maxwell, Graziella Pareto, Thalia Sabanieva, Merle Alcock, Ina Bourskaya, Anna Correnti, Philine Falco, Jeanne Gordon, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Giovanni Martinelli, Armand Tokatyan, Giordano Paltrinieri, Vicente Ballester, Mario Basiola, Giuseppe Danise, Louis D'Angelo, Desire Defrene, Paolo Ananian, Virginio Lazzari and Leon Rothier.

Such an array of talent permits of an extensive répertoire, with frequent changes of cast, and this policy, inaugurated last year, will be followed throughout the coming season.

A series of four open-air operas will be given under the auspices of the Civic Opera Association of New York at the Polo Grounds on the nights of June 19, June 24, July 1 and July 8. Many of this country's artists will be heard in some of their favorite rôles. On the opening night Mme. Frances Peralta will appear for the first time in the title rôle of Carmen. Others in the cast will be Dmitry Dobkin, Grace Anthony, William Gustafson, Gertrude Wieder and Martin Horodas.

On the third night of the series—July 1—Carmela Ponselle will make her début as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Miss Ponselle will be assisted by H. Haesler, Dmitry Dobkin, Vito Moscato and Gertrude Wieder.

Eight weeks of Summer grand opera is announced for Cincinnati. The Zoo Opera Company will open the season Monday evening, June 22, and will present six performances each week.

The operas selected are "Mefistofele," "Rigoletto," "Butterfly," "Barber of Seville," "Bohème," "Martha," "Manon" (by Massenet), "Lakmé," "Lohengrin," "Traviata," "Aïda," "Carmen," "La Gioconda," "L'Elisir d'Amore."

Artists engaged are Mmes. Edith De Lys, Anita Klinova, Ludovico Tomarchio, Mario Valle, Italo Picchi, Natale Cervi, Josephine Lucchese, Stella De Metta, Rogelio Baldrici and Milo Picco.

Forty-five musicians from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra have been engaged.

Philharmonic patrons will see several new men on the platform when the orchestra assembles again for the opening of the Stadium concerts July 3, but almost all of the old familiar faces will be present. The whole orchestra for the season of 1924-25 is now under contract, and the personnel for the Stadium series will be identical with that for next Fall, with a few exceptions.

The only new "first desk" man for the coming season is Hans Lange, who will be assistant concertmaster. Mr. Lange, who has been with the orchestra for several years, was formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor with Willem Mengelberg in Frankfurt. Scipione Guidi will continue as concertmaster and will make his first Stadium appearance in that capacity this Summer.

Leo Schulz and Cornelius Van Vliet again will share the solo cello work, Mr. Schulz occupying that post in the first half of the season and Mr. Van Vliet in the second half. Mr. Schulz, who celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary with the Philharmonic last Winter, will take a vacation this Summer, and will be the only "first desk" man missing from the Stadium personnel. A. Bass and Oswaldo Mazzucchi, both of whom have been with the orchestra for several years, have been appointed assistant solo cellists. Mr. Mazzucchi is a member of the Philharmonic String Quartet. Umberto Buldrini and Anselme Fortier will again be solo basses.

There will be three newcomers in the wood-wind section. R. Mortimer Willson, considered one of the most promising of American flutists, will join the Philharmonic this Summer, as will Paul Gerhardt, oboe, and Jacob Gehrhardt, E flat clarinet. John Amens, who joined the orchestra last season, will continue as first flute and will make his Stadium début this Summer. E. F. Wagner will again be piccolo player; Bruno Labate, solo oboe; Peter Strano, English horn; Sem Bellison, solo clarinet, and Edmond Roelofsma will be bass clarinet and assistant solo clarinet. Benjamin Kohon continues as solo bassoon, Roberto Sensale as assistant solo bassoon and Oskar Modess as contra bassoon.

Bruno Jaenicke remains solo horn, with Maurice Van Praag as alternate solo horn, and the brass section will be headed by Harry Glantz, solo trumpet; Mario Falcone, solo trombone, and Fred Geib, tuba. Albert Friese, the celebrated Philharmonic tympanist, will again be seen in action, and Theodore Cella and Miss S. Goldner will be harpists. Henry Boewig will continue to rule over the Philharmonic library, with Emil Greinert as his assistant, and the inimitable "Jimmy" Carroll will again be baggagemaster. Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the orchestra for several seasons, will continue to act in that capacity.

Mme. Schumann-Heink gives a concert at the Hollywood Bowl today under the auspices of the American Legion. The concert will be a birthday celebration, as this will be the sixty-third birthday of Mme. Schumann-Heink.

The postponement of the Bach Festival at Bethlehem has created much sympathy for Dr. Fred Wolle, whose physicians have ordered a complete rest. It will probably be October before he can resume work with his chorus. It is understood that there will be no festival this year, but that the event will take place in 1925 at the usual date.

Mme. Gadski has signed a contract with the Keith vandeville for a tour to begin shortly. It is understood that she will play only in the larger cities of the East. Mme. Gadski for many years was one of the artists of the Metropolitan, and is also known as a concert singer.

"Der Rosenkavalier" in England

PEOPLE are still debating whether 'Salome' is Strauss's worst opera or not," writes The London Times critic, "but there can be little doubt that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is his best. The reason is that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is Strauss and only Strauss; it had no existence without him. His librettist gave him just enough to set his fancy roving. He could be just as fantastic and extravagant as he liked, and he let himself go. The great joy of the performance, surely one of the best of any opera which has been seen and heard at Covent Garden within present memory, lay in the way Herr Bruno Walter and his players handled the good gifts of the composer. The range of tone was enormous, and yet the general impression of the score, at any rate through two-thirds of the opera, was one of extraordinary lightness. The opera was almost as finely sung as played, for not only was it an admirably chosen cast, but the whole was exquisitely dovetailed together. First among the principals was Herr Richard Mayer, whose Baron Ochs is famous, but who was seen and heard in this country now for the first time. The three principal ladies, Mme. Lotte Lehmann, Mme. Delia Reinhardt and Mme. Elizabeth Schumann, all sang with purity and complete understanding of their parts."

The first Italian opera since 1914 began a four weeks' season at Covent Garden June 4 with "Rigoletto." Alfred Piccaver, who sang the title part, is claimed by The London Daily Telegraph as a native of Lincolnshire and not Chicago. The répertoire includes "Bohème," "Lucia," "Butterfly," "Manon Lescaut," &c. Among the artists are Mmes. Louise Edvina, Delia Reinhardt, Norina, Virginie Perry, Selma Kurtz and Maria Ivogun; Messrs. Joseph Hislop, Cesare Formichi, Edouard Cotreuil, Dinh Gilly, Harold Williams and Sampieri. Musical director, Panizza. Maria Ivogun appeared in "Rigoletto" with great success.

Zandonai's new violin concerto "Romantic" was played in London by Emilio Tromben. The Times thought that the actual themes seemed hardly significant enough to bear the weight of so large a work. "This remark applies especially to the first theme, which recurs in the last movement and gives a kind of unity to the whole. There are three movements, the first of which is very strenuous but without real strength; the second is marked con dolore profondo, and contains, after a good deal of uninteresting material, one passage of considerable if rather facile beauty; the finale is the least satisfactory, being mainly taken up with not very felicitous virtuoso passages for the violin."

Casella's Cadences

THE London Daily Telegraph gives a brief résumé of a treatise by Casella on the "Evolution of Music."

"He has put together an original work that must be as useful to the student of composition as it is entertaining to the real amateur of music; and his publishers are so certain of its wide appeal that they have issued it in three languages—Italian, French and English, preface, text and all—under one cover. Casella's aim has been to trace the 'gradual formation and development, during the slow course of centuries, of the principal elements of our magnificent edifice of modern music.' On the face of it such a proposition would appear to be altogether too tedious and, in one volume, impracticable. Our author saw that some technical formula was necessary, something that would summarize the chief features of the modern tonal system. So he selected the 'perfect cadence,' that 'full close' of musical grammar, and chose 100 'perfect cadences' from the fourteenth century to the present day. And the result is a masterpiece of condensation. A brief historical and theoretical essay on the nature and formation of 'modern' music, 100 illustrations in chronol gical order, curtly annotated, and the thing was done. What Casella means by a 'perfect cadence' may be understood when

Twelve Orchestral Conductors

TWELVE orchestral conductors" are considered by M. Dominique Sordet in a book of this title issued in Paris. Orchestra leaders, it seems, are a curious race of virtuosi, endowed by nature with a species of radioactivity which enables them to exercise a secret collective pressure on the subconsciousness of any group of instrumentalists which disciplines their wills. It is known that several remarkable directors are mediocre musicians and that many Poulenc), directed by Messager, and "Les Noces" of Stravinsky, directed by Pierre Monteux. Josef Hofmann also gave a piano recital.

M. George Hüe, member of the Institute, has finished the music for "Riquet a la Houppe," a lyric comedy in three acts and a prologue, taken from "Les contes de Perrault," by M. Raoul Gastambide.

pats each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naïveté. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his Spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

Kussevitsky a Storm Centre.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an or[illegible] men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anyhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause. "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have a certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergei Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus and orchestra, "Sept, ils sont sept," after an invocation of the seven gods of evil found in a cuneiform inscription of the pre-Babylonian era. Schmitt has two new compositions, short orchestral pieces, the first of which is "La Tristesse de Pan," an orchestral version of the piano piece which he, in common with Stravinsky, Dukas, Malapiero, Bartols and others, composed when Debussy died under the collective title of "Tombeau de Debussy," and a second piece, "La Tragique Chevauchée," a modern French musical fantasy inspired by the ride of Byron's "Manfred." Of other times and tastes, and also for music of a simplicity and beauty very grateful by contrast to the ear, are Corelli's first "concerto grosso" for strings; the three nocturnes of Debussy, including the last, the "Sirènes," for voices and orchestra, and the superb dances from Borodine's not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes. And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in many ways [illegible] than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "t" and "k" in its final syllable. [illegible] that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

[illegible] and the Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necessary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heyday of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetic to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the program, may be roughly indicated as follows:

Telal! Telal! Telal! Telal!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven * * *
They know neither kindness nor mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse,
They are deaf to prayers or to supplications * * *
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional who [illegible] to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helplessness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Stravinsky Concero.

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concert exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in this concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator — to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Kussevitsky's Interpretations.

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next Winter: "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programs for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programs for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the Fifth Symphony.

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there is need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale, than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish Tenor, Gives Recital at Carnegie Hall, June 19.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

HIPOLITO LAZARO.

[illegible]ito Lazaro, the Spani[illegible], [illegible] evening, [illegible] 19, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Lazaro [illegible] the Metropolitan Opera after a four [illegible]rs' engagement at the close of the [illegible] season. He joined Mascagni in [illegible]y and created the tenor rôle at the [illegible]nière at La Scala of a new opera, "Il [illegible]olo Marat" (written expressly for [illegible] singer). Mr. Lazaro appeared in it [illegible]e than seventy times, in Italy, Spain [illegible] Argentina. In Italy the Order of [illegible] Crown of Italy was conferred on [illegible], and in Spain he received the Order [illegible] El Cordon de Alfonso XIII. In his [illegible]tic tour through Italy, Spain and [illegible]h America, the Metropolitan tenor [illegible]ed another success in "La Pari[illegible]" also written for him. Mr. Lazaro [illegible]make New York his home for the [illegible]mer months.

[illegible] the last four years S. L. Rothafel [illegible]has directed the artistic destinies of the [illegible]C[illegible]ol Theatre. Mr. Rothafel has been [illegible]ated for ten years with motion [illegible]pic[illegible]e theatres on Broadway. It was he [illegible]who first coordinated a symphonic or[illegible]che[illegible]a with motion pictures, adding so[illegible]loi[illegible] and a ballet, an example which [illegible]has been followed by all important cin[illegible]em[illegible]neatres. The Capitol Theatre has [illegible]and[illegible]hestra of seventy-five pieces, a [illegible]sta[illegible]f soloists, and gives opera in a [illegible]co[illegible]ed form. Many artists who now [illegible]ar[illegible]own on the concert or opera stage [illegible]gra[illegible]ted from the motion picture the[illegible]ate[illegible]

Photo by White Studio.

S. L. Rothafel of the Capitol Theatre, Who Introduced Symphonic Orchestras in the Picture Houses.

Polo Grounds on the nights of June 19, June 24, July 1 and July 8. Many of this country's artists will be heard in some of their favorite rôles. On the opening night Mme. Frances Peralta will appear for the first time in the title rôle of Carmen. Others in the cast will be Dmitry Dobkin, Grace Anthony, William Gustafson, Gertrude Wieder and Martin Horodas.

On the third night of the series—July 1—Carmela Ponselle will make her début as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Miss Ponselle will be assisted by H. Haesler, Dmitry Dobkin, Vito Moscato and Gertrude Wieder.

Eight weeks of Summer grand opera [illegible] announced for Cincinnati. The Zoo[illegible]pera Company will open the season [illegible]nday evening, June 22, and will pre[illegible]t six performances each week.

[illegible]e operas selected are "Mefistofele," [illegible]"[illegible]oletto," "Butterfly," "Barber of [illegible]Se[illegible]le," "Bohème," "Martha," "Ma[illegible]no[illegible] (by Massenet), "Lakmé," "Lohen[illegible]gri[illegible]," "Traviata," "Aïda," "Carmen," [illegible]"L[illegible]ioconda," "L'Elisir d'Amore."

[illegible]s engaged are Mmes. Edith De [illegible]Lys[illegible], Anita Klinova, Ludovico Tomar[illegible]chio[illegible], Mario Valle, Italo Picchi, Natale [illegible]Cerv[illegible], Josephine Lucchese, Stella De [illegible]Mett[illegible], Rogelio Baldrici and Milo Picco.

[illegible]Fo[illegible]five musicians from the Cincin[illegible]nati [illegible]mphony Orchestra have been en[illegible]gage[illegible]

[illegible]Ph[illegible]rmonic patrons will see several [illegible]new[illegible]en on the platform when the [illegible]orc[illegible]ra assembles again for the open[illegible]in[illegible] the Stadium concerts July 3, but [illegible]a[illegible]st all of the old familiar faces will [illegible]present. The whole orchestra for the [illegible]eason of 1924-25 is now under contract, and the personnel for the Stadium series will be identical with that for next Fall, with a few exceptions.

The only new "first desk" man for the coming season is Hans Lange, who will be assistant concertmaster. Mr. Lange, who has been with the orchestra for several years, was formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor with Willem Mengelberg in Frankfurt. Scipione Guidi will continue as concertmaster and will make his first Stadium

Twelve Orches[illegible]

TWELVE orchestral conductors" are considered by M. Dominique Sordet in a book of this title issued in Paris. Orchestra leaders, it seems, are a curious race of virtuosi, endowed by nature with a species of radioactivity which enables them to exercise a secret collective pressure on the subconsciousness of any group of instrumentalists which disciplines their wills. It is known that several remarkable directors are mediocre musicians and that many first-class musicians are quite unable to conduct. Directors are "wizards"; they utilize this mysterious magnetic reaction. There are directors who are disliked by their men, who, nevertheless, in the course of a performance obtain from them a devotion which is more than mere professional pride; this magnetic fluid operates unnoticed. The writer thinks "that the great symphonic orchestras of today are unique; tomorrow they may no longer exist in their present state of perfection, because the spirit which animates them is dying out; the musicians no longer work disinterestedly for the love of art; they have become commercialized. An audience may not be highly educated musically, but it will not escape the boredom which is diffused by a mediocre concert. If the musicians lower their standards, the audiences will vanish. M. Sordet chooses for his portraits the following conductors: Koussevitzky, one of the magnetic virtuosi; Gabriel Pierné of the Concerts Colonne, one of the best interpreters of Debussy, Rhené-Baton, Paul Paray, Golschmann and André Caplet; Camille Chevillard, one of the most severe and redoubtable of conductors; then the director of theatres, Albert Wolff; Ruhlmann, Busser, Frigara, Philippe Gaubert and Ingelbrecht."

The Mozart Festival organized in Paris by Mme. Walska and Walter Straram at the Théatre des Champs Elysées must be distinguished from the performances of the Vienna Opera. The former gave "Don Giovanni," "Cosi fan Tutte" and "Les Nozze di Figaro." Two symphonic concerts were scheduled for June 10 and 17, besides a special performance of the "Requiem." Irene Williams was engaged to sing the prima donna rôle in "Cosi fan Tutte" and will also sing in the "Requiem." The orchestra was chosen from the pick of the Concerts du Conservatoire, Colonne and Lamoureux.

The artistic season of the Eighth Olympiad pursues its course; Pavlowa at the Théatre des Champs Elysées danced for Paris in May, Pablo Casals directed his Barcelona symphonic orchestra in a concert, assisted by Thibaud and Cortot. The Russian ballet from Monte Carlo, organized by Serge Diaghilev, appeared in "Les Tentations de la Bergère," directed by Henri Casadesus, who had [illegible]chestrated the score of Monteclair; "Les [illegible]ches (by Francis sinister designs! A queer fellow, seems to be delving, musically, in rtain hinterland of the human iousness, listening to what he iscovered there, with as much ess and detachment as if he had a scientist discussing the theory olution.

ose from his seat and bowed as ly as you please to enormous ap-e, as the composition came to an sudden hush that falls over s and orchestra, an effect of ut-rostration and helplessness in the nce of unfathomable mystery. murmurs of the chorus are heard tly, from far off, through the ium of the orchestra. A curious ess!

Stravinsky Concero.

came Stravinsky, a small man, nely self-possessed, who played ncert exactly as we knew he before he even entered the hall, clean-cut, electrical vigor that softness or sentiment in it, with cision and rhythmical force in-ble from the composer of "The of Spring." His finger technic clean as a steel blade, and his l thinking, as composer and ner, was as clean as that, too. in this concerto, he has done a ning, and this by means of a hat is essentially classic. There pening theme in the manner of ale. It is developed frugally, reat vigor and life, and with a fine grinding dissonance, speaking, after the manner of The treatment is lengthy and te, incisive and full of contra-resource. The slow movement re lyrical qualities, though not uch of sensuous beauty. The resumes contrapuntal proce-Toward the last the composer bold employment of syncopa-newhat in the manner of Amer-gtime, in which, as we know, sky, with other leading Euro-omposers, has been much in-. With more and more rhyth-force and accumulation of power the concerto comes to . It had an electrifying per-ce, particularly on the part of sky himself, who played with g technic and endurance, at-great chords in a manner veri-ggestive of the paws of a Rus-ar, though always with a poise s one of the astounding quali-his musical nature. The con-one of many new departures ravinsky. The "Symphonies nstruments de vent," which ski played last year in New was another. The concerto ut the supposition that Strav-as become more and more ca-in his musical output since du printemps," and less and are of his own artistic destiny. 'Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du ps," via the incomparable uchka," his way seems perfectly after which this humble com-or cannot follow the singular redictable divagations of Strav-muse. He said as much—the ntator — to M. Kussevitsky, ade this reply: "There is a ne of development, but if you race it by traditional formulae l not lose your way. The case, see it, is that Stravinsky in du printemps' reached the limit hmical force and energy. He turn in another direction. He ng here and there for a further and wherever he seeks he finds ing new. Meanwhile, however, is a threat of consistency n all of Stravinsky's music. It ot lie in exterior appearances, the element which is at the f everything that he composes. n, always the evolution is ical, and not linear in the sense classic masters. That is a fact nderstood before there can be r estimate of Stravinsky's com-s, particularly of his present ."

ussevitsky's Interpretations.

is of M. Kussevitsky, outlin-s attitude on the subject of or-l programs, modern and classi-usic, will be of interest to those ttend his concerts next Winter. uld like to make it clear," said onductor, "that I am neither nist nor classicist in my musical ences. The works of the great masters are absolutely indis-ble to me, as musician and in my No one would less willingly be ut them than I. But music is static art. Music is continually made which is an expression of riod in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish Tenor, Gives Recital at Carnegie Hall, June 19.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programs for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programs for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been very destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the Fifth Symphony.

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

HIPOLITO LAZARO.

Hipolito Lazaro, the Spanish tenor, gave a recital last evening, June 19, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Lazaro was heard at the Metropolitan Opera after a four years' engagement at the close of the last season. He joined Mascagni in Italy and created the tenor rôle at the première at La Scala of a new opera, "Il Piccolo Marat" (written expressly for the singer). Mr. Lazaro appeared in it more than seventy times, in Italy, Spain and Argentina. In Italy the Order of the Crown of Italy was conferred on him, and in Spain he received the Order of El Cordon de Alfonso XIII. In his artistic tour through Italy, Spain and South America, the Metropolitan tenor scored another success in "La Parisina," also written for him. Mr. Lazaro will make New York his home for the summer months.

For the last four years S. L. Rothafel has directed the artistic destinies of the Capitol Theatre. Mr. Rothafel has been associated for ten years with motion picture theatres on Broadway. It was he who first coordinated a symphonic orchestra with motion pictures, adding solos and a ballet, an example which has been followed by all important cinema theatres. The Capitol Theatre has an orchestra of seventy-five pieces, a staff of soloists, and gives opera in a concert form. Many artists who now are known on the concert or opera stage were graduated from the motion picture theatre.

Photo by White Studio.

S. L. Rothafel of the Capitol Teatre, Who Introduced Symphonic Orchestras in te Picture Houses.

Opera Association of New York at the Polo Grounds on the nights of June 19, June 24, July 1 and July 8. Many of this country's artists will be heard in some of their favorite rôles. On the opening night Mme. Frances Peralta will appear for the first time in the title rôle of Carmen. Others in the cast will be Dmitry Dobkin, Grace Anthony, William Gustafson, Gertrude Wieder and Martin Horodas.

On the third night of the series—July 1—Carmela Ponselle will make her début as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Miss Ponselle will be assisted by H. Haesler, Dmitry Dobkin, Vito Moscato and Gertrude Wieder.

Eight weeks of Summer grand opera is announced for Cincinnati. The Zoo Opera Company will open the season Monday evening, June 22, and will present six performances each week.

The operas selected are "Mefistofele," "Rigoletto," "Butterfly," "Barber of Seville," "Bohème," "Martha," "Manon" (by Massenet), "Lakmé," "Lohengrin," "Traviata," "Aïda," "Carmen," "La Gioconda," "L'Elisir d'Amore."

Artists engaged are Mmes. Edith De Lys, Anita Klinova, Ludovico Tomarchio, Mario Valle, Italo Picchi, Natale Cervi, Josephine Lucchese, Stella De Metti, Rogelio Baldrici and Milo Picco.

Forty-five musicians from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra have been engaged.

Philharmonic patrons will see several new men on the platform when the orchestra assembles again for the opening of the Stadium concerts July 3, but almost all of the old familiar faces will be present. The whole orchestra for the season of 1924-25 is now under contract, and the personnel for the Stadium series will be identical with that for next Fall, with a few exceptions.

The only new "first desk" man for the coming season is Hans Lange, who will be assistant concertmaster. Mr. Lange, who has been with the orchestra for several years, was formerly concertmaster and assistant conductor with Willem Mengelberg in Frankfurt. Scipione Guidi will continue as concertmaster and will make his first Stadium sale as assistant solo bassoon and Oskar Modess as contra bassoon.

Bruno Jaenicke remains solo horn, with Maurice Van Praag as alternate solo horn, and the brass section will be

Twelve Orchestral Conductors

TWELVE orchestral conductors" are considered by M. Dominique Sordet in a book of this title issued in Paris. Orchestra leaders, it seems, are a curious race of virtuosi, endowed by nature with a species of radioactivity which enables them to exercise a secret collective pressure on the subconsciousness of any group of instrumentalists which disciplines their wills. It is known that several remarkable directors are mediocre musicians and that many first-class musicians are quite unable to conduct. Directors are "wizards"; they utilize this mysterious magnetic reaction. There are directors who are disliked by their men, who, nevertheless, in the course of a performance obtain from them a devotion which is more than mere professional pride; this magnetic fluid operates unnoticed. The writer thinks "that the great symphonic orchestras of today are unique; tomorrow they may no longer exist in their present state of perfection, because the spirit which animates them is dying out; the musicians no longer work disinterestedly for the love of art; they have become commercialized. An audience may not be highly educated musically, but it will not escape the boredom which is diffused by a mediocre concert. If the musicians lower their standards, the audiences will vanish. M. Sordet chooses for his portraits the following conductors: Koussevitzky, one of the magnetic virtuosi; Gabriel Pierné of the Concerts Colonne, one of the best interpreters of Debussy, Rhené-Baton, Paul Paray, Golschmann and André Caplet; Camille Chevillard, one of the most severe and redoubtable of conductors; then the director of theatres, Albert Wolff; Ruhlmann, Busser, Frigara, Philippe Gaubert and Ingelbrecht."

The Mozart Festival organized in Paris by Mme. Walska and Walter Straram at the Théatre des Champs Elysées must be distinguished from the performances of the Vienna Opera. The former gave "Don Giovanni," "Cosi fan Tutte" and "Les Nozze di Figaro." Two symphonic concerts were scheduled for June 10 and 17, besides a special performance of the "Requiem." Irene Williams was engaged to sing the prima donna rôle in "Cosi fan Tutte" and will also sing in the "Requiem." The orchestra was chosen from the pick of the Concerts du Conservatoire, Colonne and Lamoureux.

The artistic season of the Eighth Olympiad pursues its course; Pavlowa at the Théatre des Champs Elysées danced for Paris in May, Pablo Casals directed his Barcelona symphonic orchestra in a concert, assisted by Thibaud and Cortot. The Russian ballet from Monte Carlo, organized by Serge Diaghilev, appeared in "Les Tentations de la Bergère," directed by Henri Casadesus, who had orchestrated the score of Monteclair; "Les Biches (by Francis Poulenc), directed by Messager, and "Les Noces" of Stravinsky, directed by Pierre Monteux. Josef Hofmann also gave a piano recital.

M. George Hüe, member of the Institute, has finished the music for "Riquet a la Houppe," a lyric comedy in three acts and a prologue, taken from "Les contes de Perrault," by M. Raoul Gastambide.

Music Notes Afield

THE Goldman Band Concerts will continue their performances on the Mall, Central Park, as usual next week, excepting Tuesday and Thursday. Today they will give a sacred program with Wiano Kauppi as soloist. Lotti Madden will be the soloist Monday evening in a miscellaneous program, on Wednesday evening there will be a Russian program, Friday evening will be devoted to Beethoven. Frances Sabel will sing on Saturday and Miriam Fine on Sunday.

Ernest Bloch, the American composer, has been notified by Eduard Mörike that his "Two Psalms" will be performed at the Berlin and Dresden concerts next Winter.

Queen Elena, the Princesses Maria and Mafalda and the court attended the operetta, "The Sleeping Beauty," at the Teatro del Piccoli, Rome. Vittorio Podrecca and Romano Fidora received their royal Highnesses and have been commanded to give a performance at the Quirinal.

The new concerto for piano and orchestra which Leo Ornstein has finished has been accepted by Leopold Stowkowski for first performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra next season. Mr. Ornstein will play the piano part.

The music written by Richard Strauss for the wedding of his son in Vienna last January has been published.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah," dramatized by William Dodd Chenery, was given at the Boston Opera House May 16. Nearly 400 persons took part.

Charles Martin Loeffler, the Bostonian composer, has won the prize of $1,000 offered this Spring by the North Shore Festival Committee of Evanston with a new orchestral piece, "Memories of Childhood: Life in a Russian Village." It was played by Frederick Stock and his orchestra.

Dusolina Giannini will make her London début in a recital at Queen's Hall on June 19. This will be followed by an orchestral appearance at the same hall on July 1 with the London Symphony, under the leadership of Henri Verbrugghen.

begin shortly. It is understood that she will play only in the larger cities of the East. Mme. Gadski for many years was one of the artists of the Metropolitan, and is also known as a concert singer.

"Der Rosenkavalier" in England

PEOPLE are still debating whether 'Salome' is Strauss's worst opera or not," writes The London Times critic, "but there can be little doubt that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is his best. The reason is that 'Der Rosenkavalier' is Strauss and only Strauss; it had no existence without him. His librettist gave him just enough to set his fancy roving. He could be just as fantastic and extravagant as he liked, and he let himself go. The great joy of the performance, surely one of the best of any opera which has been seen and heard at Covent Garden within present memory, lay in the way Herr Bruno Walter and his players handled the good gifts of the composer. The range of tone was enormous, and yet the general impression of the score, at any rate through two-thirds of the opera, was one of extraordinary lightness. The opera was almost as finely sung as played, for not only was it an admirably chosen cast, but the whole was exquisitely dovetailed together. First among the principals was Herr Richard Mayer, whose Baron Ochs is famous, but who was seen and heard in this country now for the first time. The three principal ladies, Mme. Lotte Lehmann, Mme. Delia Reinhardt and Mme. Elizabeth Schumann, all sang with purity and complete understanding of their parts."

The first Italian opera since 1914 began a four weeks' season at Covent Garden June 4 with "Rigoletto." Alfred Piccaver, who sang the title part, is claimed by The London Daily Telegraph as a native of Lincolnshire and not Chicago. The répertoire includes "Bohème," "Lucia," "Butterfly," "Manon Lescaut," &c. Among the artists are Mmes. Louise Edvina, Delia Reinhardt, Norina, Virginie Perry, Selma Kurtz and Maria Ivogun; Messrs. Joseph Hislop, Cesare Formichi, Edouard Cotreuil, Dinh Gilly, Harold Williams and Sampieri. Musical director, Panizza. Maria Ivogun appeared in "Rigoletto" with great success.

Zandonai's new violin concerto "Romantic" was played in London by Emilio Tromben. The Times thought that the actual themes seemed hardly significant enough to bear the weight of so large a work. "This remark applies especially to the first theme, which recurs in the last movement and gives a kind of unity to the whole. There are three movements, the first of which is very strenuous but without real strength; the second is marked con dolore profondo, and contains, after a good deal of uninteresting material, one passage of considerable if rather facile beauty; the finale is the least satisfactory, being mainly taken up with not very felicitous virtuoso passages for the violin."

Casella's Cadences

THE London Daily Telegraph gives a brief résumé of a treatise by Casella on the "Evolution of Music."

"He has put together an original work that must be as useful to the student of composition as it is entertaining to the real amateur of music; and his publishers are so certain of its wide appeal that they have issued it in three languages—Italian, French and English, preface, text and all—under one cover. Casella's aim has been to trace the 'gradual formation and development, during the slow course of centuries, of the principal elements of our magnificent edifice of modern music.' On the face of it such a proposition would appear to be altogether too tedious and, in one volume, impracticable. Our author saw that some technical formula was necessary, something that would summarize the chief features of the modern tonal system. So he selected the 'perfect cadence,' that 'full close' of musical grammar, and chose 100 'perfect cadences' from the fourteenth century to the present day. And the result is a masterpiece of condensation. A brief historical and theoretical essay on the nature and formation of 'modern' music, 100 illustrations in chronological order, curtly annotated, and the thing was done. What Casella means by a 'perfect cadence' may be understood when it is remarked that certain contemporary specimens are quoted from pages of Zoltan Kodaly, Malipiero, Erik Satie, Lord Berners and Arnold Schönberg."

The history of the new opera, "Anna Karenine," of Robbiani, given for the first time in Rome a week after "Nerone" in Milan, illustrates the huge difficulties that accompany the production of modern operas, says The London Daily Telegraph correspondent. "Robbiani, who had already produced an operatic work, 'Esvelia,' given in Rome in 1911, had finished his next opera, 'Anna Karenine,' in 1915, and it took nine long years of patient waiting before it could see the light of a public performance. It is some consolation to think that 'Nerone' was nearly fifty years in preparation. Fortunately Robbiani's fate has not been quite so bad. His new opera is naturally taken from the novel of Tolstoi, from which it selects the four most salient incidents.

"The situations are of great dramatic effect, and Robbiani made laudable efforts to interpret them with realistic dramatic music. The orchestration seemed at times disconnected, confusing and noisy, but is generally effective. The composer is far more successful in the quiet, romantic scenes and when portraying the softer emotions, and there are passages in the new opera worthy of a really great master, which elicited unstinted applause. The opera was awarded one of the State prizes last year given to encourage operatic productions."

Singapore

SINGAPORE has become the musical base of the British Asiatic Empire. The Morning Post publishes a résumé of the activities of Major St. Clair, who founded the Singapore Philharmonic Society and the Singapore Orchestra, of which he was conductor for many years. He is now 75. Singapore started its free concerts for children in 1899 and with a small Government gift they are self-supporting. Children of every race attend these concerts. Europeans, Eurasians, Chinese, Malays, Cingalese and Indians are brought under the spell of the greatest art the modern Western world has produced.

CLIPPER

New York City

MAY

CLASS MUSIC IN BOSTON

Symphony Gets Down to Pop Scale for Public

Boston, May 14.

Jupe Pluvius intruded frowningly and made Music Week sort of wet. Probably one of the rainiest and coldest weeks in many years for May.

"The Pops," annual symphony concerts, have commenced again and will continue until July. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts during the regular season are accessible only to a limited few for financial reasons. But in these two or three months each year popular audiences are catered to; music that is beautiful without being ultra-intellectual or too "heavy" is rendered at popular prices ($1 top).

The People's Symphony Orchestra is another comparatively new organization, composed of all union musicians, whose aim is to bring the better music to the people all the year round at reasonable prices. Concerts are held every Sunday at the St. James theatre at low prices. In recognition of the [illegible]'s fine work, Emil [illegible]enhauer, who led the Boston symphony during the past season, voluntarily offered to conduct the Peoples' for one concert recently.

Agide Jacchia is at present leading the 80-piece Boston Symphony at the Pops concerts.

WASHINGTON

-D. C.

HERALD

Pierre Monteux Says "Adieu" to Hub Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, will not return to America next season, nor will he remain in France.

"My plans are not definite yet," he stated in New York, "but I know that I will not come back to America. In France I may make a few guest appearances, but I will not remain there. I am leaving America content that I have done my work here and that it has been appreciated. I came for one year and I stayed five. It has been hard work—the Boston season is long—but I have enjoyed it."

Quebec Chronicle April 23

MUSIC LOVERS WERE ENCHANTED

With Programme of Boston Symphony at Auditorium Last Evening.

Quebec capitulated last evening to one hundred and four musicians under the leadership of M. Pierre Monteux, whose skilful besiegement of all hearts of the large audience, which completely filled the Auditorium, was immeasurably crowned with success. The Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly came and conquered. It is safe to say that no musical organization has ever been received in Quebec with the same enthusiasm as was accorded this famous organization of musical artists.

Rendering a programme planned to suit the musical tastes, and enthall the instinct of the most temperamental auditor present, M. Monteux had an easy task in his capture.

The opening number that stupendous Symphony No. 4 by Tschaikowsky was a revelation of incomparable harmony and tonal effects, which was a delight to most amateurist of listeners. The Symphony is in four movements and, of course, treated in contrast the third Scherzo movement particularly with its rushing pizzicato was most pleasing and aroused the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

The second part of the programme opened with the overture du "Roi d'Ys", a composition by Lala first produced at the "Opera Comique de Paris in 1888". This overture is lively dramatic and of generous inspiration, besides written in supurb style with rare symmetry of form.

"La Valse", (Poeme choregraphique) by Joseph Maurice Rovel followed—This thoroughly descriptive and interesting composition was sketched by Ravel during the Great War and completed in 1920. The poem begins with dull rumours as in "Rheingold" and from this chaos of sound the waltz gradually takes form and development three impressions are created. The birth of the waltz, the waltz, and the apotheosis of the waltz. It is certainly a composition of an extreme imaginative type and in its rendition. This fact was fully disclosed.

The final number "Impressions d'Italie" a suite in four movements by Charpentier was given a wonderful interpretation. The "Serenade" with its love songs sung to the accompaniment of mandolin and guitar effects was most expressively rendered by the orchestra while in the second movement "On Mulcback" one could readily follow the trot of the animals and the bright rythm of their bells, that melody of the violoncello in the canzone was a piece of artistry which proved delightful.

The third movement which takes the hearer to the lofty solitudes of the "Desert of Sorrento" which overlooks the City of Naples, was a musical picture of rare grace and clarm. The final movement is an attempt by the composer to paint a musical picture of "Naples", its population, its wholly outdoor life and joyfulness. The songs by the populace, the dance, the playing of military bands and the general vivacity of an excited crowd to an intermittant rumbling of old "Nesuvions" were most realisticaliy and wonderfully portrayed.

At the close of the programme an ovation was accorded both the leader and orchestra.

Those privileged to be present last evening to hear this great Symphony orchestra under the leadership of its eminent conductor, will undeniably retain a memory of sweet sounds, which cannot fail to be productive of much good to the general musical tone of the city.

MANY MEN, MANY MINDS

A Word About, Conductors' Ways with Stravinsky's Music

THE test of a composer, it seems, is not so much whether he can refute his critics as whether he can survive his interpreters. Both Beethoven and his "Fourth Symphony," for instance, have long outlived that contemporary who wrote that in this music Beethoven "is extremely bizarre and makes himself unintelligible and an object of terror to even cultivated dilettanti." And Stravinsky continues to be played, in spite of an indignant "opposition." On the other hand [writes Henrietta Strauss in The New York Nation], one can recall recent occasions when a wave of the baton has proved more fatal to either of these composers than any gesture of protest; when Beethoven has become agair an "object of terror" and Stravinsky almost "unintelligible." With Beethoven, at least, there is the safeguard of familiarity. But when, as happened last winter, five pieces by Stravinsky receive their first hearing in New York from five different conductors, and each conductor presents the composer from an entirely different angle, then to find the true Stravinsky becomes more a matter of deduction than of recognition.

"The Song of the Nightingale," for example, revealed one Stravinsky under Mr. Damrosch and another under Mr. Mengeiberg. This symphonic evolution of Stravinsky's opera "The Nightingale" represents that phase, rather than period, of the composer which, in conciseness and elimination, delicacy yet brilliancy of effect, bears a curious kinship to the Japanese art of the brush. As Mr. Damrosch's treatment adhered more closely to this interpretation than the heavy reading of Mr. Mengelberg, and as his "Nightingale" happily had Mr. Barrère to sing its rapture on the flute, one can only feel that Mr. Damrosch's bird bore more resemblance to the real one and Mr. Mengelberg's to its glittering, jewelled rival.

Again, Mr. Monteux's performance of "The Rite of Spring" differed quite radically in conception from that which Eugene Goossens gave when he introduced it to London, four years ago. Where Goossens made this music literally a ritual of barbaric frenzy and elemental ecstasy, Mr. Monteux marked it with a fine restraint, in which heavy, decorous rhythms were substituted for the dynamic vitality of Goossens's beat. Stravinsky, however, was present at the latter's performance, and gave it his unqualified approval. And so, while Mr. Monteux's version was interesting and brought out the superb virtuosity of his orchestra, it must be considered from an interpretative standpoint as inaccurate.

Stravinsky, indeed, is an invaluable auditor, for he does not hesitate to repudiate what is spurious, even when the conductor is a Koussevitzky. This he did when the latter introduced in London his Symphonies for Wind Instruments and presented merely the notes, without either coördination or subordination of the voices. If one may use such a performance as a precedent, then one may legitimately reject that of "The Story of the Soldier," which Chalmers Clifton presented for the League of Composers, and in which he displayed a similar looseness of ends. This piece is a satirical suite on the adventures of a penniless soldier marching home on a two-weeks' furlough. It contains many rhythmic episodes, including marches, a tango, a waltz, and even rag-time. Such episodes should, of course, be irresistible; but so indeterminate was Mr. Clifton's beat and so vague his musical purpose that no soldier ever danced or marched to less alluring sounds.

Koussevitzky was excused on the ground that those who play Skriabin well cannot do Stravinsky, and Koussevitzky is, undoubtedly, magnificent with Skriabin. Whether this can be applied to Mr. Clifton I do not know. Yet it is a poor idea at best, for there is Stokowski, who not only has the fluid and sensuous emotionalism that Skriabin requires, but also the sensitiveness to sonorities and the dynamic, mechanical rhythm that Stravinsky practically demands. Stokowski, indeed, seems to be the one conductor here on whose interpretations of Stravinsky one can rely. He made, as far as was possible, a success of the same Symphonies for Wind Instruments with which K[illegible]ssevitzky had failed—they are unint[illegible]hest. And he created a veritable sensation with Stravinsky's "Fox," which he prepared and conducted for the International Composers' Guild. This delicious burlesue of a Russion fairy tale was by the same ironical Stravinsky of "The Soldier," but it proved infinitely more amusing than the latter. This might not have been so had "The Soldier" been presented in its entirety and with the same perfection of detail and understanding. As it is, one cannot but wonder whether there is not danger that the patient may die while doctors disagree.

* Miss Strauss forgets that when "The Rite of Spring" was a new piece of the theatre ten years ago in Paris, Mr. Monteux, then chief conductor of Diaghyiev's Russiain Ballet, prepared the original performances, with the guiding and counselling composer incessantly at his elbow; and that the conductor's presen' version of "Le Sacre" embodies exactly the composer's first will with it. Miss Strauss errs again in the objection that Stravinsky raised to Koussevitzky's performance in London of the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments." The composer then complained, not because the conductor "presented merely the notes," but because he did not do so, seeking rather to give the music poetized and emotional voice.

H. T. P.

313

52

Adv Am 7

Pop Concerts To Start Next Week

BEGINNING a week from tomorrow, Symphony Hall will suddenly cease to be the centre of serious and formal musical performance. The Pop Concerts, opening with a joyous outburst on May 5, will run the course of their thirty-ninth season, with no silent nights excepting every other Saturday.

Agide Jacchia will preside for his eighth successive Summer over the orchestra of eighty symphony players.

belongs to morality, and for you to read me what a critic says of Koussevitsky would be an immoral act. Besides, I can guess what it is. A magnetic personality with a disregard for tradition; a musical Trotsky who treats tempi like the bourgeois they are; and gingers up Beethoven and the Choral Symphony in defiance of every tradition that comes from Germany."

"Those beastly old Germans, how I hate them!" said Diana.

Conscience whispered that it was wrong thus to exploit human passions. So I reminded Diana that just now it was some nameless critic against whom her hate had been directed.

"I don't hate him really," she said, "and I suppose anyone who is a critic and has to listen to all sorts of terrible people becomes a dried-up old fossil. Only I should like musical criticism to tell me about my own feelings, instead of worrying about dynamics and tonalities and tempi. I don't mind a bit when Koussevitzky conducts Beethoven whether he follows the tradition of Bülow or Wagner, or whoever it is. All I know is that I've been in heaven and I expect lots of other people have, too. And I'd like to read someone who would remind me of it and tell me what it's like, just to see if we agree."

"What you want, my dear, is a critic who will describe the adventures of his soul among the masterpieces."

My originality impressed her, and she clapped her hands. "How clever you are, Jack. That's it exactly. Why won't they tell us about them?"

"Perhaps they have no adventures."

"Or no souls."

"It may be so," I agreed, "or possibly their adventures are not of the sort one writes about."

"Oh, I am sure I could write about mine," said Diana. "Supposing it's the Choral Symphony with dear old Koussevitzky conducting. The first movement is solemn, a sort of Sunday in heaven, and nobody is quite certain whether they like it or not—that's why one doesn't know when it begins whether it's in the major or minor. On the whole, they are rather subdued. But it all changes in the Scherzo. Koussevitzky makes one sure that this is just the kind of music the angels today are dancing to. It's a sort of heavenly jazz, jazz in excelsis. There the drums inherit eternal life. Or rather they jump right into it, and perfectly naturally too. They don't even have to repent.

"You remember, Jack, how it begins?" I nodded—"by the strings leaping down an octave. After a bar of silence they make another spring. Again there is silence. Then, when you're expecting the strings a third time, the drums jump down their octave with a tremendous bang and the whole orchestra follows. There's some beautiful twittering then—for the more old-fashioned angels, I expect—till that octave-leap comes back again and again, just as if to say that they mean to be up-to-date in heaven. Koussevitzky simply makes you see it all, and there is a place where the strings go on springing about, while the flutes, oboes and clarinets have a heavenly new tune—it really is heavenly, although it's also rather jaunty. And in the middle the oboes and clarinets sing a little song—God's very near just then—and only the wicked old bassoon, who hops up and down in counterpoint, suggests that St. Peter is sometimes a little careless. He isn't wicked really, though, and shows it by leading off in the slow movement where everybody is very good. Next . . ."

But at that moment the telephone bell rang and brought Diana abruptly to earth. Meanwhile I am praying that musical criticism will continue to be written by the objective male. [John Layer in The London Morning Post

KOUSSEVITZKIANA

Rhapsody

AT the breakfast-table, Diana reads the morning paper con amore. Her sympathies flow in many channels and she is the partisan of many causes. But unfortunately sympathies beget antipathies. To enjoy some things one must dislike others. Thus Diana is apt to become waspish. So it was that she put down her coffee-cup with a snort—rather a gracious snort—and declared that the man was a fool. Presence of mind prompted me to declare that men are unwise and curiously planned.

"Just listen to this criticism of Koussevitzky," she said without paying any attention to my remark.

Now, one of the rules, more golden than the journey to Samarcand, on which the domestic felicity of our household reposes, is that no reading aloud from the newspapers is ever permitted at breakfast.

Of this I reminded Diana. "Don't be silly, Jack. You know perfectly well I made the rule because you would keep on bothering me with the quotations of your silly stocks. I must read you what they say about the poor man."

Feeling that, although we were in 1924, the moralities were not thus to be trifled with, I put the matter plainly before Diana:

"My Dear, why the rule was made is immaterial. The points is that it exists—that for this house it is a rule of conduct resting on general consent. As such it

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard, '27

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Overture, "Pique Dame" ..... Suppé
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee Club
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saëns
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee Club
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
Waltz, "Barcarolle" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Herald 27

POPS NEXT WEEK

Beginning a week from tomorrow, Symphony hall will cease to be the centre of serious and formal musical performances. The gravity of the auditorium will be dispelled by the invasion of waitresses bearing food and drink, festive decorations and such composers as Puccini, Waldteufel and Victor Herbert. In other words, the Pop Concerts, opening with a joyous outburst on May 5, will run the course of their 39th season, with no silent nights excepting every other Sunday. Mr. Jacchia will preside for his eighth successive summer over the splendid orchestra of 80 symphony players. The program for the opening night, which is always one of the biggest of the year, is as follows:

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounov
Evening—Call of the Guard—Dance of the Young People
Burlesca ..... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Wildflower" ..... Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ..... Schubert-Wilhelm
Slavonic Dance No. 1 ..... Dvorak

ZIMBALIST THRILLS, STRAUSS LAYS HOLD, MONTEUX MARSHALS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF DEEP SENSATIONS

The Violinist Excels Himself, Transfiguring Chaikovsky's Music—The "Sinfonia Domestica" with Conductor and Orchestra at Zenith—The Composer and Life—For Beginning Mozart Young, Simple, Gentle

BY anticipation the repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" bade fair to overpass all else in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. By actual experience Mr. Zimbalist's transfiguration of Chaikovsky's Concerto for Violin ran it close. Since that remembered Friday in 1915 when Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck joined hands and voices in Beethoven's Concerto, Symphony Hall has known no such playing of a piece for violin and orchestra as Mr. Monteux and Mr. Zimbalist now accomplished. From the beginning the audience was intent. Before the first movement had proceeded far, it was rapt. A hundred measures further, and he was a numb listener who did not feel the excitement around him and within himself. At the pause came the still suspensive instants in which a transported company gropes for release of emotion and finds it in a torrent of applause. As breathless was the listening through the slow song and the finale. Not a programme-leaf rustled. Again composer and conductor, violinist and orchestra, possessed every hearer. Daimonic was the word for the musicians' ending; while as fast and furious leapt the clapping. Next to the first performance of "The Rite of Spring," this playing of Chaikovsky's Concerto seemed the emotional peak of the symphonic year.

Mr. Zimbalist was an "added starter," as it were, to the "assisting artists" of the season. Though in these, his middle thirties, he should be near the noon of his powers, none of his recent concerts in Boston has quite foretold the violinist of yesterday. Nor is the chosen Concerto now counted any masterpiece in the "literature" of the fiddle. New as long ago as 1881, it made some stir in the world as music of incredible difficulty and incredible wildness. To the purists of the violin in particular and of "the tone-art" in general—as they liked to call it—the Concerto was then anathema. Now the youngsters across the aisle speak of it to each other as "one more thing" of "poor old Peter." Between these extremes it has lain in a limbo, from which the violinists occasionally pluck it, when they suspect that Beethoven or Brahms, Bruch, Lalo or Mendelssohn will no longer "do." Yet after forty years there are light and heat in this music of Chaikovsky, if only there be the violinist and the conductor to set it aglow. The melody upspringing into song from the chief theme of the first movement invites every fervor, finesse and sensibility of the player, rewarding them with beauty. The "passage-work," as the technicians name it, may be wrought into rhapsody; while the cadenza, as Mr. Zimbolist proved, can be lifted into striding, intricate, magnificent declamation.

The brief middle song flowers in a charm unsentimentalized, a grace that is not soft. Russian of origin the music may be; but to the imagination Chaikovsky and the violinist are fiddling from Arcadia. On the abusive tongues of the "conservatives" of the eighties, the finale, racing and whirling out of two folk-tunes, "stank of brutal and wretched jollity." Now, played as it was yesterday, there are few to deny its native wildness, its voice and fling of village-revel with the Moujik none the worse for a skinful of liquor and an arm around his doxy. Not many a concerto for violin will bear scrutiny as music "absolute" and self-contained. Like nearly all the others, Chaikovsky needs a liberating virtuoso, an enkindling rhapsodist.

That heaven-sent violinist was yesterday Mr. Zimbalist—cool, calm, collected, impassive even, when every nerve within him must have been tingling. His technical resources and dexterities seemed the simple, flawless means to intricate, exacting ends—and there is no more to be said. His tone was of silken texture, edgeless body, limpid flow, luminous as the day, sensitive as shadow to sunlight—and again there is no more to be said. Rather, proclaiming print may not half sound the wondrous beauty with which Mr. Zimbalist clothed the songful course of the first movement—a beauty vibrant with the sensuous voice and the penetrating tang of the violin, warm to every accent and shading of composer or violinist—the fascination of sound in lovely motion, the thrill of sound when musical and poetic impulses give it shape, pace and color. As futile is print to weave the charm of the pattern and the progress when Chaikovsky's solo-measures and Mr. Zimbalist's violin threaded the orchestral web; or to summon the passion of creation with which the violinist traversed the "passage-work"; or the splendor of his rhapsody even in a cadenza.

Yet the finely tempered as well as the ardent violinist likewise sounded—the musician who kept all the grace of the little canzonetta, but never sapped it into languor; the poet who caught all the idyllic quality, but not once smooched it with excess of sentiment. The virtuoso achieved the rhythmic exactness, the swift plasticity, the progressions "in a fine frenzy rolling" of the finale; while the rhapsodist whipped every repetition with the lash of his bow, swirled like a delirious Dionysos through music that is a rabble-rout of shifting tone. The violinist and the musician, the virtuoso and the poet, the sophisticate and the simple was Mr. Zimbalist in this Concerto. The composer gave him cue and stood transfigured. The conductor and the orchestra caught the zest, the passion; vied with the fiddler, outdid Chaikovsky; while a rapt audience quivered in the hollow of these hands. Not once in a month of blue moons may violin-playing bring such an experience. For nine years the Symphony Concerts have waited for it anew.

Thrill upon thrill leapt also from the repetition of "The Domestica." More than once since the revival of last December, Mr. Monteux has in private rehearsed or in public replayed the piece, until now, in the vernacular of the tuning-room, "he knows exactly what he wants—and gets it." Around him yesterday he had, besides, an orchestra that has warmed and waxed to the music and that he now sustains at its ancient plasticity and beauty, passion and power. Strauss himself, vowed voluptuary in orchestral tone, might have envied Mr. Monteux, the rich depths of the horns; the pulse and shimmer of the brighter strings; the flare of the trumpets; the glitter of the flutes; the thick pile of the middle voices. The tonal mass was like a bed of glowing coal within the grate of the music; while at need from it darted the isolated instruments, each in its own quality.

With an endless flexibility and response, a characterizing conductor and orchestra [illegible] the personages, projected the moods, [illegible] ductor and an orchestra drenched in the sheer sensuous beauty of music, achieved the measures in the scherzo that ripple and glisten like sunlit, stirring sea. A tapestry in tones far-spread, thick-woven with instrumental gold, threaded with the passion of ardent living become the passion of ardent sound, unfolded from those mid measures, unmatched for the heights a depths of song upon all Strauss's pa And forthwith the fire, the frenzy, fantasy—and also the swiftness, certa and suppleness—of conductor and or tra through that double fugue of the life. The end crowns the work. Monteux can surpass his version of Domestica" yesterday with his vers the Fifth Symphony next week, God him!

Agree, if the listener will have that the motivs of "The Domest not arrest the ear and seize the in tion as do those of "A Hero-Life" o Juan." Agree again that the trans tions of those themes do not ma mirror of many reflections that i Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote." once more that naught in this "Si mounts to the power and sweep opening of "Zarathustra"; to the and the pang of the finale of the knight; to the spiritual desolati "Death and Transfiguration" befo apotheosis ascends. Agree, finally as tonal structure ("The Domestica reafirms the superb ability of Str unfold, knit, sustain and unify a and intricate musical and emoti sign. Yet there is that in this s which none other of the tone-poe little other music yields.

Nowhere else are written such n of the deep passion of living which span from the scherzo to th Here abide, for repetition only tensify, the ardor of the work cause he who does it loves it, and expresses himself; the ardor of the tion that stimulates and rewards th ing; the happiness—for tears or for t —that is the fruit and crown. There in the racing, flaunting, heaven-se fugue, the joy and the elation, the fan the frolic, even the ribaldry of this liv We dream; we strive; perhaps we achi We love and are loved. And then fling out as wild and screaming and to be stayed as this very fugue, rac the purists, maddening the moralist "the tone-art." The learned say that sic to be vital and puissant, or ever be tiful, must be integrated to life. W ever more closely bound than in this mic and this close of the "Sinfonia Domest

So much for a Symphony Concert seized the imagination and stirred the tions as may few in many a year with many a music. Yet there was gentle beginning. Studious with M Mr. Bruno Walter, the eminent co tor, opened upon a day the little phony in C major, written in the poser's seventeenth year, when the mu world of Vienna was first dawning him. On neither visit to America did Walter find—or make—opportunity to the piece. He commended it, however his friend, Pierre Monteux, and yest from a duly diminished orchestra, it heard for the first time in Boston. indeed a very gentle, modest little S phony, shunning nearly every intricac sonata or symphonic form as the e the eighteenth century knew and prac them, using the orchestra choir by content with the reeds and the horns ing beneath the strings. There ar little tunes at the smiling begin through the whirring end. (The teenth, like the twentieth century, ferred its music quick-paced.) The division is simplicity itself, yet not w out grace of motion. The Minuet, stra ly, seems more studious, ample, formal. Here and there the ear detects the charm of workmanship, the radiant surfaces, the playful fancy it is now the custom to call Mozartean. It also discovers that in the Vienna of 1773 as well as in the Vienna of 1924 there were capital operetta-tunes.

H. T. P.

Sun May 1

Koussevitzky in Action

A Caricature by "Quiz" of the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Reproduced by Permission From The Saturday Review, London.

AGIDE JASCHIA
Conductor of "Pops" Concert.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A3

A4

A5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Pr Apr 30

MONTEUX HONORED IN FINAL BOW HERE

Statue Given Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Concert at Infantry Hall.

AUDIENCE GIVES HIM OVATION

Prof. Albert K. Potter Pays Tribute to Musician in Behalf of Local Music Lovers.—Delightful Programme Presented

Pierre Monteux made his final bow to a Providence audience last evening at Infantry Hall with the close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here. But he was not allowed to depart without a tangible evidence of the admiration and respect of Providence patrons. After the playing of Dvorak's "New World" symphony Professor Albert K. Potter of Brown University, acting for a group of Providence music lovers, presented M. Monteux with a bronze reproduction of the statue by the American sculptor, Daniel Chapin, "Invocation to the Great Spirit," which stands in front of the Boston Art Museum.

Professor Potter paid a fine tribute to M. Monteux's qualities as musician and as a man and the audience, which rose as the presentation began, gave the popular leader a veritable ovation.

The movement which culminated in the presentation was inaugurated among the admirers of M. Monteux in this city by Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel.

LEADER FOR FIVE YEARS

It is five years since M. Monteux assumed leadership of the famous Boston organization and as Professor Potter pointed out he began his duties under somewhat trying circumstances. Great changes had been made in the orchestra's personnel and he was confronted with the task of remoulding his forces into the fine responsive band that previously for so many years had been one of the leading orchestras of the world. His success is apparent to-day, the organization having again, through his untiring efforts, reached the heights of artistry.

For the principal number in yesterday's concert M. Monteux presented the "New World" symphony by the Bohemian composer, Dvorak, a work of particular interest to an American audience. It was written while the eminent musician was a resident of New York and has for its inspiration the folk tunes of America. Dvorak himself said that he did not take any special themes for the foundation of this symphony but used thematic material partly borrowed from Southern negro melodies and partly original. This inspiration came, of course, from the plaintive tunes of the South.

The symphony is a delightful work, rich in sweet melodies and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. The slow movement is one that lingers in the hearer's memory and throughout the four movements there is a quality of treatment, colorful instrumentation and brilliant effects.

FRENCH NUMBERS GIVEN

The remaining portion of the orchestra programme included the Debussy prelud to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and th Wagner overture to "Tannhauser." It i in the imaginative writings of the modern French composers that M. Monteux find material for delightfully artistic conceptions. He has played the Debussy work here on previous occasions. It is always intimately sensed and set forth with delicacy and beauty.

For the closing number the ever popular "Tannhauser" overture received a brilliant rendition.

The evening's soloist, John Charles Thomas, scored a big success in his two appearances with the orchestra. He has become a favorite with Providence audiences through former visits here in concert and "Pagliacci" prologue was sung with dramatic effect and brought him many recalls. His other number, the air, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," received an artistic interpretation and showed his fine voice to particular advantage. Again he was the recipient of tremendous applause and was forced to return several times in acknowledgment.

A. F. P.

Pos Eve May 3

POPS' OPENING FROM WNAC

A never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC — the Shepard Stores — at 8:15 o'clock, tomorrow evening.

The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia.

This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America.

During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1919, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

Her May 3

SYMPHONY GIVES 24TH. CONCERT

Season Closes Tonight with Repetition of Program of Old Favorites

CONDUCTOR MONTEUX GETS REAL OVATION

By PHILIP HALE

The 47th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, C minor, No. 5, Carpenter Suite "Adventures in a Perambulator," Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Wagner, Overture, to "Tannhaeuser."

With the repetition of the concert tonight the 43rd season of the orchestra will come to an end, and with it the end of Mr. Monteux's engagement. The program chose for the last concert was made up of three well-known and favorite compositions. Mr. Monteux showed again his interest in American composers by making room for Mr. Carpenter's suite which, too long spun out, contains some pretty music, clever imitations of barking and yelping dogs, and amusing exercises for two xylophones.

In Philadelphia for the last concert of the orchestral season, the audience voted that the program should be. For the Symphony Cesar Franck won by a large majority over Beethoven and Johannes Brahms. The other pieces selected by the audience were "Scheherazade" and the "Finlandia." In Chicago Mr. Stock chose for the final program the "Lenoire" overture N. 3; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia." "The Ride of the Valkyries," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

What if the Symphony Hall audience had been allowed to choose the program of the last concert? Is it a more radical or a more conservative audience than that of Philadelphia? We are inclined to think that the conservatives would have had their way. There are still estimable persons who are firmly convinced that there is no music outside of Germany, with the possible exception of compositions by local composers, where they have not fallen under the horrid influence of the French, the Russians and the ultra-modern Italians.

Concerning the pieces performed yesterday there is little or nothing to be said that could be of profit or interest. This, however, may be said: The first of Debussy will probably rest on "Pelleas and Melisande," one of the few great operas in the world, "the Afternoon of a Faun," and a few songs and piano pieces.

The orchestral performance was superb throughout the concert. Beethoven's immortal symphony was dramatically beautiful and noble. Mr. Monteux succeeded where many excellent conductors have failed: in maintaining interest after the first glorious outburst in the finale. With too many conductors this opening is in itself a climax. After the mysterious measures of preparation, and the remaining pages of the symphony fall, but Mr. Monteux made these dangerous pages vital; they were in turn a preparation for the jubilant, overwhelming close.

He must have realized yesterday h what high esteem and warm affection he is held by audience and orchestra There has not been so enthusiastic demonstration of regard for a conducto in the orchestral history of the last 3 years. The rising from the seats, th prolonged applause, the recalls after th symphony and at the end—these wer for once not perfunctory.

Mr. Monteux richly deserved th tribute. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been a title for 43 years. Th orchestras have borne it gallantly. Th first was created by Wilhelm Gericke the second is the creation of Pierre Monteux, who leaves a marvellous instrument for his successor to play upo

The Herald tomorrow will contain short sketch of the past season, with few words about the leader who he with grace and modesty, proved himse to be a courteous disciplinarian, an eloquent interpretor of ancient, mode and ultra-modern music of every sch and every nationality.

Monitor May 3.

Music News

Pierre Monteux Conducts Final Concert in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestrd, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its twenty-fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program: Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Carpenter—Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator."

Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun." Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

No program could have been better chosen to conclude Mr. Monteux's term as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than this, for it summarized the many qualities which have made these last five years eventful ones in the history of the orchestra. In the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Monteux again showed his sympathetic understanding of that master's music, and in the pieces by Wagner and Debussy he was once again the versatile interpreter of the music of yesterday. And in Carpenter's suite he gave still further proof, if any were needed, of his interest in American music, an interest which he has not hesitated to show on many other occasions. It was a graceful act on his part, however, to include in his final program a work by an American. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a summary of Mr. Monteux's five years as conductor of the orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played with all that beauty of tone and perfection of ensemble which Mr. Monteux has restored to it. Happy indeed should be his successor to find at his disposal so sensitive and responsive an instrument. Mr. Monteux was recalled again and again by an audience which, now that he is on the point of departure, is just beginning to realize the worth and the great work which he has done for the art of music in this city.

S. M.

May 4 1924

REVIEW OF THE PAST SEASON

The season which ends today has offered Boston about the usual amount of musical entertainment of about the usual degree of merit. Those who have already learned to care for music of various sorts have had many chances to listen to good performances of masterpieces by composers all the way from Palestrina to Sousa.

The 90 percent who have never bought a concert ticket are to be duly exhorted and encouraged during the coming week, which has been designated as "Music Week," and officially blessed as such by President Coolidge, Gov Cox, and Mayor Curley. But it's no use giving tracts to a missionary. One hopes that everybody likely to read this column is already at least an occasional purchaser of concert and opera tickets, and tells his friends about the fun he gets out of hearing good music well played.

The moral influence of music is dubious. But can anything in the world give more intense and less harmful enjoyment?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained under Mr Monteux' patient and painstaking leadership much of its old quality and prestige. He has now conducted his last concert here. Serge Koussevitsky, who will take his place next season, may prove a more brilliant and magnetic leader, but there are merits in Monteux which will not soon be forgotten.

His programs have often slighted the great classic symphonies. But no other conductor anywhere in the world has performed a wider and more representative selection of modern pieces. After five years one does not know from programs or performance what group of moderns Monteux most admires. He has not been guided by his personal preferences or by his national limitations.

Monteux' Farewell

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Mr. Monteux laid down his baton at the close of last evening's Symphony concert, he bade official farewell to Boston, if not for all time, at least for the present.

To say of an orchestra that has commanded the services of a Nikisch, a Gerricke and a Muck that it has had no abler conductor than Mr. Monteux would be a needless exaggeration; but on an occasion such as this comparisons are more than ever superfluous, more than ever odious. And this may and should be said: No conductor of our orchestra has ever left Boston taking with him in such measure the good will and the affection of the concert-going public.

Boston's Debt to Mr. Monteux

In part Boston feels thus warmly towards Mr. Monteux because of its keen realization that but for his tact, skill and courage the Boston Symphony Orchestra might today have been in very different estate. Whether or not another might with equal success have kept the orchestra essentially intact when disruption and dissension within its ranks seriously threatened its very existence, few conductors could so speedily, so unostentatiously have restored the band to all its former excellence, so that today it may no longer be said by audience and orchestra that the Boston orchestra is not the orchestra that it was in the days of its prime. And that such a comment heard and written more than once in the years immediately following Dr. Muck's abrupt departure from our midst.

In its present excellence our orchestra is an organization in which, without undervaluing anybody, Bostonians may and do, take the utmost pride and satisfaction. There may be orchestras of equal merit in other cities of this country or of Europe; there may scarcely be any that surpass it. Not without reason did Lawrence Gilman lately remark in the columns of the New York Herald-Tribune that Mr. Koussevitsky "would weep tears of joy" when first he heard it play.

Course of His Activities

To go back a few years in reminiscence, it will be recalled that Boston first made the acquaintance of Mr. Monteux as the conductor of Diaglev's Russian Ballet, in a brief but memorable season at the Boston Opera House, some eight years ago. Strom him came then stirring performances of "Scheherazade," of "The Afternoon of a Faun," of Stravinsky's "Firebird" and "Petrushka," and of sundry other pieces in the Russians' colorful repertory. (Would that those enchanting creations might again be seen and heard here!)

In the year that followed Mr. Monteux was engaged as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and the spring visit of that company to Boston first disclosed him here as conductor of opera, notably in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel," a piece ideally suited to his tastes and temperament. For yet another year Mr. Monteux remained with the Metropolitan, and that year, too, was destined to bring him to Boston, this time with no accompanying organization. For Henri Rabaud, engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony for the season of 1918-19, was unable to reach this country in time for the first two concerts, and it was Mr. Monteux who took his place.

Whether or not Boston would gladly have had more of that genial man and tenax has made strong claim on our regard through his admirably ordered and widely ranging programmes. On this last count he has, indeed, had his critics, as must every man of imagination or even of real ability. Some—and as it seems to the present writer, with scant foundation—have complained of the sameness of general of his programmes, and many have bewailed or denounced his partiality to the music of certain ultra-modern composers. Yet it is th's very open-mindedness to the contemporary music of all schools and nationalities that has particularly endeared Mr. Monteux to not inconsiderable portion of the orchestra's audience.

Like Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Monteux believes that the repertory of a symphony orchestra should be broadly representative. Accordingly he has placed upon his programmes the music of the established composers, classical, romantic and modern, frequently and commendably steadily, and he plans that, for various reasons, had been dropped from the active repertory. Accordingly, too, and it is to be hoped that he has incurred protests and reproaches, he has been hospitable to the music of odr immediate time. And although those who have so bitterly complained of the performance of one or another ultra-modern composition apparently do not suspect it, Mr. Monteux has not always played such music because of his own great love of it. Indeed, he himself has had no particular liking for more than one "radical" piece that he has brought to performance here simply and solely because he believed in its province and his duty to give such contentious music the benefit of a hearing.

Among the subscribers to a series of Symphony concerts there have always been, and perhaps always will be, some who do not wish to hear music that they deem "unmelodious," "discordant," or unnecessarily involved. Of old those "stand-patters" objected to Wagner and even to Brahms and to Tchaikovsky. Later it was Richard Strauss who aroused their displeasure, and after him Debussy and Ravel. Today it is Stravinsky, Honegger, Milhaud, Casella and Arthur Bliss; and when they have become established and accepted, as in all probability some day they will, there will arise a new generation of "cacophonists," of disturbers of the peace. And so the game goes merrily on.

Now were the conductor of a symphony orchestra to bow supinely before the protests of the offended or the enraged, he would put prove himself unworthy of his high estate of leadership, and from Carl Zerrahn onward, Boston has nearly always been blessed with conductors sufficiently broad-minded and courageous to play music novel enough to distress the conservative. So that, after all, there is nothing so very new or remarkable in Mr. Monteux's attitude toward contemporary composers. Rather, it is expected that a man of the artistic stature to be the conductor of the Boston Orchestra will be a man with wide sympathies and the enterprise to play whatever music chances at that particular time to be "modern" music. Not because he has given us Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," or "Horatius Victorious," or Milhaud's Second Suite, has Mr. Monteux especially earned our praise, but because to a marked, almost an unprecedented, degree he has extended a welcoming hand to the composers of all countries.

In Mr. Rabaud, excellent musician that he was, we had an example of the Chauvinist. To Cesar Franck and to certain lesser French composers, he showed a partiality that in time became irritating. Not so Mr. Monteux. A Frenchman and a patriot, he has nevertheless given us liberally of the music of German composers, and not only the music of Beethoven and the other "classics," but that of Brahms, Strauss and Wagner as well. To be sure, he withheld the promised performance of a Symphony by Bruckner because he found himself unable to see the virtue in the Austrian's music, but he did give us the First Symphony of Mahler, while in the fact that he did not follow the example of Dr. Muck and lay before us the sterils and dreary works of Weingartner, Boehe, Sheinpflug, Noren, Blschoff and various other present-day Teutons, we have reason only to rejoice. Nor did Mr. Monteux inflict upon us, as so easily he might have done, the mediocrities of his own France. "If I am to play French music," he once remarked, "I wish to play only the best." And from that stand he has hardly once departed. [illegible] did for his friends and countrymen must have been considerable.

Resuming in brief [illegible] during the five years [illegible] impression is of its range and scope. During those five years we have made the acquaintance at these concerts of many names notable in contemporary music: the English Vaughan-Williams, Bax, Holst and Bliss; the French Honegger, Milhaud and Roussel; the Italian Casella and Respighi; the Spanish de Falla and Turina. And although Dr. Muck gave us our first hearing of Stravinsky in his early and unimportant "Fireworks," we owe to Mr. Monteux the first performance in the concert hall of "The Firebird," "Petrushka" and, above all, that most important "novelty" of the whole five years, "The Rite of Spring."

Finally, mention should be made of Mr. Monteux's never-failing generosity towards the composers of our own country, a generosity that has, to be sure, occasionally led him to play music intrinsically of little merit, but that nevertheless bespeaks true courtesy. And to his discernment in the field of American music we owe certain notable "revivals": for example, Mr. Chadwick's Overture, "Melpomene," Paine's Prelude to the "Oedipus" of Sophocles; and, at the concert's of the week just ended, Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," while to him we are also indebted not only for the actual first performances of such worthwhile American compositions as Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and "Gilbert's "Indian Suite," to mention but two of many, but for the first performance in Boston of such notable American achievements as Deems Taylor's "Looking-Glass Suite" and Schelling's "A Victory Ball." Moreover be it said, in conclusion, and to his further credit, that upon the preparation of these works Mr. Monteux lavished the same care that he bestowed upon the performance of the most significant new composition from Finland or from France. And it would scarcely be possible to say as much for any one of his illustrious predecessors.

Perchance Mr. Monteux may some day return to us; as to that no one can tell. But meanwhile it is unfair to us to wish him Godspeed, and to heap upon him as he goes our deep and abiding gratitude for what he has done.

As Programme-Maker

Aside from his rare abilities as organizer and drill master, aside from his keen and sensitive ear, to which we owe the orchestra's present equipoise in euphony and tonal balance, and aside from his gifts as interpreter of music of many and diverse schools, Mr. Monteux has made strong claim on our regard through his admirably ordered and widely ranging programmes. On this last count he has, indeed, had his critics, as must every man of imagination or even of real ability. Some—and as it seems to the present writer, with scant foundation—have complained of the sameness of general of his programmes, and many have bewailed or denounced his partiality to the music of certain ultra-modern composers. Yet it is th's very open-mindedness to the contemporary music of all schools and nationalities that has particularly endeared Mr. Monteux to not inconsiderable portion of the orchestra's audience.

Like Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Monteux believes that the repertory of a symphony orchestra should be broadly representative. Accordingly he has placed upon his programmes the music of the established composers, classical, romantic and modern, frequently and commendably steadily, and he plans that, for various reasons, had been dropped from the active repertory. Accordingly, too, and it is to be hoped that he has incurred protests and reproaches, he has been hospitable to the music of odr immediate time. And although those who have so bitterly complained of the performance of one or another ultra-modern composition apparently do not suspect it, Mr. Monteux has not always played such music because of his own great love of it. Indeed, he himself has had no particular liking for more than one "radical" piece that he has brought to performance here simply and solely because he believed in its province and his duty to give such contentious music the benefit of a hearing.

Among the subscribers to a series of Symphony concerts there have always been, and perhaps always will be, some who do not wish to hear music that they deem "unmelodious," "discordant," or unnecessarily involved. Of old those "stand-patters" objected to Wagner and even to Brahms and to Tchaikovsky. Later it was Richard Strauss who aroused their displeasure, and after him Debussy and Ravel. Today it is Stravinsky, Honegger, Milhaud, Casella and Arthur Bliss; and when they have become established and accepted, as in all probability some day they will, there will arise a new generation of "cacophonists," of disturbers of the peace. And so the game goes merrily on.

Now were the conductor of a symphony orchestra to bow supinely before the protests of the offended or the enraged, he would put prove himself unworthy of his high estate of leadership, and from Carl Zerrahn onward, Boston has nearly always been blessed with conductors sufficiently broad-minded and courageous to play music novel enough to distress the conservative. So that, after all, there is nothing so very new or remarkable in Mr. Monteux's attitude toward contemporary composers. Rather, it is expected that a man of the artistic stature to be the conductor of the Boston Orchestra will be a man with wide sympathies and the enterprise to play whatever music chances at that particular time to be "modern" music. Not because he has given us Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," or "Horatius Victorious," or Milhaud's Second Suite, has Mr. Monteux especially earned our praise, but because to a marked, almost an unprecedented, degree he has extended a welcoming hand to the composers of all countries.

In Mr. Rabaud, excellent musician that he was, we had an example of the Chauvinist. To Cesar Franck and to certain lesser French composers, he showed a partiality that in time became irritating. Not so Mr. Monteux. A Frenchman and a patriot, he has nevertheless given us liberally of the music of German composers, and not only the music of Beethoven and the other "classics," but that of Brahms, Strauss and Wagner as well. To be sure, he withheld the promised performance of a Symphony by Bruckner because he found himself unable to see the virtue in the Austrian's music, but he did give us the First Symphony of Mahler, while in the fact that he did not follow the example of Dr. Muck and lay before us the sterils and dreary works of Weingartner, Boehe, Sheinpflug, Noren, Blschoff and various other present-day Teutons, we have reason only to rejoice. Nor did Mr. Monteux inflict upon us, as so easily he might have done, the mediocrities of his own France. "If I am to play French music," he once remarked, "I wish to play only the best." And from that stand he has hardly once departed. [illegible] did for his friends and countrymen must have been considerable.

Resuming in brief [illegible] during the five years [illegible] impression is of its range and scope. During those five years we have made the acquaintance at these concerts of many names notable in contemporary music: the English Vaughan-Williams, Bax, Holst and Bliss; the French Honegger, Milhaud and Roussel; the Italian Casella and Respighi; the Spanish de Falla and Turina. And although Dr. Muck gave us our first hearing of Stravinsky in his early and unimportant "Fireworks," we owe to Mr. Monteux the first performance in the concert hall of "The Firebird," "Petrushka" and, above all, that most important "novelty" of the whole five years, "The Rite of Spring."

Finally, mention should be made of Mr. Monteux's never-failing generosity towards the composers of our own country, a generosity that has, to be sure, occasionally led him to play music intrinsically of little merit, but that nevertheless bespeaks true courtesy. And to his discernment in the field of American music we owe certain notable "revivals": for example, Mr. Chadwick's Overture, "Melpomene," Paine's Prelude to the "Oedipus" of Sophocles; and, at the concert's of the week just ended, Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," while to him we are also indebted not only for the actual first performances of such worthwhile American compositions as Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and "Gilbert's "Indian Suite," to mention but two of many, but for the first performance in Boston of such notable American achievements as Deems Taylor's "Looking-Glass Suite" and Schelling's "A Victory Ball." Moreover be it said, in conclusion, and to his further credit, that upon the preparation of these works Mr. Monteux lavished the same care that he bestowed upon the performance of the most significant new composition from Finland or from France. And it would scarcely be possible to say as much for any one of his illustrious predecessors.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Pr Apr 30.

MONTEUX HONORED IN FINAL BOW HERE

Statue Given Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Concert at Infantry Hall.

AUDIENCE GIVES HIM OVATION

Prof. Albert K. Potter Pays Tribute to Musician In Behalf of Local Music Lovers.—Delightful Programme Presented

Pierre Monteux made his final bow to a Providence audience last evening at Infantry Hall with the close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here. But he was not allowed to depart without a tangible evidence of the admiration and respect of Providence patrons. After the playing of Dvorak's "New World" symphony Professor Albert K. Potter of Brown University, acting for a group of Providence music lovers, presented M. Monteux with a bronze reproduction of the statue by the American sculptor, Dallin, "Invocation to the Great Spirit," which stands in front of the Boston Art Museum.

Professor Potter paid a fine tribute to M. Monteux's qualities as musician and as a man and the audience, which rose as the presentation began, gave the popular leader a veritable ovation.

The movement which culminated in the presentation was inaugurated among the admirers of M. Monteux in this city by Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel.

LEADER FOR FIVE YEARS

It is five years since M. Monteux assumed leadership of the famous Boston organization and as Professor Potter pointed out he began his duties under somewhat trying circumstances. Great changes had been made in the orchestra's personnel and he was confronted with the task of remoulding his forces into the fine responsive band that previously for so many years had been one of the leading orchestras of the world. His success is apparent to-day, the organization having again, through his untiring efforts, reached the heights of artistry.

For the principal number in yesterday's concert M. Monteux presented the "New World" symphony by the Bohemian composer, Dvorak, a work of particular interest to an American audience. It was written while the eminent musician was a resident of New York and has for its inspiration the folk tunes of America. Dvorak himself said that he did not take any special themes for the foundation of this symphony but used thematic material partly borrowed from Southern negro melodies and partly original. This inspiration came, of course, from the plaintive tunes of the South.

The symphony is a delightful work, rich in sweet melodies and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. The slow movement is one that lingers in the hearer's memory and throughout the four movements there is originality of treatment, colorful instrumentation and brilliant effects.

FRENCH NUMBERS GIVEN

The remaining portion of the orchestra programme included the Debussy prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Wagner overture to "Tannhauser." It is in the imaginative writings of the modern French composers that M. Monteux finds material for delightfully artistic conceptions. He has played the Debussy work here on previous occasions. It is always intimately sensed and set forth with delicacy and beauty.

For the closing number the ever popular "Tannhauser" overture received a brilliant rendition.

The evening's soloist, John Charles Thomas, scored a big success in his two appearances with the orchestra. He has become a favorite with Providence audiences through former visits here in concert. The "Pagliacci" prologue was sung with dramatic effect and brought him many recalls. His other number, the air, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," received an artistic interpretation and showed his fine voice to particular advantage. Again he was the recipient of tremendous applause and was forced to return several times in acknowledgment.

A. F. P.

Her May 3

SYMPHONY GIVES 24TH CONCERT

Season Closes Tonight with Repetition of Program of Old Favorites

CONDUCTOR MONTEUX GETS REAL OVATION

By PHILIP HALE

The 27th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, C minor, No. 5, Carpenter Suite "Adventures in a Perambulator," Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Wagner, Overture to "Taunhaeuser."

With the repetition of the concert tonight the 43rd season of the orchestra will come to an end, and with it the end of Mr. Monteux's engagement. The program he chose for the last concert was made up of three well-known and favorite compositions. Mr. Monteux showed again his interest in American composers by making room for Mr. Carpenter's suite which, too long spun out, contains some pretty music, clever imitations of barking and yelping dogs, and amusing exercises for two xylophones.

In Philadelphia for the last concert of its orchestral season, the audience voted on what the program should be. For the Symphony Cesar Franck won by a large majority over Beethoven and Johannes Brahms. The other pieces selected by the audience were "Scheherazade" and Tibelius's "Finlandia." In Chicago Mr. Stock chose for the final program the "Lenoire" overture N. 3; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Iberia." "The Ride of the Valkyries," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

What if the Symphony Hall audience had been allowed to choose the program of the last concert? Is it a more radical or a more conservative audience than that of Philadelphia? We are inclined to think that the conservatives would have had their way. There are still estimable persons who are firmly convinced that there is no music outside of Germany, with the possible exception of compositions by local composers, where they have not fallen under the horrid influence of the French, the Russians and the ultra-modern Italians.

Concerning the pieces performed yesterday there is little or nothing to be said that could be of profit or interest. This, however, may be said: The fame of Debussy will probably rest on "Pelleas and Melisande," one of the few great operas in the world, 'the Afternoon of a Faun," and a few songs and piano pieces.

The orchestral performance was superb throughout the concert. Beethoven's immortal symphony was dramatically beautiful and noble. Mr. Monteux succeeded where many excellent conductors have failed: in maintaining interest after the first glorious outburst in the finale. With too many conductors this opening is in itself a climax. After the mysterious measures of preparation, and the remaining pages fall comparatively flat, but Mr. Monteux made these dangerous pages vital; they were in turn a preparation for the jubilant, overwhelming close.

He must have realized yesterday how what high esteem and warm affection he is held by audience and orchestra. There has not been so enthusiastic a demonstration of regard for a conductor in the orchestral history of the last 3 years. The rising from the seats, the prolonged applause, the recalls after the symphony and at the end—these were for once not perfunctory.

Mr. Monteux richly deserved the tribute. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been a title for 43 years. Two orchestras have borne it gallantly; the first was created by Wilhelm Gericke; the second is the creation of Pierre Monteux, who leaves a marvellous instrument for his successor to play upon.

The Herald tomorrow will contain a short sketch of the past season, with a few words about the leader who has with grace and modesty, proved himself to be a courteous disciplinarian, an eloquent interpretor of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music of every school and every nationality.

Monitor May 3.

Music News

Pierre Monteux Conducts Final Concert in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its twenty-fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program: Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor. Carpenter—Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator."

Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Wagner—Overture to "Tannhäuser."

No program could have been better chosen to conclude Mr. Monteux's term as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than this, for it summarized the many qualities which have made these last five years eventful ones in the history of the orchestra. In the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Monteux again showed his sympathetic understanding of that master's music, and in the pieces by Wagner and Debussy he was once again the versatile interpreter of the music of yesterday. And in Carpenter's suite he gave still further proof, if any were needed, of his interest in American music, an interest which he has not hesitated to show on many other occasions. It was a graceful act on his part, however, to include in his final program a work by an American. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a summary of Mr. Monteux's five years as conductor of the orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played with all that beauty of tone and perfection of ensemble which Mr. Monteux has restored to it. Happy indeed should be his successor to find at his disposal so sensitive and reponsive an instrument. Mr. Monteux was recalled again and again by an audience which, now that he is on the point of departure, is just beginning to realize his worth and the great work which he has done for the art of music in this city.

S. M.

State May 4

REVIEW OF THE PAST SEASON

The season which ends today has offered Boston about the usual amount of musical entertainment of about the usual degree of merit. Those who have already learned to care for music of various sorts have had many chances to listen to good performances of masterpieces by composers all the way from Palestrina to Sousa.

The 90 percent who have never bought a concert ticket are to be duly exhorted and encouraged during the coming week, which has been designated as "Music Week," and officially blessed as such by President Coolidge, Gov Cox, and Mayor Curley. But it's no use giving tracts to a missionary. One hopes that everybody likely to read this column is already at least an occasional purchaser of concert and opera tickets, and tells his friends about the fun he gets out of hearing good music well played.

The moral influence of music is dubious. But can anything in the world give more intense and less harmful enjoyment?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained under Mr Monteux' patient and painstaking leadership much of its old quality and prestige. He has now conducted his last concert here. Serge Koussevitsky, who will take his place next season, may prove a more brilliant and magnetic leader, but there are merits in Monteux which will not soon be forgotten.

His programs have often slighted the great classic symphonies. But no other conductor anywhere in the world has performed a wider and more representative selection of modern pieces. After five years one does not know from programs or performance what group of moderns Monteux most admires. He has not been guided by his personal preferences or by his national limitation.

P. [illegible] May 4

Monteux' Farewell

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Mr. Monteux laid down his baton at the close of last evening's Symphony concert, he bade official farewell to Boston, if not for all time, at least for the present.

To say of an orchestra that has commanded the services of a Nikisch, a Gericke and a Muck that it has had no abler conductor than Mr. Monteux would be a needless exaggeration; but on an occasion such as this comparisons are more than ever superfluous, more than ever odious. And this may and should be said: No conductor of our orchestra has ever left Boston taking with him in such measure the good will and the affection of the concert-going public.

Boston's Debt to Mr. Monteux

In part Boston feels thus warmly towards Mr. Monteux because of its keen realization that but for his tact, skill and courage the Boston Symphony Orchestra might today have been in very different estate. Whether or not another might with equal success have kept the orchestra essentially intact when disruption and disaffection within its ranks seriously threatened its very existence, few conductors could so speedily, so unostentatiously have restored the band to all its former excellence, so that today it may no longer truthfully be said that the Boston orchestra is not the orchestra that it was in the days of its prime. And that was a comment heard and written more than once in the years immediately following Dr. Muck's abrupt departure from our midst.

In its present excellence our orchestra is an organization in which, without undue vainglory, Bostonians may, and do, take the utmost pride and satisfaction. There may be orchestras of equal merit in other cities of this country or of Europe; there may scarcely be any that surpass it. Not without reason did Lawrence Gilman lately remark in the columns of the New York Herald-Tribune that Mr. Koussevitsky "would weep tears of joy" when first he heard it play.

Course of His Activities

To go back a few years in reminiscence, it will be recalled that Boston first made the acquaintance of Mr. Monteux as the conductor of Diaglievs Russian Ballet, in a brief but memorable season at the Boston Opera House, some eight years ago. From him came then stirring performances of "Scheherazade," of "The Afternoon of a Faun," of Stravinsky's "Firebird" and "Petrushka," and of sundry other pieces in the Russians' colorful repertory. (Would that those enchanting creations might again be seen and heard here!)

In the year that followed Mr. Monteux was engaged as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and the spring visit of that company to Boston first disclosed him here as conductor of opera, notably in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel," a piece ideally suited to his tastes and temperament. For yet another year Mr. Monteux remained with the Metropolitan, and that year, too, was destined to bring him to Boston, this time with no accompanying organization. For Henri Rabaud, engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony for the season of 1918-19, was unable to reach this country in time for the first two concerts, and it was Mr. Monteux who took his place.

Whether or not Boston would gladly have had more of that genial man and excellent musician, Mr. Rabaud, finding his work here too confining and too taxing, was anxious to return to Paris, there to have more leisure for composition. And as his successor here in Boston the choice fell almost inevitably upon Mr. Monteux, as a man who had proved himself capable, who was really available, and who was willing and glad to come.

Through the autumn and winter of 1919 the affairs of the orchestra, at least outwardly, went smoothly enough, while the concerts prospered and Mr. Monteux steadily advanced in the esteem of his audiences. But trouble was brewing among the players, whose demands for a raise in salaries had not been met to their satisfaction (although there were other issues which need not be entered into here), and in March the storm broke, more than 30 of its members summarily severed their connection with the band, and Mr. Monteux found himself faced with the problem of continuing the season with a crippled orchestra, of contriving programmes that could be played by his depleted forces, and of engaging and "training in" new players. And as we all gratefully remember, he met the situation gallantly. By the end of that season the majority of the vacant places had been filled, the damage done to the ensemble was greatly minimized if not altogether remedied, and by another autumn the personnel was once more practically complete, although it was not until the beginning of the present season that the horn section at last numbered eight instead of six performers.

So passed Mr. Monteux's first strenuous year of service. From that time the playing of the orchestra drew nearer and nearer to the perfection that had once characterized it and that had brought it world renown, and Mr. Monteux himself seemed steadily to gain in prowess as conductor. When the date set for the expiration of his original contract drew nigh there was much gossip as to whether or not he would remain, or as to who would be his successor. With commendable sagacity the question was settled by an agreement that he extend his term to five years, with the understanding that at the end of that period he would not be re-engaged. Thus it is, then, that he leaves us now, not as one dispossessed, but as one who departs in accordance with an arrangement of long standing. There are many, indeed, who would have him remain, and it may even be that Mr. Monteux leaves us with reluctance, but all things considered, the orchestra and its public are undoubtedly better served by having, at suitable intervals, a change of leadership. Perchance Mr. Monteux may some day return to us; as to that no one can tell. But meantime it is for us to wish him Godspeed, and to heap upon him as he goes our deep and abiding gratitude for all that he has done.

As Programme-Maker

Aside from his rare abilities as organizer and drill master, aside from his keen and sensitive ear, to which we owe the orchestra's present exquisite euphony and tonal balance, and aside from his gifts as interpreter of music of many and diverse schools, Mr. Monteux has made strong claim on our regard through his admirably ordered and widely ranging programmes. On this last count he has, indeed, had his critics, as must every man of imagination or even of signal ability. Some—and as it seems to the present writer, with scant foundation—have complained of the general arrangement of his programmes, and many have bewailed or denounced his partiality to the music of certain ultra-modern composers. Yet it is th's very open-mindedness to the contemporary music of all schools and nationalities that has particularly endeared Mr. Monteux to a not inconsiderable portion of the orchestra's audiences.

Like Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Monteux believes that the repertory of a symphony orchestra should be broadly representative. Accordingly he has placed upon his programmes the music of the established composers, classical, romantic and modern, frequently and commendably seeking worthy pieces that, for various reasons, had been dropped from the active repertory. Accordingly, too, and it is here that he has incurred protests and reproaches, he has been hospitable to the music of our immediate time. And although those who have so bitterly complained of the performance of one or another ultra-modern composition apparently do not suspect it, Mr. Monteux has not always played such music because of his own great love of it. Indeed, he himself has had no particular liking for more than one "radical" piece that he has brought to performance here simply and solely because he believed in its province and his duty to give such contentious music the benefit of a hearing.

Among the subscribers to a series of Symphony concerts there have always been, and perhaps always will be, some who do not wish to hear music that they deem "unmelodious," "discordant," or unnecessarily involved. Of old those "stand-patters" objected to Wagner and even to Brahms and to Tchaikovsky. Later it was Richard Strauss who aroused their displeasure, and after him Debussy and Ravel. Today it is Stravinsky, Honegger, Milhaud, Casella and Arthur Bliss; and when they have become established and accepted, as in all probability some day they will, there will arise a new generation of "cacaphonists," of disturbers of the peace. And so the game goes merrily on.

Now were the conductor of a symphony orchestra to bow supinely before the protests of the offended or the enraged, he would put prove himself unworthy of his high estate of leadership, and from Carl Zerrahn onward, Boston has nearly always been blessed with conductors sufficiently broad-minded and courageous to play music novel enough to distress the conservative. So that, after all, there is nothing so very new or remarkable in Mr. Monteux's attitude toward contemporary composers. Rather, it is expected that a man of the artistic stature to be the conductor of the Boston Orchestra will be a man with the boldness and the enterprise to play whatever music chances at that particular time to be "modern" music. Not because he has given us Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," or "Horatius Victorious," or Milhaud's Second Suite, has Mr. Monteux especially earned our praise, but because to a marked, almost an unprecedented, degree he has extended a welcoming hand to the composers of all countries.

In Mr. Rabaud, excellent musician that he was, we had an example of the Chauvinist. To Cesar Franck and to certain lesser French composers, he showed a partiality that in time became irritating. Not so Mr. Monteux. A Frenchman and a patriot, he has nevertheless given us liberally of the music of German composers, and not only the music of Beethoven and the other "classics," but that of Brahms, Strauss and Wagner as well. To be sure, he withheld the promised performance of a Symphony by Bruckner because he found himself unable to see the virtue in the Austrian's music, but he did give

Pos E May 3

POPS' OPENING FROM WNAC

A never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC—the Shepard Stores—at 8:15 o'clock, tomorrow evening.

The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia.

This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America.

During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

written while the eminent musician was a resident of New York and has for its inspiration the folk tunes of America. Dvorak himself said that he did not take any special themes for the foundation of this symphony but used thematic material partly borrowed from Southern negro melodies and partly original. This inspiration came, of course, from the plaintive tunes of the South.

The symphony is a delightful work, rich in sweet melodies and fashioned with the skill of a master musician. The slow movement is one that lingers in the hearer's memory and throughout the four movements there is originality of treatment, colorful instrumentation and brilliant effects.

FRENCH NUMBERS GIVEN

The remaining portion of the orchestra programme included the Debussy prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Wagner overture to "Tannhauser." It is in the imaginative writings of the modern French composers that M. Monteux finds material for delightfully artistic conceptions. He has played the Debussy work here on previous occasions. It is always intimately sensed and set forth with delicacy and beauty.

For the closing number the ever popular "Tannhauser" overture received a brilliant rendition.

The evening's soloist, John Charles Thomas, scored a big success in his two appearances with the orchestra. He has become a favorite with Providence audiences through former visits here in concert. The "Pagliacci" prologue was sung with dramatic effect and brought him many recalls. His other number, the air, "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," received an artistic interpretation and showed his fine voice to particular advantage. Again he was the recipient of tremendous applause and was forced to return several times in acknowledgment.

A. F. P.

the Russians and the [illegible] Italians.

Concerning the pieces performed yesterday there is little or nothing to be said that could be of profit or interest. This, however, may be said: The fame of Debussy will probably rest on "Pelleas and Melisande," one of the few great operas in the world, 'the Afternoon of a Faun," and a few songs and piano pieces.

The orchestral performance was superb throughout the concert. Beethoven's immortal symphony was dramatically beautiful and noble. Mr. Monteux succeeded where many excellent conductors have failed: in maintaining interest after the first glorious outburst in the finale. With too many conductors this opening is in itself a climax. After the mysterious measures of preparation, and the remaining pages fall comparatively flat, but Mr. Monteux made these dangerous pages vital; they were in turn a preparation for the jubilant, overwhelming close.

He must have realized yesterday [illegible] what high esteem and warm affection he is held by audience and orchestra. There has not been so enthusiastic a demonstration of regard for a conducto in the orchestral history of the last 3 years. The rising from the seats, th prolonged applause, the recalls after th symphony and at the end—these wer for once not perfunctory.

Mr. Monteux richly deserved th tribute. The Boston Symphony Orche tra has been a title for 43 years. Tw orchestras have borne it gallantly; th first was created by Wilhelm Gericke the second is the creation of Pier Monteux, who leaves a marvellous i strument for his successor to play upo

The Herald tomorrow will contain short sketch of the past season, with few words about the leader who ha with gra— and modesty, proved himse to be a courteous disciplinarian, an e quent interpretor of ancient, mode and ultra-modern music of every sch and every nationality.

Such as this comparisons are more than ever superfluous, more than ever odious. And this may and should be said: No conductor of our orchestra has ever left Boston taking with him in such measure the good will and the affection of the concert-going public.

Boston's Debt to Mr. Monteux

In part Boston feels thus warmly towards Mr. Monteux because of its keen realization that but for his tact, skill and courage the Boston Symphony Orchestra might today have been in very different estate. Whether or not another might with equal success have kept the orchestra essentially intact when disruption and disaffection within its ranks seriously threatened its very existence, few conductors could so speedily, so unostentatiously have restored the band to all its former excellence, so that today it may no longer truthfully be said that the Boston orchestra is not the orchestra that it was in the days of its prime. And that was a comment heard and written more than once in the years immediately following Dr. Muck's abrupt departure from our midst.

In its present excellence our orchestra is an organization in which, without undue vainglory, Bostonians may, and do, take the utmost pride and satisfaction. There may be orchestras of equal merit in other cities of this country or of Europe; there may scarcely be any that surpass it. Not without reason did Lawrence Gilman lately remark in the columns of the New York Herald-Tribune that Mr. Koussevitsky "would weep tears of joy" when first he heard it play.

Course of His Activities

To go back a few years in reminiscence, it will be recalled that Boston first made the acquaintance of Mr. Monteux as the conductor of Diaglievs Russian Ballet, in a brief but memorable season at the Boston Opera House, some eight years ago. From him came then stirring performances of "Scheherazade," of "The Afternoon of a Faun," of Stravinsky's "Firebird" and "Petrushka," and of sundry other pieces in the Russians' colorful repertory. (Would that those enchanting creations might again be seen and heard here!)

In the year that followed Mr. Monteux was engaged as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and the spring visit of that company to Boston first disclosed him here as conductor of opera, notably in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel," a piece ideally his work here too confining and too taxing, was anxious to return to Paris, there to have more leisure for composition. And as his successor here in Boston the choice fell almost inevitably upon Mr. Monteux, as a man who had proved himself capable, who was really available, and who was willing and glad to come.

Through the autumn and winter of 1919 the affairs of the orchestra, at least outwardly, went smoothly enough, while the concerts prospered and Mr. Monteux steadily advanced in the esteem of his audiences. But trouble was brewing among the players, whose demands for a raise in salaries had not been met to their satisfaction (although there were other issues which need not be entered into here), and in March the storm broke, more than 30 of its members summarily severed their connection with the band, and Mr. Monteux found himself faced with the problem of continuing the season with a crippled orchestra, of contriving programmes that could be played by his depleted forces, and of engaging and "training in" new players. And as we all gratefully remember, he met the situation gallantly. By the end of that season the majority of the vacant places had been filled, the damage done to the ensemble was greatly minimized if not altogether remedied, and by another autumn the personnel was once more practically complete, although it was not until the beginning of the present season that the horn section at last numbered eight instead of six performers.

So passed Mr. Monteux's first strenuous year of service. From that time the playing of the orchestra drew nearer and nearer to the perfection that had once characterized it and that had brought it world renown, and Mr. Monteux himself seemed steadily to gain in prowess as conductor. When the date set for the expiration of his original contract drew nigh there was much gossip as to whether or not he would remain, or as to who would be his successor. With commendable sagacity the question was settled by an agreement that he extend his term to five years, with the understanding that at the end of that period he would not be re-engaged. Thus it is, then, that he leaves us now, not as one dispossessed, but as one who departs in accordance with an arrangement of long standing. There are many, indeed, who would have him remain, and it may even be that Mr. Monteux leaves us with reluctance, but all things considered, the orchestra and its public are undoubtedly better served by having, at suitable intervals, a change of leadership. Perchance Mr. Monteux may gard through the [illegible] and widely ranging programmes. On this last count he has, indeed, had his critics, as must every man of imagination or even of signal ability. Some—and as it seems to the present writer, with scant foundation—have complained of the general arrangement of his programmes, and many have bewailed or denounced his partiality to the music of certain ultra-modern composers. Yet it is this very open-mindedness to the contemporary music of all schools and nationalities that has particularly endeared Mr. Monteux to a not inconsiderable portion of the orchestra's audiences.

Like Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Monteux believes that the repertory of a symphony orchestra should be broadly representative. Accordingly he has placed upon his programmes the music of the established composers, classical, romantic and modern, frequently and commendably seeking worthy pieces that, for various reasons, had been dropped from the active repertory. Accordingly, too, and it is here that he has incurred protests and reproaches, he has been hospitable to the music of our immediate time. And although those who have so bitterly complained of the performance of one or another ultra-modern composition apparently do not suspect it, Mr. Monteux has not always played such music because of his own great love of it. Indeed, he himself has had no particular liking for more than one "radical" piece that he has brought to performance here simply and solely because he believed in its province and his duty to give such contentious music the benefit of a hearing.

Among the subscribers to a series of Symphony concerts there have always been, and perhaps always will be, some who do not wish to hear music that they deem "unmelodious," "discordant," or unnecessarily involved. Of old those "stand-patters" objected to Wagner and even to Brahms and to Tchaikovsky. Later it was Richard Strauss who aroused their displeasure, and after him Debussy and Ravel. Today it is Stravinsky, Honegger, Milhaud, Casella and Arthur Bliss; and when they have become established and accepted, as in all probability some day they will, there will arise a new generation of "cacaphonists," of disturbers of the peace. And so the game goes merrily on.

Now were the conductor of a symphony orchestra to bow supinely before the protests of the offended or the enraged, he would put prove himself unworthy of his high estate of leadership, and from Carl Zerrahn onward, Boston has nearly always been blessed with conductors sufficiently broad-minded and courageous to play music novel enough to distress the conservative. So that, after all, there is nothing so very new or remarkable in Mr. Monteux's attitude toward contemporary composers. Rather, it is expected that a man of the artistic stature to be the conductor of the Boston Orchestra will be a man with the boldness and the enterprise to play whatever music chances at that particular time to be "modern" music. Not because he has given us Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," or "Horatius Victorious," or Milhaud's Second Suite, has Mr. Monteux especially earned our praise, but because to a marked, almost an unprecedented, degree he has extended a welcoming hand to the composers of all countries.

In Mr. Rabaud, excellent musician that he was, we had an example of the Chauvinist. To Cesar Franck and to certain lesser French composers, he showed a partiality that in time became irritating. Not so Mr. Monteux. A Frenchman and a patriot, he has nevertheless given us liberally of the music of German composers, and not only the music of Beethoven and the other "classics," but that of Brahms, Strauss and Wagner as well. To be sure, he withheld the promised performance of a Symphony by Bruckner because he found himself unable to see the virtue in the Austrian's music, but he did give us the First Symphony of Mahler, while in the fact that he did not follow the example of Dr. Muck and lay before us the sterile and stodgy works of Weingartner, Boehe, Sheinpflug, Noren, Bischoff and various other present-day Teutons, we have reason only to rejoice. Nor did Mr. Monteux inflict upon us, as so easily he might have done, the mediocrities of his own France. "If I am to play French music," he once remarked, "I wish to play only the best." And from that stand [illegible] has hardly once departed. [illegible] pressure upon him to act as propagandist for his friends and [illegible] must have been considerable.

Regarding in brief [illegible] the music [illegible] symphony concerts during the five years just past, the chief impression is of its range and scope. During those five years we have made the acquaintance at these concerts of many names notable in contemporary music: the English Vaughan-Williams, Bas, Holst and Bliss; the French Honegger, Milhaud and Roussel; the Italian Casella and Respighi; the Spanish de Falla and Turina. And although Dr. Muck gave us our first hearing of Stravinsky in his early and unimportant "Fireworks," we owe to Mr. Monteux the first performance in the concert hall of "The Firebird," "Petrushka" and, above all, that most important "novelty" of the whole five years, "The Rite of Spring."

Finally, mention should be made of Mr. Monteux's never-failing generosity towards the composers of our own country, a generosity that has, to be sure, occasionally led him to play music intrinsically of little merit, but that nevertheless bespeaks true courtesy. And to his discernment in the field of American music we owe certain notable "revivals": for example, Mr. Chadwick's Overture, "Melpomene," Paine's Prelude to the "Oedipus" of Sophocles; and, at the concerts of the week just ended, Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," while to him we are also indebted not only for the actual first performances of such worthwhile American compositions as Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Gilbert's "Indian Suite," to mention but two of many, but for the first performance in Boston of such notable American achievements as Deems Taylor's "Looking-Glass Suite" and Schelling's "A Victory Ball." Moreover be it said, in conclusion, and to his further credit, that upon the preparation of these works Mr. Monteux lavished the same care that he bestowed upon the performance of the most significant new composition from Finland or from France. And it would scarcely be possible to say as much for any one of his illustrious predecessors.

Post May 3

POPS' OPENING FROM WNAC

A never failing sign that summer will soon be here, is the opening at Symphony Hall of "Pops." The opening night will be broadcast by Station WNAC—the Shepard Stores—at 8:15 o'clock, tomorrow evening.

The ensemble of the orchestra is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia.

This is Mr. Jacchia's eighth season as the conductor of Pops. He is a native of Italy and since coming to this country he has conducted from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America.

During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920, he became the conductor of the historical Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

54 Trans May 3

Symphony

MONTEUX'S END SETS CROWN TO MONTEUX'S WORK

A FINAL CONCERT TO HAILING PUBLIC

Applause That but Half Expressed Regard, Reward, Regret—Programme for Leave-Taking—The Tonal Adventures of Mr. Carpenter's Infant Sound Afresh—Beethoven and Debussy for Classics Old and New—Wagner for Close

IT is high time to discover fresh outlet for both the bestowers and the recipients of applause. Yesterday afternoon, as departing conductor, Mr. Monteux took final leave of half the public of the Symphony Concerts in the orchestra's own city. The audience was plainly eager to give him every proof of good will. Yet, by custom, all that it could do was to rise when he came first to his place; clap him for a minute or two; resume the clapping at the first long pause in the concert; reiterate it into recalls after the last note had sounded. A few in the galleries then lifted their voices in cries undistinguishable to ears below. Otherwise, every plaudit followed precedent. In turn, Mr. Monteux, as honestly stirred, could only repeat bows and smiles of acknowledgement, or with a wave of his hand, twice bid the orchestra share his reward. When he entered, however, it was already on its feet to greet him; while when he bade it rise, it did so only to shower him with the best of applause—that of companions in the working day. No more in these things, unless the orchestra had sounded a "tusch," could he or it do.

In Italy, audiences shout their delight to those that please them; but we American reserve that exercise for conversations in public places or for argument in private. In Russia—it is said—audiences fling their head gear into the air or at the human target of their satisfactions. In Symphony Hall, however, the hat feminine reposes upon the lap of the wearer; while the hat masculine is wire-bound beneath the seat. Nor is it easy to conceive the studious youth of our Friday afternoons drawing Mr. Monteux's cab to his lodgings, or the elect ladies of these matinées pelting him with flowers. For them, for all of us, the only accustomed way is to stand and clap and, may be, murmur in our throats rather than on our lips. Yet, in all sincerity and in no little warmth we intend so much more of regard and regret than these outward and audible signs convey.

For his part, Mr. Monteux could hardly be expected to dance for joy upon the stage after the manner of Mr. Carpenter's perambulating infant heard there only half an hour before. As little could he follow Schiller's and Beethoven's exhortation in the Choral Symphony to embrace his fellow-creatures by millions, or even by the two-thousand-odd gathered in Symphony Hall. It is done in Latin and Slavic Europe; but it is hard to see the conductor with his arms enfolding the concert-master, in token of fellow-feeling for the orchestra. By all the precedents, Mr. Monteux could only bow, smile, and outspread deprecating or summoning hands. Yet quite certainly he would return much more of gratitude and regret than these visible signs may bear. So it goes and so it will go, until some genius finds new ways of applause—strictly suitable to Anglo-Saxon audiences—and new ways of acknowledgment, likewise congenial to modest and, about themselves, reticent conductors.

With his usual skill, but as characteristically with two departures from tradition, Mr. Monteux had arrayed a programme of leave-taking. Time and again, conductors so quitting the Symphony Concerts, have chosen as last piece of all, the upswelling instrumental song, the far-spreading tonal pageant, of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Mr. Monteux still clung to Wagner for voice of farewell; but his choice alighted upon the Overture to "Tannhäuser." (Let only the vilest of cynics say that while the conductor excels with the Overture, he is not so fortunate with the Prelude.) Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, for older classic, and Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,'" for newer, were manifestly in place for pièces d' adieux. When, however, has a conductor, departing from Symphony Hall, set upon such a list music by an American composer? Mr. Monteux, fine-fibred and catholic of spirit to the last, conceived it his courtesy, his obligation, so to do. With his usual flair as well, he pitched upon a light and little masterpiece in kind—Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in A Perambulator," as apt and inventive in accomplishment as they are humorsome and fanciful in intent. Mr. Monteux has long known the Suite; it is, indeed, one of the few persisting pieces of American music. He has long intended to include it in a pair of concerts. In his one hundred and twenty-second pair in Boston came the opportunity. And a programme from Mr. Monteux, even for leave-taking, would not seem quite his, unless it contained at least one relatively novel piece.

The more the pity that the conductor did not quite succeed with all of Mr. Carpenter's tonal humors. He caught and conveyed to gay illusion the dogs padding in and out of their instrumental play, barking at will of the wind-choir, loping away to what elderly purists—one was within earshot—like to call a "sidewalk ditty." (For has not Mr. Carpenter been "common," ever since he confessed to pleasure in Jazz and to delight in the "strips" of "Krazy Kat?") On the other side of the account

Trans May 3

AGAIN THE POPS

A New Series of the Familiar Concerts to Begin on Monday Under the Usual Conditions—Mr. Jacchia for Conductor and Programme-Maker—Occasional Sundays

FOR a thirty-ninth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall, to continue there on every secular evening and, on four alternate Sundays, through Saturday, July 5. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats, while tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible (except on Sundays) to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them (Sundays again excepted) unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—stands as heretofore at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take their pleasure as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, seventy or eighty strong, as need may require, will play nightly; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make diversified and interesting programmes becomingly flavored with fresh numbers. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo-pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes an "Oriental Rhapsody of Glazunov"; the final scene of Wagner's "Tristan"; a pot-pourri from the musical-play, "Wildflower," as yet unknown to Boston. The programme of Tuesday brings a folk-dance from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Snow Maiden"; a "selection" from the music to Fred Stone's current extravaganza, "Stepping Stones"; familiar fragments from "Carmen" and Dvorák's Symphony, "From the New World." The audience on Wednesday will hear dances from Schubert's ballet-music to "Rosamond"; an arrangement by Mr. Jacchia of the slow movement in Beethoven's "Pathetic Sonata"; Chabrier's glowing "Espana." On Thursday, the Glee Club of Wellesley will sing songs of its college. On Friday, Mr. Laus, the first bassoon-player, will be heard upon the saxophone in an "Old Slave Song"; and the usual dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker," will be played. For orchestra, Mr. Jacchia has also arranged a Waltz of Grieg. Fragments of "Lohengrin"; Casella's graphic and incisive rhapsody, "Italia," and a solo for flute, played by Mr. Amerena, diversify the programme on Saturday. On Sunday, May 11, Russian composers have a copious inning of familiar pieces. Among them are the whirling dances from

Mr. Monteux somehow missed the tonal bulk of The Policeman—"round like a ball; taller than my father; blue, fearful, fascinating"—and his tonal gait, "like Doom." Surely, after five years in Boston and two or three in New York, the conductor must know "the type" at first hand and many times over. Did he take The Policeman's measures rather too quickly for that massive figure, that "enormous blue march?" Did he profile a little indistinctly the motive that proclaims and accompanies this portentous guardian of urban peace? By this evening, perhaps, Mr. Monteux will have come to closer grips with him. No more would the conductor quite give the hurdy-gurdy its tinkling head—that celebrated hurdy-gurdy of two xylophones and a harp, rival to Stravinsky's (otherwise produced) in "Petruschka," equal "outrage" upon pure and conservative ears. Surely Mr. Monteux must have heard the American hurdy-gurdy on its native heath with "the dark man" or "the lady richly dressed" to turn the handle. It is an innocent pleasure. Did not the Carpenterian baby wish [illegible] perambulator, all three of us together?" Yet somehow the conductor seemed a little to blush for it.

Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux altogether succeeded with Mr. Carpenter's music of sentiment and vision. The string choir, for the little waves, shimmered and rippled above the softly glowing horns, singing the loveliness of "My Lake." For there are spring days and summer days when Lake Michigan is blue and silver like the music, and like it ruffling in the breeze. As imagining and imparting was Mr. Monteux when Mr. Carpenter stills his measures into haze of memory, when all that they have recounted blurs across the dreaming little mind; fuses into a vague and dear content—pages of vapors drifting and in charm as "The Lake" has been pages of beauty and in motion. As well Mr. Monteux caught the manifold fancy that devises, conducts and colors Mr. Carpenter "characterizing motivs"; the composer's endless seeking and final finding of the felicitous modulations, the harmonies, the timbres that are the imagining fertilized and vivified in tones. Little music from American pens so savors the voices of the orchestra, so uses them in such adroit play and tint and transparency; so weaves an American substance and spirit into a universal speech. Writing last winter in the programme-book of the Philharmonic Society in New York, Mr. Gilman noted "Mr. Carpenter's famous Suite." The adjective [illegible] well chosen.

With the Beethoven and the Debussy, in these latter days, of Mr. Monteux and his orchestra, there has been no quarrelling. The conductor's version of the Fifth Symphony may not quite gain the songful fluidity, the rhythmic pulse, the climacteric count and march of his version of the Seventh; yet it abounds in his mastery of Beethoven's upspringing and outspreading melodies; reiterated and pounding chords; tumults released; figures awhirr with mystery and anticipation; song deepened; exultation scaling and spanning the skies. With power, with beauty, with suspense, with elation, Mr. Monteux in order proclaimed the Symphony. A classic masterpiece lived again, not encased and a-cold, but in the heat and the passion with which Beethoven, "rumbling and roaring to himself," put it romantically to paper.

There are classics also written in our day and as justly such by intrinsic and vital quality as though a hundred years, instead of thirty, had affirmed them upon the universal ear and mind. Debussy wrote his Prelude of The Faun in the first years of his slowly ripened prime. It is dated 1894—before wives and luxury and fame and self-content had sapped him. Not even in "Pelléas and Mélisande" and in a few of his songs and piano-pieces are the sensibilities of his mind and hand more susceptible and keen-edged. Nowhere are his imagination and his handiwork more richly fertile. Nowhere are the vision and the revelation, the design and the progress, the substance and the atmosphere, the spirit and the voice, more completely one, indivisible and self-contained. In his thirty-second year when he was still of himself and by himself, Debussy had achieved a music of a perfect unity and a perfect beauty; a music, besides, in content and utterance akin to no other. With reason, it stirs a conductor and an orchestra, as it did Mr. Monteux and his men, to a like beauty of voice, a like unity and mobility and felicity of all the arts of expression; while hearers drink of it, their eyes and hearts swimming in the glamour and the ecstasy. There are still Castalian springs in the music of this our very day, and through "The Faun" therein does Debussy bathe.

The Overture to "Tannhauser" brought ending. Yet listening, the hearer may have heeded less than usual the musical quality, the scenic and the spiritual suggestion, of [illegible]ures that countless repetitions may not wear threadbare and hackneyed. Ra[illegible] the pilgrims were passing, singing. T[illegible] had begun their course in doubt and t[illegible] vail. They were finishing it in fruiti[illegible] and glory. With the Boston Symphon[illegible] Orchestra so also has journeyed Pierr[illegible] Monteux.

H. T. P.

Error and Regret

Gibberish That Was Intended as Compliment to a Retiring Conductor

IN a review, printed in yesterday's Transcript, of Mr. Monteux's farewell concert in Cambridge with the Symphony Orchestra, the reviewer attempted to pay a compliment to the conductor and the audience. By correctors' errors, it was reduced to a meaningless gibberish that was an affront to the intelligence of both. Here follow, accordingly, the sentences as they were written:

> Even a "University Audience" is capable of "record-breaking" applause, as there was proof and to spare in Sanders Theatre. In Symphony Hall today and tomorrow Boston must look to its, and to Mr. Monteux's, laurels. Already, however, after New York, Providence and now Cambridge his smooth brow must be pressed tight with them.
>
> There was also a concert with Mr. Monteux's Orchestra, otherwise the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1924, playing at the top of its mettle. The voices of Ludwig van Beethoven, sometime composer in Vienna, and of Richard Wagner, once of Zürich, Baireuth, the Valkyrs' Rock and the flowing Rhine, were also heard in the land.

Globe May 3

"POPS" SEASON WILL BE OPENED MONDAY

Agide Jacchia to Conduct for Eighth Year

There have been numerous distinguished and popular conductors of the "Pops," but probably none has been such an emphatic success with his public as Agide Jacchia, who is to open his eighth season as conductor next Monday at Symphony Hall.

AGIDE JACCHIA,
Conductor of the "Pops."

Each of his seven seasons to date has broken all previous records in attendance at the "Pops." The coming season promises to make a new record, and it may surely be asserted with confidence that this talented musician is the most popular leader the "Pops" have ever had.

Now an American citizen, Mr Jacchia is a native of Pesaro, Italy. He became a pupil of Mascagni at an early age in the conservatory of that city and has been the life-long friend and admirer of the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana," conducting all his operas in many parts of the world. As a very young man, Mr Jacchia made a reputation as a conductor in the principal opera houses of Italy.

Since coming to this country Mr Jacchia has conducted opera from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America. During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920 he became the conductor of the Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

Mr Jacchia's "Pops" orchestra numbers over 80 players. It is surely the finest symphony orchestra to be heard in this part of the country in the warmer season of the year.

At the Pops Tonight

Opening Concert

Hungarian March, "Rákóczy"....Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding" .....Mozart
Waltz, "Très-Jolie" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazunov
Burlesca, United energy, skill and enthusiasm.

LIKE ALL THE PIECES

Although the announcements of the Pops still declare that the programmes are comprised of "popular music," and although the record-breaking attendance that has been the rule in each of the past few seasons bears testimony to the public liking for these present programmes, the word "popular" as applied to them must be taken in its broadest sense. In other words the sharp distinction that so many are pleased to make between music that is "popular" and music that is "classical," may in this case hardly apply. On last evening's programme, for example, only one item, the selection from the musical play "Wildflower," was from the music of theatre, music-hall or cabaret. And with the exception of Emil Waldteufel, writer of charming waltzes for the court of the third Napoleon, the other composers there represented are of the great or the [illegible]arly great in music.

Berlioz and Mozart

For appropriately festive and exciting beginning came the stirring "Rakoczy" march of Berlioz, and for foil and contrast there followed the effervescent overture to Mozart's immortal comic opera, "The Marriage of Figaro." Custom has ordered that the first group in each Pop programme should end with an operatic selection, hence the presence in that place last evening of the fantasia from Saint-Saens' "Samson

Her May 3

SELECTIONS FROM OUR MAIL BAG

MONTEUX'S LAST CONCERT

To the Editor of The Herald:

On Saturday next comes the last Symphony concert, and Mr. Monteux will leave Boston. The address which will be presented to him shows the appreciation of the musical public, but the greater public, of which the musical public is only a part, is indebted to him likewise, in at least two important matters.

First is the attempted unionization of the Boston Symphony orchestra. No one who thinks at all about modern problems fails to realize the great good the unions have done in the past and how necessary they are to protect the workingman. At the same time, the unions have gone far beyond such necessary protection, and, beginning as the foe to tyranny, seem likely to end in becoming tyrants themselves.

In building, for example, every part of the work is now parceled out by the unions between themselves and oft times the contest is not between the owners and the unions, but between the different unions as to which will obtain a particular piece of work, while the owner stands by in helpless fashion; and so what we generally think of as freedom is still a long way off. The public is slowly rising to this situation. When the octopus reached out one tentacle to gain control of the police force of this city the public understood the principle involved and the man who backed up Police Commissioner Curtis in enforcing that principle is now in the White House. The octopus reached out another tentacle in the effort to enslave the orchestra. No one who knew how much depended upon the freedom of art could await the result of such a conflict without anxiety. It was quite possible that we should be reduced to the drab and colorless condition in music which obtains wherever the unions in their strength have killed all initiative. The trustees of the orchestra deserve great credit for their stand; and yet the utmost they could do might only wreck the orchestra for a principle—they could not create a new orchestra without a loyal conductor. This, however, Mr. Monteux accomplished, and the community owes him a debt, not only because the union was beaten, but because the union was beaten so thoroughly that we in Boston with a rehabilitated orchestra are still free.

Our second debt to him arises from a possible attitude toward Germany and German music at the end of the war. The German bubble was pricked. The German Ph. D., without which none of us in old times could hope to teach, ceased to be a fetish. The moral degradation of Germany became at last apparent. Yet, as Burke said, it is not possible to indict a whole people. It was quite easy to forget that many Germans in the past were not, after all, Prussians, and that there was a universality about art. We needed some one to bring home to us this evident truth, and this Mr. Monteux has done. No one can say that under him German music has been neglected. On the other hand, he has shown true catholicity in his readiness to give to us not only the best of all nations, but the best that we ourselves have produced. This has been done quietly and with self-effacement.

Therefore the community, which contains many who are not musical and to whom Symphony Hall is terra incognita, owes this man a debt because in the battlefield in which he was placed he has fought for its cause. It is this larger aspect of what he has done for Boston, as a whole, that we may well remember he departs.

GEO. R. NUTTER.

Boston, May 1.

Her May 4

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

Tomorrow night the Pop concerts at Symphony hall will begin. The pending season will be the 39th and will, as usual, provide a program of full musical fare every night in the week (and on alternate Sundays). Mr. Jacchia will take the leadership for his eighth successive season as the most popular of Pops conductors. The orchestra will number more than 80 symphony players. The usual accompaniment of refreshments will be served at the tables and in the Pops "bar" and "cafe." The programs of the week are as follows:

MONDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoozy".....Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazounov
Burlesca .....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Wildflower".....Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria (Solo violin, harp, organ, strings .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

TUESDAY

March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Strube
Overture, "Maximillian Robespierre," Litolff
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Simmons songs
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Volga Bargemen's song...Arr. by Jacchia
Rustic dance, "Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Stepping Stones".....Kern
Invitation to the dance.....Weber-Berlioz
American Patrol.....Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Raymond".....Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Ballet from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Largo .....Handel
Adagio from the Sonata Pathetique, Beethoven-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia
American Fantasy .....Herbert

THURSDAY

Pomp and Circumstance .....Elgar
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Songs by Wellesley Glee Club
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann" .....Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Wellesley Fantasy .....Macdougall
Fantasia, "Aida" .....Verdi
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Second Regiment Connecticut.....Reeves

FRIDAY

March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Old Slave Song (saxophone solo, A. Laus)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo .....Leoni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Meditation, from "Thais".....Massenet
Waltz in A minor .....Grieg-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ...Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ...Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "The Skaters" .....Waldteufel
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod

SATURDAY

Prelude to "Carmen" .....Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" .....Weber
Macushla .....MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" .....Casella
Pirouette (flute solo, Pasquale Amerena) Glazounov
Intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana Mascagni
Finale, Fourth Symphony ....Tchaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet .....Lnigini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ...Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance .....Brahms

SUNDAY

RUSSIAN PROGRAM
Entrance of Antony, "A Night in Egypt" Arensky
Dance of the Birds "Snegourotchka" Rimsky-Korsakov
Eight Russian Popular Melodies ..Liadov
Kammenoi Ostrow .....Rubenstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .Tchaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody .....Glazounov
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia

WILL BROADCAST POPS OPENING

WBZ to Put Noted Musical Organization on Air

"Macushla" on Extras

To this collection have now been added the song "Macushla," a pianoforte waltz of Grieg, and Scarlatti's "Burleska," all of which were heard last evening. To the Burleska, as it happened, was assigned a place upon the programme proper, and this list was completed by the glowing "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," the Schubert-Wilhelmj "Ave Maria," and the first of Dvorak's captivating "Slavic Dances."

At his disposal, Mr. Jacchia now has a band of 80 men or more, in other words all but a small portion of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization once more without peer. Given, then, this superb body of players and Mr. Jacchia's very considerable abilities as conductor, and performances as effective and as frequently eloquent as those of last evening become but the expected thing.

Eatables and Beverages

Even as the programmes already outlined seem to follow what is now the accepted course, so are these concerts, to judge by that of last night, in other respects adhearing to recent custom.

As before, the floor of the hall is close packed with tables where innocuous beverages and light eatables are served. As before the gray-aproned waitresses are in attendance, and as before, for those who prefer their liquid refreshment from what in these arid days passes for a bar, such accommodation is provided on the second floor. In all respects, then, the Pops are fairly started upon what promises to be their most successful season.

Director of Boston Symphony Pops

AGIDE JACCHIA

54 Trans May 3

Symphony

ONTEUX'S END SETS CROWN TO MONTEUX'S WORK

A FINAL CONCERT TO HAILING PUBLIC

Applause That but Half Expressed Regard, Reward, Regret—Programme for Leave-Taking—The Tonal Adventures of Mr. Carpenter's Infant Sound Afresh—Beethoven and Debussy for Classics Old and New—Wagner for Close

IT is high time to discover fresh outlet for both the bestowers and the recipients of applause. Yesterday afternoon, as departing conductor, Mr. Monteux took final leave of half the public of the Symphony Concerts in the orchestra's own city. The audience was plainly eager to give him every proof of good will. Yet, by custom, all that it could do was to rise when he came first to his place; clap him for a minute or two; resume the clapping at the first long pause in the concert; reiterate it into recalls after the last note had sounded. A few in the galleries then lifted their voices in cries undistinguishable to ears below. Otherwise, every plaudit followed precedent. In turn, Mr. Monteux, as honestly stirred, could only repeat bows and smiles of acknowledgement, or with a wave of his hand, twice bid the orchestra share his reward. When he entered, however, it was already on its feet to greet him; while when he bade it rise, it did so only to shower him with the best of applause—that of companions in the working day. No more in these things, unless the orchestra had sounded a "tusch," could he or it do.

In Italy, audiences shout their delight to those that please them; but we American reserve that exercise for conversations in public places or for argument in private. In Russia—it is said—audiences fling their head gear into the air or at the human target of their satisfactions. In Symphony Hall, however, the hat feminine reposes upon the lap of the wearer; while the hat masculine is wire-bound beneath the seat. Nor is it easy to conceive the studious youth of our Friday afternoons drawing Mr. Monteux's cab to his lodgings, or the elect ladies of these matinées pelting him with flowers. For them, for all of us, the only accustomed way is to stand and clap and, may be, murmur in our throats rather than on our lips. Yet, in all sincerity and in no little warmth we intend so much more of regard and regret than these outward and audible signs convey.

For his part, Mr. Monteux could hardly ylston St.

---

ublic Garden

top Society of Arts and Crafts, the illuminated lettering being by Miss Winifred M. Crawford and the binding by John F. Grabau.

At a dinner given last night by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, a handsome bowl also was presented to Mr. Monteux. It was a hand-wrought silver, the work of Arthur J. Stone of the Society of Arts and Crafts.

WOOL ACTIVE AT LIVERPOOL

Brisk Business Reported from Sale of Two Days, with Prices on a Parity with Last London Rates

Special Wireless to the Boston Transcript
Copyright, 1924, by Public Ledger Co.

London, May 2—There was brisk buying of wools at the Liverpool for two days, when 44,800 bales, comprising the remainder of the British-Australian Wool Realization stock, was offered. Prices showed no change from those ruling at the last London auctions, and offerings were divided between the home and continental trade.

At the end of today's sale, association officials and others held a meeting congratulatory on the close of the wool body's activities, the last offerings being sold. When wartime control of wool ceased in 1921, the British-Australian Wool Realization Association took over the Imperial Government's stock of nearly 3,000,000, which since has gradually been liquidated through London, Liverpool and Hull auctions.

Much interest is centred in the London auctions, opening Tuesday, with small offerings of 106,000 bales. There is a growing belief that prices will not be much altered and that advancing wool prices have received a check, partly through shipments of wool from America to Europe, irregular prices in Australia, and purchases made at sources of supply now being available in manufacturing centers.

Trade in Bradford is quiet, with merino tops and yarns inclined to be easy, but crossbreds steadily maintained.

MORSS IS APPOINTED

Former Governor of Boston Federal Reserve Bank Is Named for Federal Advisory Council

Trans May 3

AGAIN THE POPS

A New Series of the Familiar Concerts to Begin on Monday Under the Usual Conditions—Mr. Jacchia for Conductor and Programme-Maker—Occasional Sundays

FOR a thirty-ninth spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall, to continue there on every secular evening and, on four alternate Sundays, through Saturday, July 5. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats, while tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible (except on Sundays) to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them (Sundays again excepted) unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—stands as heretofore at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take their pleasure as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, seventy or eighty strong, as need may require, will play nightly; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make diversified and interesting programmes becomingly flavored with fresh numbers. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo-pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes an "Oriental Rhapsody of Glazunov"; the final scene of Wagner's "Tristan"; a pot-pourri from the musical-play, "Wildflower," as yet unknown to Boston. The programme of Tuesday brings a folk-dance from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Snow Maiden"; a "selection" from the music to Fred Stone's current extravaganza, "Stepping Stones"; familiar fragments from "Carmen" and Dvorák's Symphony, "From the New World." The audience on Wednesday will hear dances from Schubert's ballet-music to "Rosamond"; an arrangement by Mr. Jacchia of the slow movement in Beethoven's "Pathetic Sonata"; Chabrier's glowing "Espana." On Thursday, the Glee Club of Wellesley will sing songs of its college. On Friday, Mr. Laus, the first bassoon-player, will be heard upon the saxophone in an "Old Slave Song"; and the usual dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker," will be played. For orchestra, Mr. Jacchia has also arranged a Waltz of Grieg. Fragments of "Lohengrin"; Casella's graphic and incisive rhapsody, "Italia," and a solo for flute, played by Mr. Amerena, diversify the programme on Saturday. On Sunday, May 11, Russian composers have a copious inning of familiar pieces. Among them are the whirling dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," and an arrangement of Glinka's song, "The Lark."

The impending "nights" are for Simmons College on Tuesday; for the current "Music Week" on Wednesday; for Wellesley College on Thursday. All three are open, as usual, to the public.

Globe May 3

"POPS" SEASON WILL BE OPENED MONDAY

Agide Jacchia to Conduct for Eighth Year

There have been numerous distinguished and popular conductors of the "Pops," but probably none has been such an emphatic success with his public as Agide Jacchia, who is to open his eighth season as conductor next Monday at Symphony Hall.

AGIDE JACCHIA,
Conductor of the "Pops."

Each of his seven seasons to date has broken all previous records in attendance at the "Pops." The coming season promises to make a new record, and it may surely be asserted with confidence that this talented musician is the most popular leader the "Pops" have ever had.

Now an American citizen, Mr Jacchia is a native of Pesaro, Italy. He became a pupil of Mascagni at an early age in the conservatory of that city and has been the life-long friend and admirer of the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana," conducting all his operas in many parts of the world. As a very young man, Mr Jacchia made a reputation as a conductor in the principal opera houses of Italy.

Since coming to this country Mr Jacchia has conducted opera from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America. During the season of 1914-1915 he was principal Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. Thence he joined the Boston National Opera Company, which toured the United States in 1915-1916. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1920 he became the conductor of the Cecilia Society chorus of Boston.

Mr Jacchia's "Pops" orchestra numbers over 80 players. It is surely the finest symphony orchestra to be heard in this part of the country in the warmer season of the year.

Her May 3

BID FAREWELL TO PIERRE MONTEUX

Admirers Fill Symphony Hall —4000 Sign Memorial

A farewell reception was given to Pierre Monteux in Symphony hall yesterday a few hours before he made his last appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the conclusion of his five-year term.

The reception was given by the trustees, the members of the orchestra, and the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, presented the departing leader in their behalf a volume containing an expression of admiration and gratitude, and bearing the signatures of all present, and others, to the number of 4000. Among those who signed were Mrs. H. L. Higginson, President Lowell and ex-President Eliot of Harvard, Mayor Curley and Mrs. Curley, Lt.-Gov. Fuller and Mrs. Fuller. The text follows:

"To Pierre Monteux:

"As your five years among us draw to an end, we whose names are signed to these words wish to express directly to you our deep appreciation of all that your conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant to the art of music in our community and our country.

"You came to us at a time when many established things were threatened with destruction. We realize that to you a peculiar debt of gratitude is due not only for maintaining your true leadership of the orchestra through a critical period of its history, but also for re-establishing its musical position and bringing its performances to a pitch of beauty never surpassed. The keen pleasure we have had in the artistic results of your labors will be remembered with enduring thankfulness.

"As you return to your native land we shall follow you with grateful thoughts and the warmest wishes that, taking with you as artist and man our respect and admiration, you may meet with the best of good fortune through all the years to come."

At the Pops Tonight

Opening Concert

Hungarian March, "Rákóczy".....Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Figaro's Wedding".....Mozart
Waltz, "Très-Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazunov
Burlesca.....Scarlatti-Jacchia
"Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Slav March.....Chaikovsky
Selection, "Wildflower".....Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance, No. 1.....Dvorák

Conductor: A. Jacchia

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

When the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall open tonight Agide Jacchia and the orchestra of 80 Symphony players will present this program:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro."
.....Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazounov
Burlesca.....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tschaikovsky
Selection, "Wildflower"...Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance, No. 1.....Dvorak

Her May 3

SELECTIONS FROM OUR MAIL BAG

MONTEUX'S LAST CONCERT

To the Editor of The Herald:

On Saturday next comes the last Symphony concert, and Mr. Monteux will leave Boston. The address which will be presented to him shows the appreciation of the musical public, but the greater public, of which the musical public is only a part, is indebted to him likewise, in at least two important matters.

First is the attempted unionization of the Boston Symphony orchestra. No one who thinks at all about modern problems fails to realize the great good the unions have done in the past and how necessary they are to protect the workingman. At the same time, the unions have gone far beyond such necessary protection, and, beginning as the foe to tyranny, seem likely to end in becoming tyrants themselves.

In building, for example, every part of the work is now parceled out by the unions between themselves and oft times the contest is not between the owners and the unions, but between the different unions as to which will obtain a particular piece of work, while the owner stands by in helpless fashion; and so what we generally think of as freedom is still a long way off. The public is slowly rising to this situation. When the octopus reached out one tentacle to gain control of the police force of this city the public understood the principle involved and the man who backed up Police Commissioner Curtis in enforcing that principle is now in the White House. The octopus reached out another tentacle in the effort to enslave the orchestra. No one who knew how much depended upon the freedom of art could await the result of such a conflict without anxiety. It was quite possible that we should be reduced to the drab and colorless condition in music which obtains wherever the unions in their strength have killed all initiative. The trustees of the orchestra deserve great credit for their stand; and yet the utmost they could do might only wreck the orchestra for a principle—they could not create a new orchestra without a loyal conductor. This, however, Mr. Monteux accomplished, and the community owes him a debt, not only because the union was beaten, but because the union was beaten so thoroughly that we in Boston with a rehabilitated orchestra are still free.

Our second debt to him arises from a possible attitude toward Germany and German music at the end of the war. The German bubble was pricked. The German Ph. D., without which none of us in old times could hope to teach, ceased to be a fetish. The moral degradation of Germany became at last apparent. Yet, as Burke said, it is not possible to indict a whole people. It was quite easy to forget that many Germans in the past were not, after all, Prussians, and that there was a universality about art. We needed some one to bring home to us this evident truth, and this Mr. Monteux has done. No one can say that under him German music has been neglected. On the other hand, he has shown true catholicity in his readiness to give to us not only the best of all nations, but the best that we ourselves have produced. This has been done quietly and with self-effacement.

Therefore the community, which contains many who are not musical and to whom Symphony Hall is terra incognita, owes this man a debt because in the battlefield in which he was placed he has fought for its cause. It is this larger aspect of what he has done for Boston, as a whole, that we may well remember he departs.

GEO. R. NUTTER.

Boston, May 1.

Her May 4

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

Tomorrow night the Pop concerts at Symphony hall will begin. The pending season will be the 39th and will, as usual, provide a program of full musical fare every night in the week (and on alternate Sundays). Mr. Jacchia will take the leadership for his eighth successive season as the most popular of Pops conductors. The orchestra will number more than 80 symphony players. The usual accompaniment of refreshments will be served at the tables and in the Pops "bar" and "cafe." The programs of the week are as follows:

MONDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoozy".....Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
.....Mozart
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah,"
.....Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazounov
Burlesca.....Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde,"
.....Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Wildflower".....Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria (Solo violin, harp, organ, strings).....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

TUESDAY

March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Strube
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre,"
.....Litolff
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Simmons songs
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony
.....Dvorak
Volga Bargemen's song...Arr. by Jacchia
Rustic dance, "Snow Maiden,"
.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Stepping Stones".....Kern
Invitation to the dance.....Weber-Berlioz
American Patrol.....Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"
.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Raymond".....Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube
.....Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Ballet from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Largo.....Handel
Adagio from the Sonata Pathetique,
.....Beethoven-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia
American Fantasy.....Herbert

THURSDAY

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Songs by Wellesley Glee Club
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Wellesley Fantasy.....Macdougall
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Second Regiment Connecticut.....Reeves

FRIDAY

March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Old Slave Song (saxophone solo, A. Laus)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Watz in A minor.....Grieg-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris".....Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"...Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba
.....Gounod

SATURDAY

Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Macushla.....MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Pirouette (flute solo, Pasquale Amerena)
.....Glazounov
Intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana
.....Mascagni
Finale, Fourth Symphony....Tchaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet.....Lnigini
Waltz, "Roses from the South"...Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance.....Brahms

SUNDAY

RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Entrance of Antony, "A Night in Egypt"
.....Arensky
Dance of the Birds "Snegourotchka"
.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Eight Russian Popular Melodies..Liadov
Kammenoi Ostrow.....Rubenstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".Tchaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody.....Glazounov
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia

WILL BROADCAST POPS OPENING

WBZ to Put Noted Musical Event on Air Tonight

Tonight's broadcast from WBZ will enable listeners throughout the country to hear what up to this time has been reserved for the select few, that is, the Pop concert to be given under the direction of Agide Jacchia to be broadcast, commencing at 8:15 P. M. The Pops is without question one of the most popular concert features of Boston and the opening night represents one of the biggest nights of the Boston music season.

In 1885 this project of a supplementary series of concerts to the regular season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was instigated. Thirty-seven seasons have passed, during which time the "Pops" have become so popular they now represent as much a part of Boston as the world-famed Boston Symphony itself.

The very fact that these concerts are under the direction of Agide Jacchia and that it is made up of 80 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will leave no doubt in the mind of any one as to the excellency of the concerts. Conductor Agide Jacchia has toured from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America conducting operatic and symphonic scores. During the season of 1914-15 he was principal conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music.

Director of Boston Symphony Pops

AGIDE JACCHIA

---

pérambulator, all three of us together?" Yet somehow the conductor seemed a little to blush for it.

Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux altogether succeeded with Mr. Carpenter's music of sentiment and vision. The string choir, for the little waves, shimmered and rippled above the softly glowing horns, singing the loveliness of "My Lake." For there are spring days and summer days when Lake Michigan is blue and silver like the music, and like it ruffling in the breeze. As imagining and imparting was Mr. Monteux when Mr. Carpenter stills his measures into haze of memory, when all that they have recounted blurs across the dreaming little mind; fuses into a vague and dear content—pages of vapors drifting and in charm as "The Lake" has been pages of beauty and in motion. As well Mr. Monteux caught the manifold fancy that devises, conducts and colors Mr. Carpenter "characterizing motives"; the composer's endless seeking and final finding of the felicitous modulations, the harmonies, the timbres that are the imagining fertilised and vivified in tones. Little music from American pens so savors the voices of the orchestra, so uses them in such adroit play and tint and transparency; so weaves an American substance and spirit into a universal speech. Writing last winter in the programme-book of the Philharmonic Society in New York, Mr. Gilman noted "Mr. Carpenter's famous Suite." The adjective s well chosen.

With the Beethoven and the Debussy, in hese latter days, of Mr. Monteux and his rchestra, there has been no quarrelling. he conductor's version of the Fifth Symhony may not quite gain the songful fluity, the rhythmic pulse, the climacteric ount and march of his version of the eventh; yet it abounds in his mastery of eethoven's upspringing and outspreading elodies; reiterated and pounding chords; umults released; figures awhirr with mystery and anticipation; song deepened; exultation scaling and spanning the skies. With power, with beauty, with suspense, with elation, Mr. Monteux in order proclaimed the Symphony. A classic masterpiece lived again, not encased and a-cold, but in the heat and the passion with which Beethoven, "rumbling and roaring to himself," put it romantically to paper.

There are classics also written in our day and as justly such by intrinsic and vital quality as though a hundred years, instead of thirty, had affirmed them upon the universal ear and mind. Debussy wrote his Prelude of The Faun in the first years of his slowly ripened prime. It is dated 1894—before wives and luxury and fame and self-content had sapped him. Not even in "Pelléas and Mélisande" and in a few of his songs and piano-pieces are the sensibilities of his mind and hand more susceptible and keen-edged. Nowhere are his imagination and his handiwork more richly fertile. Nowhere are the vision and the revelation, the design and the progress, the substance and the atmosphere, the spirit and the voice, more completely one, indivisible and self-contained. In his thirty-second year when he was still of himself and by himself, Debussy had achieved a music of a perfect unity and a perfect beauty; a music, besides, in content and utterance akin to no other. With reason, it stirs a conductor and an orchestra, as it did Mr. Monteux and his men, to a like beauty of voice, a like unity and mobility and felicity of all the arts of expression; while hearers drink of it, their eyes and hearts swimming in the glamour and the ecstasy. There are still Castalian springs in the music of this our very day, and through "The Faun" therein does Debussy bathe.

The Overture to "Tannhauser" brought ending. Yet listening, the hearer may have heeded less than usual the musical quality, the scenic and the spiritual suggestion, of ures that countless repetitions may not wear threadbare and hackneyed. Ra the pilgrims were passing, singing. T had begun their course in doubt and t vail. They were finishing it in fruiti and glory. With the Boston Symphon Orchestra so also has journeyed Pierr Monteux.

H. T. P.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10.0

11.2

12.5

14.0

16.0

18.0

20.0

22.4

25.0

28.0

32.0

36.0

40.0

45.0

50.0

56.0

63.0

71.0

80.0

90.0

100.0

112.0

125.0

140.0

160.0

180.0

200.0

224.0

250.0

280.0

320.0

360.0

400.0

450.0

500.0

560.0

630.0

710.0

800.0

900.0

1000.0

1120.0

1250.0

1400.0

1600.0

1800.0

2000.0

2240.0

2500.0

2800.0

3200.0

3600.0

4000.0

4500.0

5000.0

5600.0

6300.0

7100.0

8000.0

9000.0

10000.0

11200.0

12500.0

14000.0

16000.0

18000.0

20000.0

22400.0

25000.0

28000.0

32000.0

36000.0

40000.0

45000.0

50000.0

56000.0

63000.0

71000.0

80000.0

90000.0

100000.0

112000.0

125000.0

140000.0

160000.0

180000.0

200000.0

224000.0

250000.0

280000.0

320000.0

360000.0

400000.0

450000.0

500000.0

560000.0

630000.0

710000.0

800000.0

900000.0

1000000.0

1120000.0

1250000.0

1400000.0

1600000.0

1800000.0

2000000.0

2240000.0

2500000.0

2800000.0

3200000.0

3600000.0

4000000.0

4500000.0

5000000.0

5600000.0

6300000.0

7100000.0

8000000.0

9000000.0

10000000.0

11200000.0

12500000.0

14000000.0

16000000.0

18000000.0

20000000.0

22400000.0

25000000.0

28000000.0

32000000.0

36000000.0

40000000.0

45000000.0

50000000.0

56000000.0

63000000.0

71000000.0

80000000.0

90000000.0

100000000.0

112000000.0

125000000.0

140000000.0

160000000.0

180000000.0

200000000.0

224000000.0

250000000.0

280000000.0

320000000.0

360000000.0

400000000.0

450000000.0

500000000.0

560000000.0

630000000.0

710000000.0

800000000.0

900000000.0

1000000000.0

1120000000.0

1250000000.0

1400000000.0

1600000000.0

1800000000.0

2000000000.0

2240000000.0

2500000000.0

2800000000.0

3200000000.0

3600000000.0

4000000000.0

4500000000.0

5000000000.0

5600000000.0

6300000000.0

7100000000.0

8000000000.0

9000000000.0

10000000000.0

11200000000.0

12500000000.0

14000000000.0

16000000000.0

18000000000.0

20000000000.0

22400000000.0

25000000000.0

28000000000.0

32000000000.0

36000000000.0

40000000000.0

45000000000.0

50000000000.0

56000000000.0

63000000000.0

71000000000.0

80000000000.0

90000000000.0

100000000000.0

112000000000.0

125000000000.0

140000000000.0

160000000000.0

180000000000.0

200000000000.0

224000000000.0

250000000000.0

280000000000.0

320000000000.0

360000000000.0

400000000000.0

450000000000.0

500000000000.0

560000000000.0

630000000000.0

710000000000.0

800000000000.0

900000000000.0

1000000000000.0

1120000000000.0

1250000000000.0

1400000000000.0

1600000000000.0

1800000000000.0

2000000000000.0

2240000000000.0

2500000000000.0

2800000000000.0

3200000000000.0

3600000000000.0

4000000000000.0

4500000000000.0

5000000000000.0

5600000000000.0

6300000000000.0

7100000000000.0

8000000000000.0

9000000000000.0

10000000000000.0

11200000000000.0

12500000000000.0

14000000000000.0

16000000000000.0

18000000000000.0

20000000000000.0

22400000000000.0

25000000000000.0

28000000000000.0

32000000000000.0

36000000000000.0

40000000000000.0

45000000000000.0

50000000000000.0

56000000000000.0

63000000000000.0

71000000000000.0

80000000000000.0

90000000000000.0

100000000000000.0

112000000000000.0

125000000000000.0

140000000000000.0

160000000000000.0

180000000000000.0

200000000000000.0

224000000000000.0

250000000000000.0

280000000000000.0

320000000000000.0

360000000000000.0

400000000000000.0

450000000000000.0

500000000000000.0

560000000000000.0

630000000000000.0

710000000000000.0

800000000000000.0

900000000000000.0

1000000000000000.0

1120000000000000.0

1250000000000000.0

1400000000000000.0

1600000000000000.0

1800000000000000.0

2000000000000000.0

2240000000000000.0

2500000000000000.0

2800000000000000.0

3200000000000000.0

3600000000000000.0

4000000000000000.0

4500000000000000.0

5000000000000000.0

5600000000000000.0

6300000000000000.0

7100000000000000.0

8000000000000000.0

9000000000000000.0

10000000000000000.0

11200000000000000.0

12500000000000000.0

14000000000000000.0

16000000000000000.0

18000000000000000.0

20000000000000000.0

22400000000000000.0

25000000000000000.0

28000000000000000.0

32000000000000000.0

36000000000000000.0

40000000000000000.0

45000000000000000.0

50000000000000000.0

56000000000000000.0

63000000000000000.0

71000000000000000.0

80000000000000000.0

90000000000000000.0

100000000000000000.0

112000000000000000.0

125000000000000000.0

140000000000000000.0

160000000000000000.0

180000000000000000.0

200000000000000000.0

224000000000000000.0

250000000000000000.0

280000000000000000.0

320000000000000000.0

360000000000000000.0

400000000000000000.0

450000000000000000.0

500000000000000000.0

560000000000000000.0

630000000000000000.0

710000000000000000.0

800000000000000000.0

900000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000.0 45000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000.0 1250000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000.0 20000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

80000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

90000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

112000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

125000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

140000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

160000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

180000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

224000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

280000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

320000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

360000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

450000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

560000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

630000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

710000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

900000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1120000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1250000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

1800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2240000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

2800000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

3600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

4500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

5600000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

6300000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

7100000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

8000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

9000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

10000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

11200000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

12500000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

14000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

16000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

18000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

20000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

22400000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

25000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

28000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

32000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

36000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

40000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

45000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

50000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

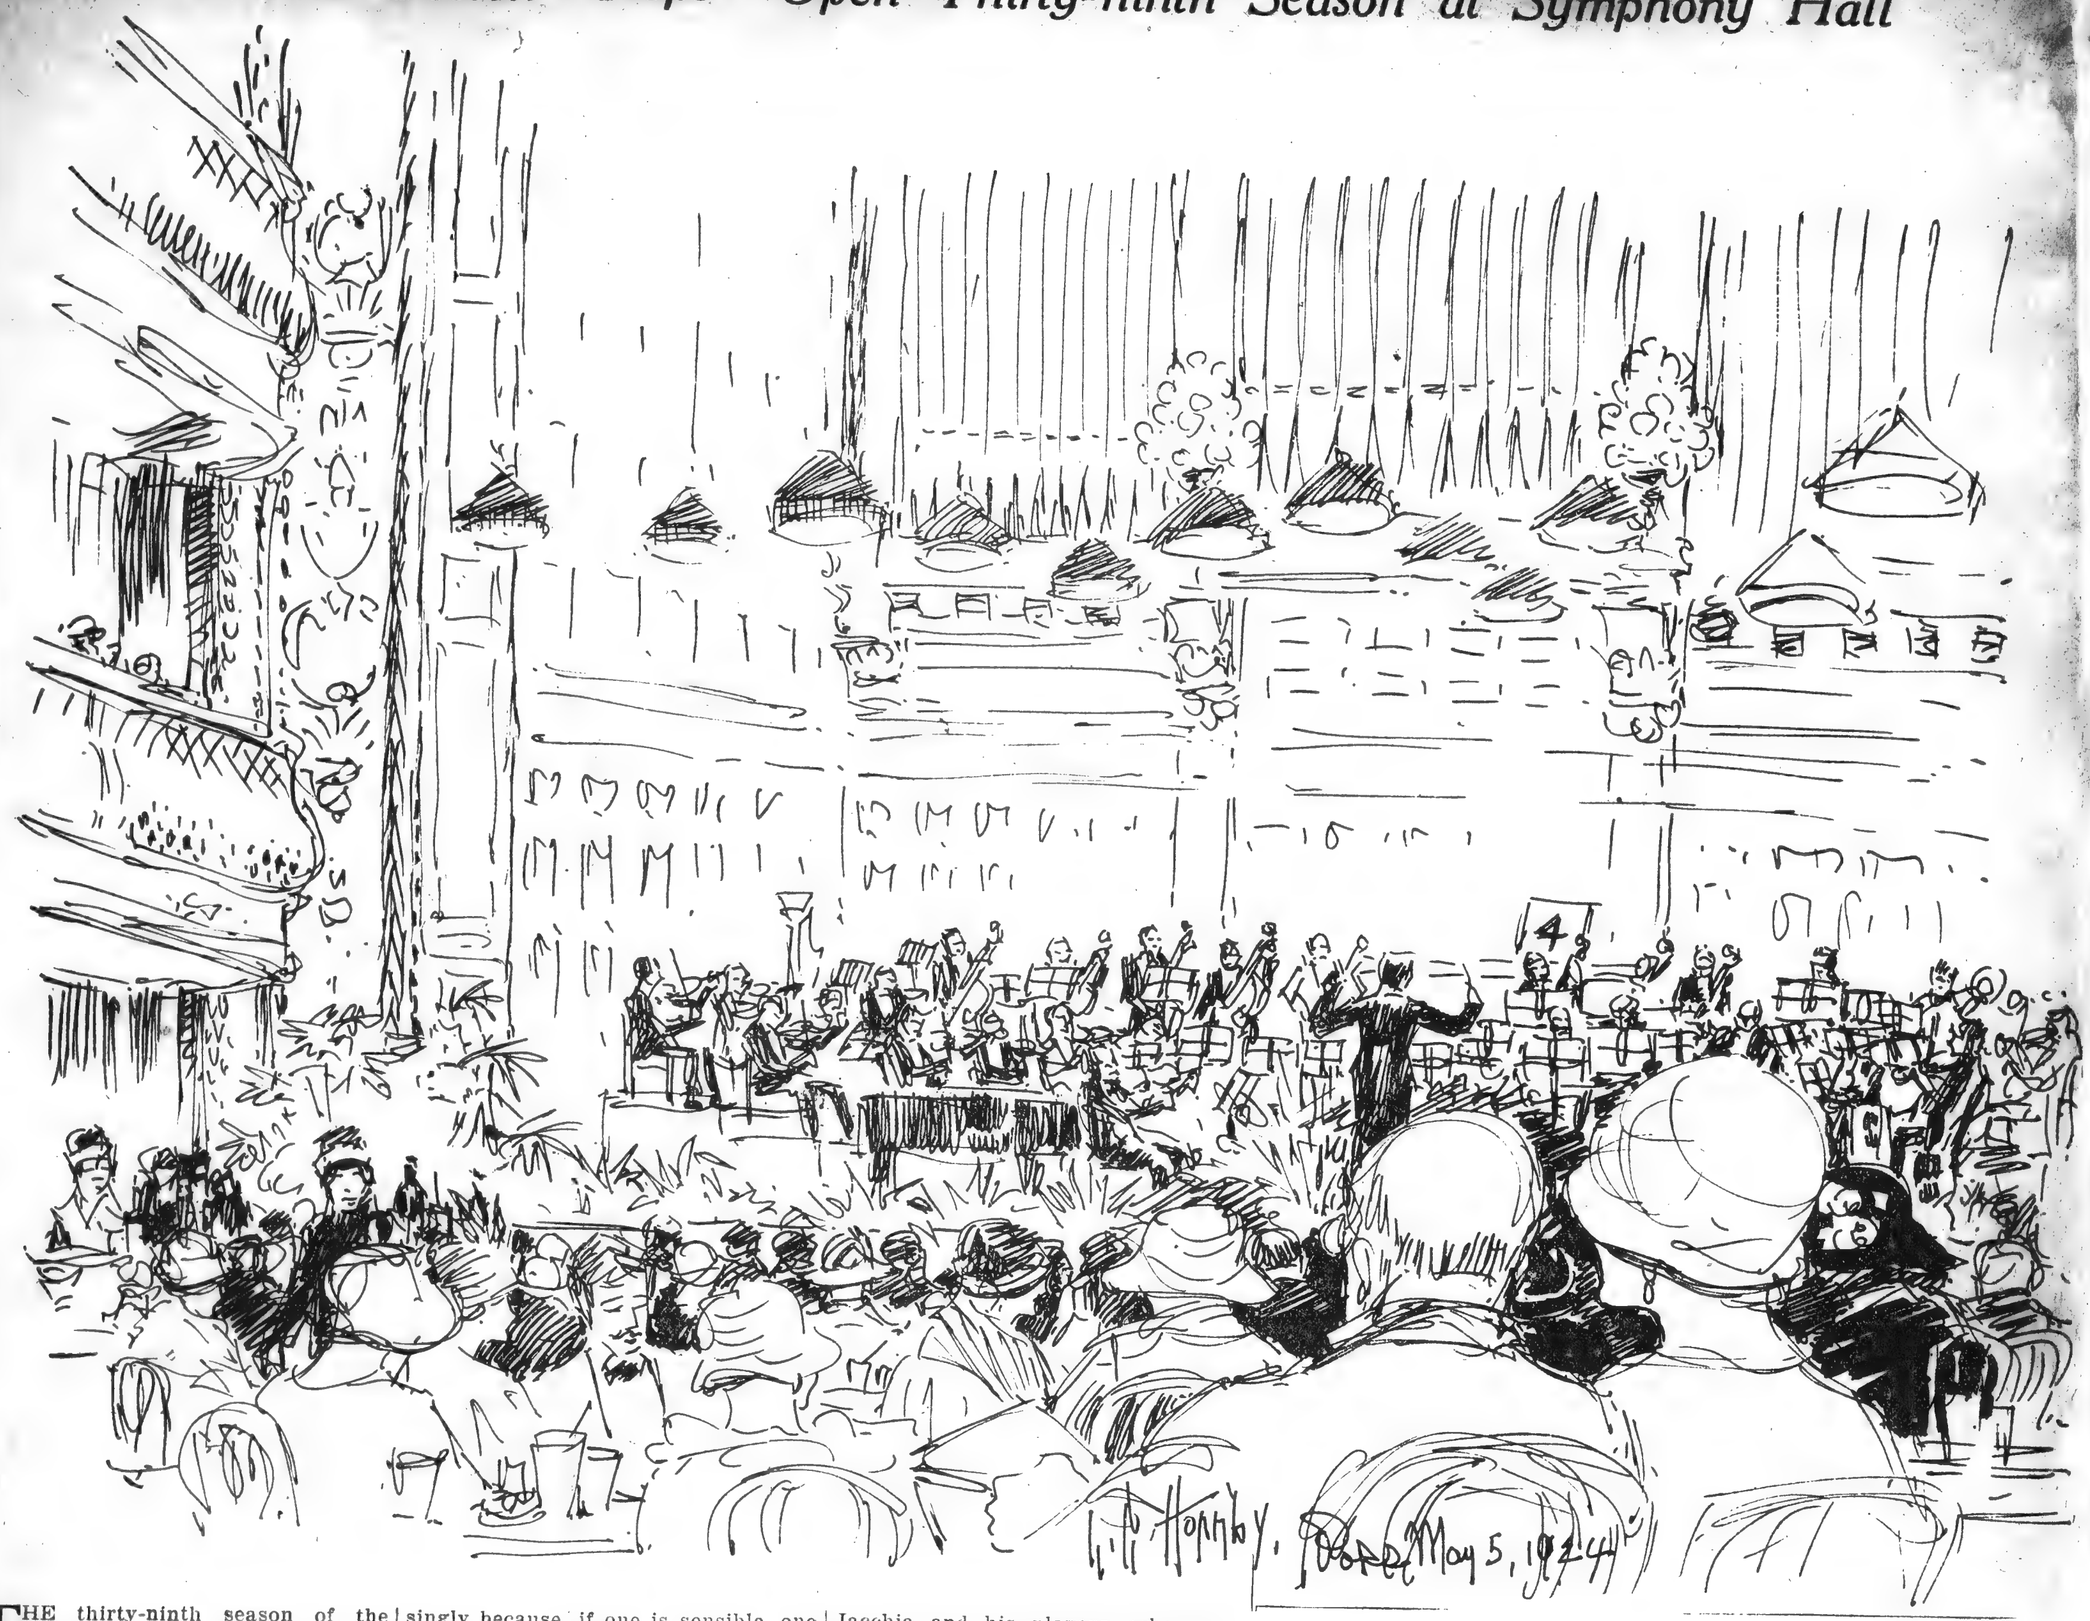
56000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

63000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000.0

71000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000000

MISSING
PAGE(S)

The Boston "Pops" Open Thirty-ninth Season at Symphony Hall



THE thirty-ninth season of the "Pops" opened last evening at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia reappeared to conduct his admirable orchestra along a familiar pathway, now lightly brilliant, again pastel toned. The music selected for the first program of the season was thoroughly conventional and untaxing, at once suitable and pleasing to the moderate demands of a leisurely and relaxed audience.

There is rarely any new thing to be said about the blithe, pleasant things of life. The tranquillity of Symphony Hall "in the season" is the hostage paid to the casual friendliness of the "Pops." As Paul Rosenfeld has pointed out as true of the Museum concerts in New York, people at the "Pops" are permitted to comport themselves more as they will. They may sit or stand or even walk about a little. They may, at the "Pops," even occupy themselves idly with amusing food and murmurous conversation, permitting the music to become for them a gentle, laving stuff of release, perfumed and gratifying. The important thing is that they may enjoy themselves, banishing undue concern for the austerities that clothe that cool, mannered chamber in the months of the subscription concerts. No one is ever embarrassed at being seen at the "Pops," flippant as the name by which they are called may be. Not even the stern men of commerce who, happening to be in town for a night, stroll in, by twos and threes or even singly because, if one is sensible, one likes a bit of good music now and then.

Last evening's program was palpably planned to capture a unanimous, undifficult approval. There were passages of a fiery, tzigane brilliancy as well as dim vistas of a gentle and lovely peace. Youth could find the chittering purr of the tambourine to charm in the Oriental Rhapsody, with the thin wail of intricate laments, the fine clash of cymbals, and the throbbing rhythms of drums. How could a more popular taste have been served than with the Introduction to "Lohengrin's" third act, limned with proportion and form by a shrewd conductor? Or yet again in the delicate plaint of the Jacchia arrangement of "Macushla," modest selection for an early encore?

The hall was quite filled. There were persons standing. Few left before the conclusion of the program. Thus, with appreciation quick and fresh, was warm, bright welcome afforded Mr. Jacchia and his players, who come again to transform the gathering aridities of the summer into pleasant plains of musical plenty.

HARRISBURG
PA.
NEWS

Max Fiedler, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, now directs the Essen Orchestra. That orchestra recently observed its twenty-fifth birthday with a festival concert at which works of Bach, Brahms, Beethoven and Bruckner were performed.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
UNION

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

58

DULUTH
MINN.
HERALD

MAY 3

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

N. J.
UNION

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

Pierre Monteux Accorded Great Reception At Boston Symphony's Last Concert

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records The Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhauser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravos"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4,000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after five years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

During the past season these compositions were performed for the first time anywhere: Converse, "Song of the Sea"; Leginska, two short pieces; Mason, Bergeric. And the works performed for the first time in America were: Bliss, a color symphony; Bowen, concerto, C. minor, for viola, (Lionel Tertis), and orchestra; Bridge, suite, "The Sea"; De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for pianoforte and orchestra. (Henrich Gebbard, pianst.)

LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE

39TH SEASON OF SYMPHONY POPS

One of Boston's oldest institutions and yet one of her liveliest and youngest are the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. They have been going for thirty-nine years, almost as long as the Boston Symphony Concerts from which they sprang. But there is nothing old-fashioned about the Pops. Conductor Agide Jacchia, now in his eighth season, is as quick to incorporate the most melodious hitof 1924 as he isquick to abandon the outmoded hit of 1923. The Pops repertory is of the widest, extending from a rhapsody or symphony movement to a waltz or sugary trifle. Through these extremes and the intermediate graduations, the fine standard of performance by the orchestra of eighty symphony players under their highly talented conductor, is constant.

Mr. Jacchia, the most praised and applauded of all Pops conductors has in each of his seasons inspired a new record in attendance. It seems likely that the thirty-ninth season will be the most successful the Pops have ever had. Refreshments are served at the tables which cover the floor at Symphony Hall and in the Pops Band Cafe. Mr. Jacchia's programme for Memorial Day (May 30th) is typical of the musical delights which the Pops provide:

1. March, "Lorraine" .....Ganne
2. Prelune and Siciliana, "Cavalier Rusticana" .....Mascagni
   Solo horn, William Valkenier
3. Viennesse Waltz .....Alden
4. Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"...Verdi
5. Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" akov rican bert dley ysky sini inod ham

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
TIMES

UNION MUSICIANS TO ASK $10 A WEEK MORE FOR ROAD WORK

Executive Board To Meet Next Month When New Wage Schedules Will Be Drawn—Increases for Other Classifications Slated

New York, May 26.—With the settlement of the Actors' Equity Association demands still hanging fire, the Producing Managers' Association is scheduled to have another union matter on its hands within the next few weeks. The Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, under present arrangements, is to meet in New York in June for a conference on the musicians' new wage scale drawn up at the national convention in Colorado Springs, Col. The new scale, which is to go into effect August 1, calls for an average increase of $10 a week for musicians traveling with road companies.

The changes in the prices for traveling theatrical engagements agreed

(Continued on page 131)

(Continued from page

upon at the convention are as follows:
When playing week stands the salary, per man, is to be raised from $75 to $ a week.
When playing broken weeks, i. e. when a company shows in more than one town in a given week, the salary, per man, for nine performances or less is to be raised from $80 to $90.
(The above prices pertain to comic operas, musical comedies, extravaganzas, spectacular shows and all similar attractions.)

If any of the above engagements end with the fraction of a week and one performance is played the price is to be raised, per day, from $9 to $11.

Musicians traveling with vaudeville companies, twelve performances or less, are to be raised from $75 to $85 per week.

If a vaudeville engagement ends with a fraction of a week and one performance is played the rate is to be $10 a day instead of $8.

Musicians traveling with vaudeville acts, twelve performances or less, are to be raised from $63 to $73 per week. The same applies to those with burlesque companies.

Men with tabloid companies stay at $55.

With members of orchestras traveling with picture shows without vaudeville acts, if rest periods of ten minutes each during the hour are not allowed, the new price per week for twelve performances or less is to be $87, an increase of $10 over the prevailing rate.

Leaders To Be Raised

The leaders for the first class of traveling orchestras are to come in for a raise from $85 to $100, while the vaudeville act conductors are to go from $70 to $80.

If dramatic companies (repertoire and otherwise) play in houses where the price of the choicest seats (exclusive of box seats) is less than $1.50, the traveling leader is listed for a raise from $58 to $65, while the conductor of an orchestra with a strictly picture show goes from $90 to $100.

Orchestras such as symphony orchestras, engaged for musical festivals, chautauquas or lyceum tours of more than two concerts per day, are to get $100 per man. The price for rehearsals and overtime before and after the season opens are to be proportionately raised.

A resolution introduced by J. S. Tooher, of Local 69, Pueblo, Col., asking the national executive board to consider the advisability of urging the local unions to consider the adoption of a six-day week was favorably passed upon by the convention. Another resolution introduced by the Chicago delegates asking that traveling members, appearing on the stage, be not permitted to work with musicians playing the score of the production, was given the okeh of the convention.

Other resolutions passed included a condemnation of the Ku-Klux Klan and other such organizations, a declaration that the national officers try to bring the Boston Symphony, at present on the unfair list, into the fold, and an amendment to the joint agreement with the stage-hands' union whereby it is stated that nothing in the agreement "shall ever be construed as giving either party the right to call for assistance from the other for the purpose of forcing a minimum number of men except in cases where local agreement exists."

The request of the Musical Mutual Protection Union for reconciliation negotiations was referred to the national executive board for action. It is most probable that the board will confer with the outlawed union's committee of reconciliation when the board meets here with the producing managers in June.

President Joseph Weber's salary was raised by the convention from $10,000 to $12,000 a year. Secretary William J. Kerngood's salary was increased from $4,500 to $7,500. Treasurer H. E. Brenton's from $4,000 to $5,200, and Weber's first assistant's from $3,900 to $5,200. The members of the executive board will each get $600 a year for their services instead of $250, the prevailing salary.

ined 1,191 Classified Ads, Totaling 6,888 Lines
dition of This Issue of

FROM

REVIEW

New York City

ALBERT SPALDING WINS PARIS SUCCESS WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

Plays Respighi Concerto Under New Boston Orchestra Conductor

Albert Spalding made one of the greatest successes of his career when he played for the first time in Paris the new Respighi Concerto for the violin with the Paris Orchestra, under Sergei Koussevitzky at the Paris Opera, receiving a tremendous ovation after giving a marvelously beautiful performance, according to a cable received by the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau.

Mr. Spalding, who has been on a concert tour of Europe since April 1, opened his present tour at Amsterdam as soloist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra, under the baton of Karl Muck, reaching the climax of his tour with the introduction of the Respighi concert to the Parisian concertgoers.

Negotiations are now under way to have Mr. Spalding play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

NASHVILLE,
TENN.
BANNER

Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who during the last five years has been extremely successful with the Boston Symphony, conducted his last concert on May 3, and after the "Tannhauser" overture, received an ovation and was given a large loving cup from the members of the orchestra. His successor will be Sergei Koussevitzky, a Russian, who is at present in Paris giving some very unusual orchestral concerts.

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records the Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number the "Tannhauser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and gain. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4,000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after fice years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Albert Spalding gave the first performance in Paris of Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra at the Paris Opéra with the Paris orchestra under Sergei Koussevitsky. It is probable that Mr. Spalding will play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Luella Mellins Scores in "Rigoletto" in Pari

By C. F. BERTELLI,
Universal Service Staff Correspondent

PARIS, June 4.

FOR the first time in thirty-five years an American coloratura soprano sang in "Rigoletto" at the opera to-night. She is Luella Mellius, and she received an ovation from the ultra smart audience which welcomed the first American woman on the stage at the opera since Edith Mason, five years ago.

Opera circles here are buzzing with the quarrel between Chaliapin and Koussevitzky, who will soon be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky threw down his baton last night at the opera and refused to conduct because Chaliapin was singing. De Posse, formerly of the Chicago Opera, took Koussevitzky's place.

It is announced here that Mary Lewis, formerly of Ziegfeld Follies, will make her debut as prima donna of the British Opera company in London June 14.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

Father of Pierre Monteux

Word has come from France of the death of Gustave Monteux, the father of Pierre Monteux, recently conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was eighty-nine years old. He died on May 30, after a short illness and within two weeks of his son's return to France from the United States at the completion of his term as conductor.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

Gustave Monteux

Word has been received of the death of Gustave Monteux, father of Pierre Monteux, recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was 89 years old. He died on May 30 after a short illness and within two weeks of his son's return to France from Boston at the completion of his term as conductor.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

58

DULUTH MINN.
HERALD

MAY 3

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

N. J.
UNION

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

Pierre Monteux Accorded Great Reception At Boston Symphony's Last Concert

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records The Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number (the "Tannhauser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and again. There were even cheers and "Bravos"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In afternoon there was a re- ...nteux at Sym- ...memorial pho...The ...Industry Band of 25 pieces wi...ll give a concert as one of the fea- to ...res of the conference. The band les...l play in the pavilion for the en- ex...tainment of patients and visitors. tr...ansportation from the end of the tirline to the sanitorium will be ...rovided on that afternoon.

...mpositions w... ...st time anywhere:

LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE

39TH SEASON OF SYMPHONY POPS

One of Boston's oldest institutions and yet one of her liveliest and youngest are the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. They have been going for thirty-nine years, almost as long as the Boston Symphony Concerts from which they sprang. But there is nothing old-fashioned about the Pops. Conductor Agide Jacchia, now in his eighth season, is as quick to incorporate the most melodious hitof 1924 as he isquick to abandon the outmoded hit of 1923. The Pops repertory is of the widest, extending from a rhapsody or symphony movement to a waltz or sugary trifle. Through these extremes and the intermediate graduations, the fine standard of performance by the orchestra of eighty symphony players under their highly talented conductor, is constant.

Mr. Jacchia, the most praised and applauded of all Pops conductors has in each of his seasons inspired a new record in attendance. It seems likely that the thirty-ninth season will be the most successful the Pops have ever had. Refreshments are served at the tables which cover the floor at Symphony Hall and in the Pops Band Cafe. Mr. Jacchia's programme for Memorial Day (May 30th) is typical of the musical delights which the Pops provide:

1. March, "Lorraine" .....Ganne
2. Prelune and Siciliana, "Cavalier Rusticana" .....Mascagni
   Solo horn, William Valkenier
3. Viennesse Waltz .....Alden
4. Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"...Verdi
5. Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakov
6. Indian Summer, an American Idyll .....Herbert
7. Spanish Dance, "Cachuca" Hadley
8. Finale, Fourth Symphony Tchaikowsky
9. Overture to "William Tell" Rossini
10. Ave Maria .....Bach-Gounod
11. March of the Doughboys Dunham

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
TIMES

UNION MUSICIANS TO ASK $10 A WEEK MORE FOR ROAD WORK

Executive Board To Meet Next Month When New Wage Schedules Will Be Drawn—Increases for Other Classifications Slated

New York, May 26.—With the settlement of the Actors' Equity Association demands still hanging fire, the Producing Managers' Association is scheduled to have another union matter on its hands within the next few weeks. The Executive Board of the American Federation of Musicians, under present arrangements, is to meet in New York in June for a conference on the musicians' new wage scale drawn up at the national convention in Colorado Springs, Col. The new scale, which is to go into effect August 1, calls for an average increase of $10 a week for musicians traveling with road companies.

The changes in the prices for traveling theatrical engagements agreed

(Continued on page 131)

(Continued from page ...

upon at the convention are as follows:
When playing week stands the salary, per man, is to be raised from $75 to $...lary, per week.
When playing broken weeks, i. e. when a company shows in more than one town in a given week, the salary, per man, if nine performances or less is to be raised from $80 to $90.
(The above prices pertain to comic operas, musical comedies, extravaganzas, spectacular shows and all similar attractions.)

If any of the above engagements end with the fraction of a week and one performance is played the price is to be raised, per day, from $9 to $11.

Musicians traveling with vaudeville companies, twelve performances or less, are to be raised from $75 to $85 per week.

If a vaudeville engagement ends with a fraction of a week and one performance is played the rate is to be $10 a day instead of $8.

Musicians traveling with vaudeville acts, twelve performances or less, are to be raised from $65 to $75 per week. The same applies to those with burlesque companies.

Men with tabloid companies stay at $55.

With members of orchestras traveling with picture shows without vaudeville acts, if rest periods of ten minutes each during the hour are not allowed, the new price per week for twelve performances or less is to be $87, an increase of $10 over the prevailing rate.

Leaders To Be Raised

The leaders for the first class of traveling orchestras are to come in for a raise from $85 to $100, while the vaudeville act conductors are to go from $70 to $80.

If dramatic companies (repertoire and otherwise) play in houses where the price of the choicest seats (exclusive of box seats) is less than $1.50, the traveling leader is listed for a raise from $58 to $65, while the conductor of an orchestra with a strictly picture show goes from $90 to $100.

Orchestras such as symphony orchestras, engaged for musical festivals, chautauquas or lyceum tours of more than two concerts per day, are to get $100 per man. The price for rehearsals and overtime before and after the season opens are to be proportionately raised.

A resolution introduced by J. S. Tooher, of Local 69, Pueblo, Col., asking the national executive board to consider the advisability of urging the local unions to consider the adoption of a six-day week was favorably passed upon by the convention. Another resolution introduced by the Chicago delegates asking that traveling members, appearing on the stage, be not permitted to work with musicians playing the score of the production, was given the okeh of the convention.

Other resolutions passed included a condemnation of the Ku-Klux Klan and other such organizations, a declaration that the national officers try to bring the Boston Symphony, at present on the unfair list, into the fold, and an amendment to the joint agreement with the stage-hands' union whereby it is stated that nothing in the agreement "shall ever be construed as giving either party the right to call for assistance from the other for the purpose of forcing a minimum number of men except in cases where local agreement exists."

The request of the Musical Mutual Protection Union for reconciliation negotiations was referred to the national executive board for action. It is most probable that the board will confer with the outlawed union's committee of reconciliation when the board meets here with the producing managers in June.

President Joseph Weber's salary was raised by the convention from $10,000 to $12,000 a year. Secretary William J. Kerngood's salary was increased from $4,500 to $7,500, Treasurer H. E. Brenton's from $4,000 to $5,200, and Weber's first assistant's from $3,900 to $5,200. The members of the executive board will each get $600 a year for their services instead of $250, the prevailing salary.

...ined 1,191 Classified Ads, Totaling 6,888 Line...
...dition of This Issue of ...

FROM

REVIEW

New York City

ALBERT SPALDING WINS PARIS SUCCESS WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

Plays Respighi Concerto Under New Boston Orchestra Conductor

Albert Spalding made one of the greatest successes of his career when he played for the first time in Paris the new Respighi Concerto for the violin with the Paris Orchestra, under Sergei Koussevitzky at the Paris Opera, receiving a tremendous ovation after giving a marvelously beautiful performance, according to a cable received by the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau.

Mr. Spalding, who has been on a concert tour of Europe since April ..., opened his present tour at Amsterdam as soloist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra, under the baton of Karl Tuck, reaching the climax of his tour with the introduction of the Respighi concert to the Parisian concertgoers.

Negotiations are now under way to have Mr. Spalding play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

ADIGE JACCHIA, for eight years leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just opened 39th season of world famous musical organization.
(Int'l Newsreel)

NASHVILLE,
TENN.
BANNER

Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who during the last five years has been extremely successful with the Boston Symphony, conducted his last concert on May 3, and after the "Tannhauser" overture, received an ovation and was given a large loving cup from the members of the orchestra. His successor will be Sergei Koussevitzky, a Russian, who is at present in Paris giving some very unusual orchestral concerts.

Pierre Monteux made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday evening, May 3.

The farewell tribute accorded him by the audience and the orchestra was perhaps the most enthusiastic ever witnessed at a Boston Symphony concert, records the Christian Science Monitor. Audience and players rose at the conductor's entrance and applauded him for some minutes. At the conclusion of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony there was again prolonged applause, which was intensified when Mr. Holy, the first harpist, appeared with a large loving cup. This, as the gift of the members of the orchestra, was presented to Mr. Monteux with a brief speech by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

After the final number the "Tannhauser" overture), the listeners again rose to their feet and recalled the conductor again and gain. There were even cheers and "Bravas"—an extraordinary manifestation at a symphony concert in Boston.

In the afternoon there was a reception to Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall, at which a memorial with 4,000 signatures was presented to the conductor. Mr. Monteux thus leaves Boston after fice years of extraordinary achievement with testimonials of affection and admiration such as have perhaps been won by none of his distinguished predecessors.

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

Albert Spalding gave the first performance in Paris of Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra at the Paris Opéra with the Paris orchestra under Sergei Koussevitsky. It is probable that Mr. Spalding will play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Luella Mellins Scores in "Rigoletto" in Pari...

By C. F. BERTELLI,
Universal Service Staff Correspondent

PARIS, June 4.

FOR the first time in thirty-five years an American coloratura soprano sang in "Rigoletto" at the opera to-night. She is Luella Mellius, and she received an ovation from the ultra smart audience which welcomed the first American woman on the stage at the opera since Edith Mason, five years ago.

Opera circles here are buzzing with the quarrel between Chaliapin and Koussevitzky, who will soon be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky threw down his baton last night at the opera and refused to conduct because Chaliapin was singing. De Posse, formerly of the Chicago Opera, took Koussevitzky's place.

It is announced here that Mary Lewis, formerly of Ziegfeld Follies, will make her debut as prima donna of the British Opera company in London June 14.

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUN 10

Father of Pierre Monteux

Word has come from France of the death of Gustave Monteux, the father of Pierre Monteux, recently conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was eighty-nine years old. He died on May 30, after a short illness and within two weeks of his son's return to France from the United States at the completion of his term as conductor.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

JUN 15

Gustave Monteux

Word has been received of the death of Gustave Monteux, father of Pierre Monteux, recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was 89 years old. He died on May 30 after a short illness and within two weeks of his son's return to France from Boston at the completion of his term as conductor.

ST. LOUIS
MISSOURI
POST DISPATCH

JUN 8 1924

Paris Just Now Rules World Of Music

PARIS, June 3.

DESPITE the presidential crisis, the Cabinet crisis and the financial crisis provoked by the rapidly falling franc, Paris finds time to think of art and music, particularly the latter. Temporarily, during the Olympic period, she is the music center of the world, a position normally occupied by Vienna or New York.

Besides her own Opera Comique, Paris is supporting the Vienna opera company, a dozen big concert orchestras, including those of Damrosch and Koussevitzky, and several world-famous singers. Chaliapin is opening a series of four performances at the National Academy of Music, and all Paris is coming to hear him. Prices have been raised 400 per cent for the occasion. The cheapest seat in the house costs 30 francs (at present exchange $1.56), yet tickets are selling like hot cakes.

"How does Paris opera compare with American opera?" the correspondent asked the famous Russian baritone.

"That is difficult to say," replied Chaliapin, "because one has been at the business 500 and the other only 50 years. But this I can say. Music and opera have made enormous strides in the United States in the last 15 years. Within 50 years I predict that America will amaze the world in things esthetic.

"In time opera will come to receive Government aid in the United States as it does in Europe. Opera must be discussed on the floor of Congress. Then it will develop into a typical American institution, outshining anything we can do in Europe."

Chaliapin is guaranteed 60,000 francs ($3120) a night here, in addition to 50 per cent of the gate receipts, which, if the house is full, will amount to fully 110,000 francs. There has been much speculation as to who would conduct the orchestra, Koussevitzky, the famous Pole, "backing out" at the last moment on the pretext of a wounded hand, has been credited by scandal mongers with a disinclination to co-operate with a social hermit like Chaliapin.

The Russian singer is said to be rather at odds with Paris society.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUN 10 1924

MONTEUX'S FATHER DEAD

Word was received in Boston yesterday of the death in France on May 30 of the father of Pierre Monteux, recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was 89 years old.

HARRISBURG
PA.
NEWS

10

It seems quite certain that Stravinsky will visit the United States next Winter. He will be the guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of concerts and it is possible that he may play the solo part in his new concerto for piano.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 15 1924

Spalding Plays in Paris

At the recent presentation of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi and played in Paris for the first time, Albert Spalding was the artist. The conductor of the orchestra was Koussevitsky, who was conducting for nearly his last time before coming here to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony. A cable to the New York Herald Tribune says of the reception of the concerto:

"Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Ango-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit.

"All this happened, however, to Albert Spalding. When he finished the third movement of a very beautiful, very successful effort to adapt Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the requirements of a complicated and modern form of musical expression, Paris accepted him immediately as a great artist. There was no doubt about it; people who five minutes before had hissed Honegger's ingenious attempt to put his impression of a huge locomotive running at full speed into music, yelled excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 15 1924

George Schnoevoigt last month resigned the conductorship of the Stockholm Konsertfoeringen Orchestra. He is remembered here as one of the guest conductors with the Boston Symphony this year and his plans now call for a number of guest appearances with several American orchestras next year. He will continue to conduct part of the season of the Berlin Philharmonic and will also lead the summer concert series at Scheveningen this year.

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

Stravinski's new piano concerto, "Le Sacre du Printemps," was recently performed by the composer in Paris to the accompaniment of a selected orchestra of 120 led by Serge Koussevitzky. This new work was completed by the composer one month ago, and it was acclaimed by critics as a masterpiece. Stravinski is said to have shown great interpretive skill in the rendition of his new work, but at times there was a hardneess in his tone which detracted seriously.

ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL

7

JUN 16 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was in Albany Saturday night, and while here completed arrangements with Ben Franklin for concerts of the organization in Albany and Schenectady for next season. On these occasions Albany will have the full orchestra, as has been the invariable rule whenever Mr. Franklin has presented the famous band of musicians.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUN 14 1924

or concerts.

It seems quite certain that Stravinsky will visit the United States next winter. He will be the guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of concerts and it is possible that he may play the solo part in his new concerto for piano.

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JUN 15

39

Koussevitzky Plays the Moderns And Mengelberg Storms Paris

New Compositions by Prokofieff and Schmitt Given for First Time by Russian Conductor, While Dutchman Features Bach

By F. D. Perkins

Special Correspondence to The New York Herald Tribune

PARIS, May 31.

With Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg and Serge Koussevitzky among those present, a roster of the conductors who have been providing Paris with its orchestral music during the last fortnight of May might almost be an extract from a prospectus of what New York is going to receive in the season of 1924-'25. Others who have directed or are about to direct concerts here are Pablo Casals and Vladimir Golschmann.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who had given an all Stravinsky program at the Opéra on the 22d (discussed in my last letter to The Herald Tribune), concluded his series of four concerts last Thursday night with another program which might cause some startled glances if posted on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Not, indeed, the opening Concerto Grosso of Archangelo Corelli, of the vintage of 1712; but this was followed by two "Mirages," by Florent Schmitt; Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" (an "incantation" for tenors, chorus and orchestra); and a repetition of the Stravinsky piano concerto, which had its public launching a week before.

The Corelli work, in C minor, the third of a series of concerti grossi published in 1712 in Rome, was styled "first hearing," although it would seem strange that, even if "completely forgotten, in spite of its great interest and importance," the work should not have been given somewhere during the last 212 years. Agreeable music, of orthodox eighteenth century type, it was played with much vigor and sonority by the musicians under Mr. Koussevitzky, who picks the players for his annual spring series from the various orchestras of Paris.

For the first hearing of Florent Schmitt's "Mirages" the audience was reminded that with the dedication of the first part, "Tristesse de Pan," to the memory of Claude Debussy, "this funeral homage must not be forgotten if one wishes to grasp the character of this piece," which, even in its original piano version, was already suggestive of orchestral possibilities. Pan, indeed, seemed a not too distant relative of the Faun who dreamed through Debussy's indolent Afternoon, but more melancholy, with his original plaintive mood becoming agitated, and then relapsing to its former mild, melodious wistfulness. The second one, "La Tragique Chevauchée," had for its program an excerpt from Byron's "Mazeppa," and followed this almost too faithfully, with an incessant galloping figure running practically from beginning to end—with comparatively little else. But applause was fervid, and Mr. Koussevitzky waved to Mr. Schmitt, who duly rose to bow his thanks.

Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" was far from beautiful but an unusual and striking work, with music that effectively reproduced and enhanced the sentiment of its weird, uncanny text. This was a poem by the Russian Constantin Balmont, inspired by an inscription found on the wall of a temple at Akkad, in the region of Babylon, which is a prayer or incantation against seven sexless demons, the authors of all evil. In chorus and orchestra it was sharp, high-pitched, penetrating music, of which the opening outburst seemed the very apotheosis of discord. Then the tenor, H. Fabert, began his lines in a hushed undertone which later became a shout, none of the voices being granted anything that could be considered song. The incantation continued over a heavy march rhythm in the orchestra, with instrumental and vocal climaxes not far removed from shrieks, but yet necessary for the effective expression of the text. The end came in the lower strings and muffled bass voices.

It was discordant music, ugly music, but with a penetrating and realistic expression of horror, alarm, aversion and warning. Mr. Prokofieff was also discovered and called upon to rise and bow.

The Stravinsky concerto, with the composer again as the solo pianist, made much the same impression as before: that of a decidedly interesting work—though in one or two places Stravinsky pursued his fugato to the point of dryness. Although since the "Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky has abjured the grandiose, there was nevertheless a patch of superb purple when the orchestra played the main theme of the second movement, fortissimo. Another Stravinsky number, "Le Choeur des Etoiles," for male chorus and orchestra, a revised version of an early work, had also been announced, but owing to lack of opportunity for sufficient rehearsal gave way to a repetition of the Prokofieff number. The device of giving a new work two performances at its first appearance has its advantages for reviewers, but one hardly expects to see Mr. Koussevitzky do it in Boston or New York next winter.

Debussy was represented by his three familiar Nocturnes, 'Nuages," "Fêtes" (which Mr. Koussevitzky infused with a rather excessive shot of vodka) and "Sirènes," with women's chorus, which dwells on a rising and falling motive in a chant without words. Then Mr. Koussevitzky closed the concert and the series with the Polovtzian Dances from "Prince Igor," whipping up Borodin's music to a fast and furious finale.

It should be noted that these concerts do not represent the type of program which the Russian conductor proposes to give with the Boston Symphony in America, although contemporary music is to be well represented.

As before, Koussevitzky's conducting, never perfunctory, traversed a wide gamut of feeling. Considering that the orchestra at his disposal was an amalgamation, the players did very creditable work.

While the Paris orchestras closed their regular seasons some time ago, the orchestra of the Conservatoire has been giving the Beethoven cycle, conducted by Walter Damrosch, which ends next Tuesday with the violin concerto, played by Jascha Heifetz, and the Ninth Symphony. The programs have followed the scheme of the New York series, postlude and all; the fifth concert at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on the 27th bringing the "King Stephen" and the third "Leonore" overtures, the Eighth Symphony and the G major piano concerto for which Josef Hofmann was the soloist. This last was really the feature of the evening, as it might have been called the second Paris début of the pianist, who, according to the best authority, had not played here since his first triumphs as an infant prodigy about thirty-eight years ago. The performance of the usual Hofmanesque brilliance and finish excited the Parisians, whose cheers and cries of "bis" were answered by the Rubinsteinized Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens." The audience would have like more, but had to wait until Hofmann's recital this afternoon.

Mr. Damrosch was not able to give Paris an exact replica of what he gave New York, as the Conservatoire Orchestra is far from being a New York Symphony. There was unevenness in the playing, a lack of unity and precision which, despite the conductor's best efforts and his intimate and long acquaintance with Beethoven, gave the performance a certain roughness. We understand, however, that the orchestra employed an unusual number of substitutes for this performance, and it is said that the playing was not up to the standard of the preceding concerts.

The Dutch, headed by Willem Mengelberg, conquered Paris for the time being, last week, when their concerts at the Champs Elysées by the Concertgebouw Orchestra and the Toonkunst Choral Society, both of Amsterdam. Mr. Mengelberg gave three performances of the Bach St. Matthew Passion, two of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a Franco-Dutch program which brought two familiar Philharmonic numbers: Mr. Mengelberg's own Prelude and Ravel's "La Valse." The final number, Fauré's Requiem, had an interesting and effective arrangement of the singers in the center, surrounded by the orchestra.

The performance of the Ninth Symphony, on May 23, offered an interesting opportunity to compare the two orchestras which share under the Dutch conductor. The Concertgebouw is a remarkable orchestra, and played with a fullness and richness of tone, a precision, zest and spirit in their response to Mr. Mengelberg, which would bring high praise on either side of the Atlantic. Whether or not it excelled the Philharmonic would need further hearings to decide—it seemed, on the whole, a dead heat.

The huge chorus, numbering about 350, did remarkable work, with a tone which held its strength and volume in the highest notes. The solo soprano, Mlle. Mia Peltenburg also was able to preserve an unbroken tone. The solo tenor was an old friend—Jacques Urlus.

The Passion Music was excellently done, in a performance of technical finish and unusual emotional power, with perfect unity among the 500 taking part. Wanda Landowska played the harpsichord, while the part of Christ was sung by Thomas Denys, a young barytone with a voice of notable power and volume.

The series was a triumph for Mr. Mengelberg, who received cheers and multiplied recalls that brought to mind his first season with the National Symphony in New York. It also showed that there is an impressive amount of musical material in the city of Amsterdam.

Symphony and Passion Music were sung in German, and the Vienna Staatsoper, under Franz Schalk, which gave a short Mozart series at the Champs-Elysées this week, also found performances in German warmly welcomed in Paris. The war, as far as language goes, seems really over—but then the above performances have not been echt Deutsch, but Dutch and Austrian.

Continuing the cosmopolitan list of conductors who have held forth this past fortnight, Pablo Casals brought his "Orquestra Pau Casals," of Barcelona, which he organized himself in 1920, to the Champs-Elysées for two concerts. The Catalans, whose programs included the "Eroica" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan" and the Saint-Saens C minor piano concert (Alfred Cortot soloist) played, if not with entire finish, yet creditably for an orchestra of not particularly long standing. Mr. Casals did not seem entirely at home on the podium, although he is far from inexperienced as a conductor.

For its music, after next Tuesday, Paris must depend mainly upon recitals, the Ballet Russe, the Opéra, the Opéra Comique, and Mme. Walska's Mozart Festival at the Champs-Elysées.

ST. LOUIS
MISSOURI
POST DISPATCH

JUN 8 1924

Paris Just Now Rules World Of Music

PARIS, June 3.

DESPITE the presidential crisis, the Cabinet crisis and the financial crisis provoked by the rapidly falling franc, Paris finds time to think of art and music, particularly the latter. Temporarily, during the Olympic period, she is the music center of the world, a position normally occupied by Vienna or New York.

Besides her own Opera Comique, Paris is supporting the Vienna opera company, a dozen big concert orchestras, including those of Damrosch and Koussevitzky, and several world-famous singers. Chaliapin is opening a series of four performances at the National Academy of Music, and all Paris is coming to hear him. Prices have been raised 400 per cent for the occasion. The cheapest seat in the house costs 30 francs (at present exchange $1.56), yet tickets are selling like hot cakes.

"How does Paris opera compare with American opera?" the correspondent asked the famous Russian baritone.

"That is difficult to say," replied Chaliapin, "because one has been at the business 500 and the other only 50 years. But this I can say. Music and opera have made enormous strides in the United States in the last 15 years. Within 50 years I predict that America will amaze the world in things esthetic.

"In time opera will come to receive Government aid in the United States as it does in Europe. Opera must be discussed on the floor of Congress. Then it will develop into a typical American institution, outshining anything we can do in Europe."

Chaliapin is guaranteed 60,000 francs ($3120) a night here, in addition to 50 per cent of the gate receipts, which, if the house is full, will amount to fully 110,000 francs. There has been much speculation as to who would conduct the orchestra. Koussevitzky, the famous Pole, "backing out" at the last moment on the pretext of a wounded hand, has been credited by scandal mongers with a disinclination to co-operate with a social hermit like Chaliapin.

The Russian singer is said to be rather at odds with Paris society.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUN 10 1924

MONTEUX'S FATHER DEAD

Word was received in Boston yesterday of the death in France on May 30 of the father of Pierre Monteux, recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was 89 years old.

HARRISBURG
PA.
NEWS

It seems quite certain that Stravinsky will visit the United States next Winter. He will be the guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of concerts and it is possible that he may play the solo part in his new concerto for piano.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 5 1924

Spalding Plays in Paris

At the recent presentation of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi and played in Paris for the first time, Albert Spalding was the artist. The conductor of the orchestra was Koussevitsky, who was conducting for nearly his last time before coming here to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony. A cable to the New York Herald Tribune says of the reception of the concerto:

"Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Ango-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit.

"All this happened, however, to Albert Spalding. When he finished the third movement of a very beautiful, very successful effort to adapt Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the requirements of a complicated and modern form of musical expression, Paris accepted him immediately as a great artist. There was no doubt about it; people who five minutes before had hissed Honegger's ingenious attempt to put his impression of a huge locomotive running at full speed into music, yelled excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 5 1924

George Schnoevoigt last month resigned the conductorship of the Stockholm Konsertfoeringen Orchestra. He is remembered here as one of the guest conductors with the Boston Symphony this year and his plans now call for a number of guest appearances with several American orchestras next year. He will continue to conduct part of the season of the Berlin Philharmonic and will also lead the summer concert series at Scheveningen this year.

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

Stravinski's new piano concerto, "Le Sacre du Printemps," was recently performed by the composer in Paris to the accompaniment of a selected orchestra of 120 led by Serge Koussevitzky. This new work was completed by the composer one month ago, and it was acclaimed by critics as a masterpiece. Stravinski is said to have shown great interpretive skill in the rendition of his new work, but at times there was a hardneess in his tone which detracted seriously.

ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUN 16 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was in Albany Saturday night, and while here completed arrangements with B. Franklin for concerts of the organization in Albany and Schenectady for next season. On these occasions Albany will have the full orchestra, as has been the invariable rule whenever Mr. Franklin has presented the famous band of musicians.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUN 14 1924

or concerts.

It seems quite certain that Stravinsky will visit the United States next winter. He will be the guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of concerts, and it is possible that he may play the solo part in his new concerto for piano.

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JUN 15

39

Koussevitzky Plays the Moderns And Mengelberg Storms Paris

New Compositions by Prokofieff and Schmitt Given for First Time by Russian Conductor, While Dutchman Features Bach

By F. D. Perkins
Special Correspondence to The New York Herald Tribune

PARIS, May 31.

With Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg and Serge Koussevitzky among those present, a roster of the conductors who have been providing Paris with its orchestral music during the last fortnight of May might almost be an extract from a prospectus of what New York is going to receive in the season of 1924-'25. Others who have directed or are about to direct concerts here are Pablo Casals and Vladimir Golschmann.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who had given an all Stravinsky program at the Opéra on the 22d (discussed in my last letter to The Herald Tribune), concluded his series of four concerts last Thursday night with another program which might cause some startled glances if posted on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Not, indeed, the opening Concerto Grosso of Archangelo Corelli, of the vintage of 1712; but this was followed by two "Mirages," by Florent Schmitt; Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" (an "incantation" for tenors, chorus and orchestra); and a repetition of the Stravinsky piano concerto, which had its public launching a week before.

The Corelli work, in C minor, the third of a series of concerti grossi published in 1712 in Rome, was styled "first hearing," although it would seem strange that, even if "completely forgotten, in spite of its great interest and importance," the work should not have been given somewhere during the last 212 years. Agreeable music, of orthodox eighteenth century type, it was played with much vigor and sonority by the musicians under Mr. Koussevitzky, who picks the players for his annual spring series from the various orchestras of Paris.

For the first hearing of Florent Schmitt's "Mirages" the audience was reminded that with the dedication of the first part, "Tristesse de Pan," to the memory of Claude Debussy, "this funeral homage must not be forgotten if one wishes to grasp the character of this piece," which, even in its original piano version, was already suggestive of orchestral possibilities. Pan, indeed, seemed a not too distant relative of the Faun who dreamed through Debussy's indolent Afternoon, but more melancholy, with his original plaintive mood becoming agitated, and then relapsing to its former mild, melodious wistfulness. The second one, "La Tragique Chevauchée," had for its program an excerpt from Byron's "Mazeppa," and followed this almost too faithfully, with an incessant galloping figure running practically from beginning to end—with comparatively little else. But applause was fervid, and Mr. Koussevitzky waved to Mr. Schmitt, who duly rose to bow his thanks.

Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" was a far from beautiful but an unusual and striking work, with music that effectively reproduced and enhanced the sentiment of its weird, uncanny text. This was a poem by the Russian Constantin Balmont, inspired by an inscription found on the wall of a temple in Akkad, in the region of Babylon, which is a prayer or incantation against seven sexless demons, the authors of all evil. In chorus and orchestra it was sharp, high-pitched, penetrating music, of which the opening outburst seemed the very apotheosis of discord. Then the tenor, H. Fabert, began his lines in a hushed undertone which later became a shout, none of the voices being granted anything that could be considered song. The incantation continued over a heavy march rhythm in the orchestra, with instrumental and vocal climaxes not far removed from shrieks, but yet necessary for the effective expression of the text. The end came in the lower strings and muffled bass voices.

It was discordant music, ugly music, but with a penetrating and realistic expression of horror, alarm, aversion and warning. Mr. Prokofieff was also discovered and called upon to rise and bow.

The Stravinsky concerto, with the composer again as the solo pianist, made much the same impression as before: that of a decidedly interesting work—though in one or two places Stravinsky pursued his fugato to the point of dryness. Although since the "Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky has abjured the grandiose, there was nevertheless a patch of superb purple when the orchestra played the main theme of the second movement, fortissimo. Another Stravinsky number, "Le Choeur des Etoiles," for male chorus and orchestra, a revised version of an early work, had also been announced, but owing to lack of opportunity for sufficient rehearsal gave way to a repetition of the Prokofieff number. The device of giving a new work two performances at its first appearance has its advantages for reviewers, but one hardly expects to see Mr. Koussevitzky do it in Boston or New York next winter.

Debussy was represented by his three familiar Nocturnes, 'Nuages," "Fêtes" (which Mr. Koussevitzky infused with a rather excessive shot of vodka) and "Sirènes," with women's chorus, which dwells on a rising and falling motive in a chant without words. Then Mr. Koussevitzky closed the concert and the series with the Polovtzian Dances from "Prince Igor," whipping up Borodin's music to a fast and furious finale.

It should be noted that these concerts do not represent the type of program which the Russian conductor proposes to give with the Boston Symphony in America, although contemporary music is to be well represented.

As before, Koussevitzky's conducting, never perfunctory, traversed a wide gamut of feeling. Considering that the orchestra at his disposal was an amalgamation, the players did very creditable work.

[illegible] Paris orchestras closed their regular seasons some time ago, the orchestra of the Conservatoire has been giving the Beethoven cycle, conducted by Walter Damrosch, which ends next Tuesday with the violin concerto played by Jascha Heifetz, and the Ninth Symphony. The programs have followed the scheme of the New York series, postludes and all; the fifth concert at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on the 27th bringing the "King Stephen" and the third "Leonore" overtures, the Eighth Symphony and the G major piano concerto for which Josef Hofmann was the soloist. This last was really the feature of the evening, as it might have been called the second Paris début of the pianist, who, according to the best authority, had not played here since his first triumphs as an infant prodigy about thirty-eight years ago. A performance of the usual Hofmanesque brilliance and finish excited the Parisians, whose cheers and cries of "bis" were answered by the Rubinsteinized Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens." The audience would have liked more, but had to wait until Hofmann's recital this afternoon.

Mr. Damrosch was not able to give Paris an exact replica of what he gave New York, as the Conservatoire Orchestra is far from being a New York Symphony. There was unevenness in the playing, a lack of unity and precision which, despite the conductor's best efforts and his intimate and long acquaintance with Beethoven, gave the performance a certain roughness. We understand, however, that the orchestra employed an unusual number of substitutes for this performance, and it is said that the playing was not up to the standard of the preceding concerts.

The Dutch, headed by Willem Mengelberg, conquered Paris for the time being, last week, when his concerts at the Champs Elysées by the Concertgebouw Orchestra and the Toonkunst Choral Society, both of Amsterdam. Mr. Mengelberg gave three performances of the Bach St. Matthew Passion, two of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a Franco-Dutch program which brought two familiar Philharmonic numbers: Mr. Mengelberg's own Prelude and Ravel's "La Valse." The final number, Fauré's Requiem, had an interesting and effective arrangement of the singers in the center, surrounded by the orchestra.

The performance of the Ninth Symphony, on May 23, offered an interesting opportunity to compare the two orchestras which serve under the Dutch conductor. The Concertgebouw is a remarkable orchestra, and played with a fullness and richness of tone, a precision, zest and spirit in their response to Mr. Mengelberg, which would bring high praise on either side of the Atlantic. Whether or not it excelled the Philharmonic would need further hearings to decide—it seemed, on the whole, a dead heat.

The huge chorus, numbering about 350, did remarkable work, with a tone which held its strength and volume in the highest notes. The solo soprano, Mlle. Mia Peltenburg also was able to preserve an unbroken tone. The solo tenor was an old friend—Jacques Urlus.

The Passion Music was excellently done, in a performance of technical finish and unusual emotional power, with perfect unity among the 500 taking part. Wanda Landowska played the harpsichord, while the part of Christ was sung by Thomas Denys, a young barytone with a voice of notable power and volume.

The series was a triumph for Mr. Mengelberg, who received cheers and multiplied recalls that brought to mind his first season with the National Symphony in New York. It also showed that there is an impressive amount of musical material in the city of Amsterdam.

Symphony and Passion Music were sung in German and the Vienna Staatsoper, under Franz Schalk, which gave a short Mozart series at the Champs-Elysées this week, also found performances in German warmly welcomed in Paris. The war, as far as language goes, seems really over—but then the above performances have not been echt Deutsch, but Dutch and Austrian.

Continuing the cosmopolitan list of conductors who have held forth this past fortnight, Pablo Casals brought his "Orquestra Pau Casals," of Barcelona, which he organized himself in 1920, to the Champs-Elysées for two concerts. The Catalans, whose programs included the "Eroica" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan" and the Saint-Saens C minor piano concert (Alfred Cortot soloist) played, if not with entire finish, yet creditably for an orchestra of not particularly long standing. Mr. Casals did not seem entirely at home on the podium, although he is far from inexperienced as a conductor.

For its music, after next Tuesday, Paris must depend mainly upon recitals, the Ballet Russe, the Opéra, the Opéra Comique, and Mme. Walska's Mozart Festival at the Champs-Elysées.

N. Y.
WIRELESS AGE
JUN 1924

* * *

RADIO fans all over the country will be fortunate this year in being able to hear the opening Pop concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be broadcast by Station WBZ, Boston Herald-Traveler Westinghouse. These concerts are conducted by Agide Jacchia, directing a symphony of 80 players which is adequate for playing the most elaborate modern score.

H. V. Carpenter, Dean of Mechanical Arts and Engineering, supervised installation of KFAE

These Pop concerts are so much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden-domed state house and they are unique in the fact that there is nothing like them anywhere in this country. In the summer of 1885 the project of a supplementary series of concerts to the regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of popular character to suit the warmer season, was inaugurated. After the example of Bilse concerts in Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed, tables installed and refreshments were served.

The experiment was an instant success. The "Promenade Concerts" soon came to be called the "Pops." While the Pops of this the 39th season follow the original idea to some extent, the idea has been enlarged to a great extent. In the first place, the orchestra has grown considerably—its full symphonic proportions are adequate and the music is taken somewhat more seriously, although light trifles for encores, waltzes, operetta selections, remain an integral part of the Pops.

Mary Ellis, Arthur Hammerstein's new star, broadcast from WJY

This is Agide Jacchia's eighth season as conductor of these concerts. A native of Pesaro, Italy, he became a favorite pupil of Mascagni at an early age in the Conservatory of that season, Mr. Jacchia made an immediate mark as a young man as a conductor in the principal opera houses of Italy.

Since coming to this country, Mr. Jacchia has conducted opera from coast to coast and from Canada to Central America. During the season of 1914-1915 he was the principal Italian conductor at the Century Theater in New York. He is the founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Musi

*

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
JUN 8 1924

Cheers Stravinsky's New Piano Concerto at Premiere

Composer Plays Solo Part Under Koussevitzky's Baton; Concerto Impressive, but Lacks Magnitude of "Le Sacre du Printemps"

By F. D. Perkins

PARIS, May 23

Theatre National de l'Opera, Paris, Thursday, May 22, at 9 p. m. Concert of music by Igor Stravinsky, performed by an orchestra of 120 under Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Igor Stravinsky.

Suite for Orchestra, "L'Oiseau de Feu."
Fragments from the ballet "Petrouchka."
Concerto for piano and orchestra (first performance).
Pianist, Igor Stravinsky.
"Le Sacre du Printemps."

In Paris there is a musical public of considerable size which likes its modern music neat. It is true that Stravinsky barely escaped with his clothes when Mr. Monteux conducted the first Paris performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; but that was a long twelve years ago, and now a new work by the surprising and sometimes stupendous Russian attracts large numbers of enthusiastic hearers. There were few vacant seats at Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in the Opera House last night, and the top gallery suggested the well known 5:30 subway rush at Times Square.

Stravinsky's new piano concerto, dedicated to Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, was finished last month, and thus can safely be regarded as Stravinsky's very latest work. Like most of the composer's recent scores, it contents itself with a moderate number of instruments, though there seems to be a certain reaction from the extreme economy of numbers and austerity of style which marks the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," for instance. The accompanying orchestra called for in the score of the Concerto, according to the program, comprises two flutes and piccolo, two bassoons, one English horn, two clarinets, four horns, three trombones and of sound, especially of wind instruments, which might send conservatory music lovers scurrying to the nearest Beethoven Cycle, the concerto has a certain classical flavor—with an almost continuous fugue, sometimes pursued by the piano alone, sometimes divided between soloist and orchestra, suggesting a much acidulated Bach. There are lyric passages of marked beauty, especially in the slow movement, and lively episodes which might be fragments from "Petrouchka." The opening passage, lento, is marked by what might be called a soured melodiousness, a plaintive, penetrating combination of wind instruments. The main body of the movement starts at a lively pace, with the main theme stated by both piano and orchestra, giving strong hints of "Petrouchka." The piano has a long fugal cadenza, the orchestra joining in later on, with the suggestions of "Petrouchka" again pronounced. The fugue continues, alternating between solo and tutti passages, until interrupted by another piercing outburst of the wind. The fugue is resumed, and seems once or twice on the point of becoming jazz, sometimes on the point of becoming Bach, with the piano dominating, until the full body of instruments ends the movement with the original lento, fortissimo.

The second movement has a lyric opening, shared by piano and orchestra, which eventually gives the theme fortissimo, with heavy chords by the piano, accentuating the characteristic acidulous quality of Stravinsky's combinations of wind instruments, which in this instance is unusually effective. The mood softens and lightens, and a dialogue ends in a gravely plaintive episode for the piano. The second theme, also lyric, is played by the orchestra and embroidered by the piano, and another orchestral outburst brings back the opening of the movement in a somewhat different form—not repeated literally, according to the program notes, "but rather representing a continuation of the cadenza." This leads into the finale, which brings back the fugue of the first movement in various forms and combinations. "Petrouchka" is recalled again, and Stravinsky seems, at one or two points, about to embark on a jazz dance. Abrupt stops interrupt the rapid movement, and finally three chords for the piano bring back the plaintive mood. The three chords are heard again, and a broad orchestral passage leads to a sudden close.

* * *

At a first hearing, the concerto seemed a decidedly interesting, often impressive work—not, indeed, another "Sacre du Printemps," but well deserving of rank among Stravinsky's major compositions. Stravinsky played with ample vigor and mechanical skill, but with a certain hardness and invariability, a lack of nuance in his performance. While he is doubtless the leading modernist composer, Mr. Stravinsky can hardly be called a composer-pianist. Still, he had much zest and fleetness of fingers, and everybody waxed most enthusiastic.

Under Koussevitzky's baton the orchestral performance had life and brilliance, though the playing itself did not challenge the excellence of our leading American orchestras. The Russian conductor showed a remarkable power over his men, especially in his ability to whip up climaxes, and the musicians, mainly French, played as though thoroughly interested in and enthusiastic for the music in hand. "Petrouchka" was sparkling, and the climaxes of "Le Sacre du Printemps" were unusually powerful and impressive. Yet there seemed places where the prize would have gone to Pierre Monteux and his Bostonians, whose two Carnegie Hall performances of the work had an evenness and finish not always equaled Thursday night. But the increasing frenzy of the second part received its full due, and cheers followed—calls for Koussevitzky and for the tall, apparently unexcited composer, who was led on by Koussevitzky to shake hands, bow a half dozen times to his devotees and applaud the conductor for his notable work in his behalf.

BALTIMORE
MARYLAND
SUN
JUN 8 1924

Boston "Pop" Concerts Unique Institution

Agide Jacchia Is Conducting Again This Summer For Eighth Season.

An institution peculiar to Boston is the season of pop concerts, which are now in full sway in that city and the center of its musical activity. They date back to 1885, and are almost as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which they sprang. This summer experiment of light music by a fine symphony orchestra, to an accompaniment of beer, sandwiches, tobacco and conversation (subdued), was popular from the start.

In other cities the pops have often been imitated, tables and all, but for some reason never with the enduring success of the original "pops." Some thought prohibition would injure them, but, on the contrary, the cafe service increased, while the music itself assumed an added emphasis.

Agide Jacchia, the conductor, is now in his eighth season. His orchestra numbers 80. His programs range from a rhapsody or symphonic movement to a light waltz, a sugary trifle, or the operetta of the hour.

The "pops" are given nightly through the spring and early summer in Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS
JUN 10

* * *

Max Fiedler, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, now directs the Essen orchestra.

CHICAGO
ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
ISSUE OF
JUN 1 - 1924

* * *

Albert Spalding, who has been on a concert tour of Europe since April 2, when he opened his present tour at Amsterdam as soloist with the Concertgebow Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, has just been engaged by Sergi Koussevitsky, conductor of the Paris Orchestra, to give the first performance in Paris of the new Respighi Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra at the Paris Opera House.

Negotiations are now under way to have Mr. Spalding play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston, with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

From JUN 1924
Theatre Magazine
New York City

THE month was also notable in the concert world for the farewell of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux leaves with the sincere regrets of all music lovers. He took charge of the famous orchestra after the war, when the incarceration of Karl Muck had left the organization but a wreck of its former self, and he brought it back to its old-time perfection. Never appreciated while French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House became of his overretiring nature and unwillingness to force himself forward, he went to Boston and by his splendid musicianship, exquisite taste, wide artistic sympathy, and unswerving sincerity proved himself a worthy successor to such conductors as Muck and Nikisch. Mr. Monteux's success in Boston gave grateful proof of the fact that while an overmodest nature may not win in opera, in the purely orchestral field it may even be a virtue. Mr. Monteux did not blow his own trumpet; he left that to his orchestra and by so doing proved the truth of the old fable that merit and modesty are sometimes found together.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 25 1924

Alfred Cortot, who has been absent from the American concert platform for a year, will return next season for a concert tour, one of his appearances to be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will also be heard with the New York Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and with the Philadelphia and Philharmonic orchestras.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
JUN 1 01924

PIERRE MONTEUX' FATHER DEAD IN FRANCE AT 89

Word has come to this city from France of the death of Gustave Monteux, father of Pierre Monteux, until recently conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr Monteux was 89 years old. He died within two weeks of his son's return to France from the United States.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
MAY 25 1924

Rudolf Krasselt, who in 1903-1905 was first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted two concerts in Stockholm recently, and Sibelius conducted his "Fantasia Sinfonica," which has not yet crossed the Atlantic.

TIMES
JUN 7 1924

Albert Spaulding, well-known violinist, re[illegible] in Paris the first perfor[illegible]ghi's concerto for violin [illegible] expected that [illegible] this impor[illegible]

N. Y.
WIRELESS AGE

* * *

RADIO fans all over the country will be fortunate this year in being able to hear the opening Pop concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be broadcast by Station WBZ, Boston Herald-Traveler Westinghouse. These concerts are conducted by Agide Jacchia, director a symphony of 80 players which is adequate for playing the most elaborate modern score.

H. V. Carpenter, Dean of Mechanical Arts and Engineering, supervised installation of KFAE

These Pop concerts are so much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden-domed state house and they are unique in the fact that there is nothing like them anywhere in this country. In the summer of 1885 the project of a supplementary series of concerts to the regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of popular character to suit the warmer season, was inaugurated. After the example of Bilse concerts in Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed, tables installed and refreshments were served.

The experiment was an instant success. The "Promenade Concerts" soon came to be called the "Pops." While the Pops of this the 39th season follow the original idea to some extent, the idea has been enlarged to a great extent. In the first place, the orchestra has grown considerably—its full symphonic proportions are adequate and the music is taken somewhat more seriously, although light trifles for encores, waltzes, operetta selections, remain an integral part of the Pops.

Mary Ellis, Arthur Hammerstein's new star, broadcast from WJY

This is Agide Jacchia's eighth season as conductor of these concerts. A native of Pesaro, Italy, he became a favorite pupil of Mascagni at an early age in the Conservatory of that season, Mr. Jacchia made an immediate mark as a young man as a conductor in the principal opera houses of Italy.

Since coming to this country, Mr. Jacchia has conducted opera from coast to coast and from Canada to Cen-

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

Paris Cheers Stravinsky's New Piano Concerto at Premiere

Composer Plays Solo Part Under Koussevitzky's Baton; Concerto Impressive, but Lacks Magnitude of "Le Sacre du Printemps"

By F. D. Perkins

PARIS, May 23

Theatre National de l'Opera, Paris, Thursday, May 22, at 9 p. m. Concert of music by Igor Stravinsky, performed by an orchestra of 120 under Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Igor Stravinsky.

Suite for Orchestra, "L'Oiseau de Feu."
Fragments from the ballet "Petrouchka."
Concerto for piano and orchestra (first performance).
Pianist, Igor Stravinsky.
"Le Sacre du Printemps."

In Paris there is a musical public of considerable size which likes its modern music neat. It is true that Stravinsky barely escaped with his clothes when Mr. Monteux conducted the first Paris performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps"; but that was a long twelve years ago, and now a new work by the surprising and sometimes stupendous Russian attracts large numbers of enthusiastic hearers. There were few vacant seats at Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in the Opera House last night, and the top gallery suggested the well known 5:30 subway rush at Times Square.

Stravinsky's new piano concerto, dedicated to Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, was finished last month, and thus can safely be regarded as Stravinsky's very latest work. Like most of the composer's recent scores, it contents itself with a moderate number of instruments, though there seems to be a certain reaction from the extreme economy of numbers and austerity of style which marks the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," for instance. The accompanying orchestra called for in the score of the Concerto, according to the program, comprises two flutes and piccolo, two bassoons, one English horn, two clarinets, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and tuba, four kettledrums (with the warning, "played by a musician"—is Stravinsky deprecating the tribe of tympani players?)—and several, actually four, desks of double basses. The orchestral players numbered, by actual count, about forty-five.

Despite various poignant combinations of sound, especially of wind instruments, which might send conservative music lovers scurrying to the nearest Beethoven Cycle, the concerto has a certain classical flavor—with an almost continuous fugue, sometimes pursued by the piano alone, sometimes divided between soloist and orchestra, suggesting a much acidulated Bach. There are lyric passages of marked beauty, especially in the slow movement, and lively episodes which might be fragments from "Petrouchka." The opening passage, lento, is marked by what might be called a soured melodiousness, a plaintive, penetrating combination of wind instruments. The main body of the movement starts at a lively pace, with the main theme stated by both piano and orchestra, giving strong hints of "Petrouchka." The piano has a long fugal cadenza, the orchestra joining in later on, with the suggestions of "Petrouchka" again pronounced. The fugue continues, alternating between solo and tutti passages, until interrupted by another piercing outburst of the wind. The fugue is resumed, and seems once or twice on the point of becoming jazz, sometimes on the point of becoming Bach, with the piano dominating, until the full body of instruments ends the movement with the original lento, fortissimo.

The second movement has a lyric opening, shared by piano and orchestra, which eventually gives the theme fortissimo, with heavy chords by the piano, accentuating the characteristic acidulous quality of Stravinsky's combinations of wind instruments, which in this instance is unusually effective. The mood softens and lightens, and a dialogue ends in a gravely plaintive episode for the piano. The second theme, also lyric, is played by the orchestra and embroidered by the piano, and another orchestral outburst brings back the opening of the movement in a somewhat different form—not repeated literally, according to the program notes, "but rather representing the continuation of the cadenza." This passes into the finale, which brings back the fugue of the first movement in various forms and combinations. "Petrouchka" is recalled again, and again Stravinsky seems, at one or two points, about to embark on a jazz dance. Abrupt stops interrupt the rapid movement, and finally three chords for the piano bring back the plaintive mood. The three chords are heard again, and a broad orchestral passage leads to a sudden close.

* * *

At a first hearing, the concerto seemed a decidedly interesting, often impressive work—not, indeed, another "Sacre du Printemps," but well deserving of rank among Stravinsky's major compositions. Stravinsky played with ample vigor and mechanical skill, but with a certain hardness and invariability, a lack of nuance in his performance. While he is doubtless the leading modernist composer, Mr. Stravinsky can hardly be called a composer-pianist. Still, he had much zest and fleetness of fingers, and everybody waxed most enthusiastic.

Under Koussevitzky's baton the orchestral performance had life and brilliance, though the playing itself did not challenge the excellence of our leading American orchestras. The Russian conductor showed a remarkable power over his men, especially in his ability to whip up climaxes, and the musicians, mainly French, played as though thoroughly interested in and enthusiastic for the music in hand. "Petrouchka" was sparkling, and the climaxes of "Le Sacre du Printemps" were unusually powerful and impressive. Yet there seemed places where the prize would have gone to Pierre Monteux and his Bostonians, whose two Carnegie Hall performances of the work had an evenness and finish not always equaled Thursday night. But the increasing frenzy of the second part received its full due, and cheers followed—calls for Koussevitzky and for the tall, apparently unexcited composer, who was led on by Koussevitzky to shake hands, bow a half dozen times to his devotees and applaud the conductor for his notable work in his behalf.

BALTIMORE
MARYLAND
SUN
JUN 8 1924

Boston "Pop" Concerts Unique Institution

Agide Jacchia Is Conducting Again This Summer For Eighth Season.

An institution peculiar to Boston is the season of pop concerts, which are now in full sway in that city and the center of its musical activity. They date back to 1885, and are almost as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which they sprang. This summer experiment of light music by a fine symphony orchestra, to an accompaniment of beer, sandwiches, tobacco and conversation (subdued), was popular from the start.

In other cities the pops have often been imitated, tables and all, but for some reason never with the enduring success of the original "pops." Some thought prohibition would injure them, but, on the contrary, the cafe service increased, while the music itself assumed an added emphasis.

Agide Jacchia, the conductor, is now in his eighth season. His orchestra numbers 80. His programs range from a rhapsody or symphonic movement to a light waltz, a sugary trifle, or the operetta of the hour.

The "pops" are given nightly through the spring and early summer in Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS

* * *

Max Fiedler, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, now directs the Essen orchestra.

CHICAGO
ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
ISSUE OF
JUN 1 1924

* * *

Albert Spalding, who has been on a concert tour of Europe since April 3, when he opened his present tour at Amsterdam as soloist with the Concertgeblow Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, has just been engaged by Sergi Koussevitsky, conductor of the Paris Orchestra, to give the first performance in Paris of the new Respighi Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra at the Paris Opera House.

Negotiations are now under way to have Mr. Spalding play this new work for the first time in New York and Boston with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

From JUN 1924
Theatre Magazine
New York City

THE month was also notable in the concert world for the farewell of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux leaves with the sincere regrets of all music lovers. He took charge of the famous orchestra after the war, when the incarceration of Karl Muck had left the organization but a wreck of its former self, and he brought it back to its old-time perfection. Never appreciated while French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House became of his overretiring nature and unwillingness to force himself forward, he went to Boston and by his splendid musicianship, exquisite taste, wide artistic sympathy, and unswerving sincerity proved himself a worthy successor to such conductors as Muck and Nikisch. Mr. Monteux's success in Boston gave grateful proof of the fact that while an overmodest nature may not win in opera, in the purely orchestral field it may even be a virtue. Mr. Monteux did not blow his own trumpet; he left that to his orchestra and by so doing proved the truth of the old fable that merit and modesty are sometimes found together.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
JUN 10

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
1924

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 25

Alfred Cortot, who has been absent from the American concert platform for a year, will return next season for a concert tour, one of his appearances to be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will also be heard with the New York Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and with the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras.

* * *

PIERRE MONTEUX' FATHER DEAD IN FRANCE AT 89

Word has come to this city from France of the death of Gustave Monteux, father of Pierre Monteux, until recently conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr Monteux was 89 years old. He died within two weeks of his son's return to France from the United States.

Rudolf Krasselt, who in 1903-1905 was first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted two concerts in Stockholm recently, and Sibelius conducted his "Fantasia Sinfonica," which has not yet crossed the Atlantic.

TIMES

Albert Spaulding, well-known violinist, recently gave in Paris the first performance of Respighi's concerto for violin and orchestra. It is expected that Mr. Spaulding will introduce this important work in New York next fall with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Trans May 14 — Tel May 17 — Adv May 18 — 61

Koussevitzky Leads in London

Music lovers in London were recently given the opportunity of comparing the art of two great conductors, Weingartner and Koussevitzky. As the latter will lead the Boston Symphony next season, the criticisms of his performance are especially interesting locally.

"I do not wish to belittle Koussevitzky, who is the greatest conductor of his particular school I have heard," writes Dyneley Hussey in the London Saturday Review. "I have never seen anyone with such a remarkable right arm; it is as sensitive and as quick in action as a siesmograph. But in the classics he seems to me to commit the same kind of errors as Albert Coates, though he commits them infinitely better. There are, broadly, two ways in which an executant may approach the music he wishes to interpret. He may bend it to his will and remake it in his own image. That is the way of Koussevitzky and of Busoni. The value of such performances will vary generally in proportion to the musical sensibility of the executant and, for each of us individually, according to the amount of sympathy we have for his particular point of view.

"The second way is to keep strictly to the score and to give the music as it is written. Here the value of the performance depends upon the ability of the executant to transform the letter into the expressive spirit of the music. It is the way of Weingartner. It involves the complete fusion of the strong personality of the performer into the music—and I would dispute any suggestion that Weingartner has any less individuality than Koussevitzky—and it seems to me the more difficult, as it is the less showy task.

"Let me illustrate my meaning: One of the most difficult things in violin playing is the production of octaves absolutely in tune. When it is done it sounds so simple that a violinist of great and deserved reputation said that he never played them quite in tune, because the audience would fail to recognize the difficulties he was overcoming. Even so, it takes a keener attention and a finer perception to appreciate the sensitive balance and the true expression of the composer's ideas through the subservience of the executant than to be captured by sensational contracts and new readings. * * * Koussevitzky undoubtedly puts infinitely more passion into any performance he gives and he raises his audience at the time to a higher pitch of excitement. But for many of us Weingartner is the more profound, the more moving."

Post May 4

TOMORROW THE POPS

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall the 39th season of Pops, and the 8th under the direction of Agide Jacchia, will open with a typically varied and inviting programme that lists Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Mr. Jacchia's arrangement of a Burlesca by Scarlatti, a selection from "Wildflower," and pieces by Berlioz, Waldteufel, Saint-Saens, Glazunov, Tchaikovsky, Schubert and Dvorak.

On each evening thereafter and on alternate Sundays, beginning May 11, the Pops will continue, with the usual accompaniments save at the Sunday concerts, of refreshments and smoking.

Her May 7

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight will honor particularly "Music Week." The numbers to be played follow:

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikovsky
Overture to "Raymond" Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" Puccini
Ballet from "Rosamunde" Schubert
Largo Handel
Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata, Pathetique Beethoven-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana" Chabrier
Ride of the Valkyries Wagner
The Lark Glinka-Jacchia
American Fantasy Herbert

Jel May 7

PROGRAM AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight will honor particularly "Music Week." The numbers to be played follow:

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikovsky; overture to "Raymond," Thomas; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; fantasia, "Tosca," Puccini; ballet from "Rosamunde," Schubert; Largo, Handel; Adagio Cantabile from the Sonata Pathetique, Beethoven-Jacchia; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; The Lark, Glinka-Jacchia; American Fantasy, Herbert.

Monitor May 16

Tonight at the Pops

Military March ..... Schubert
Overture to "Il Guarany" .. Gomez
Whirling Dervishes ..... Godowsky
Fantasia, "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"Liebesfreud" ..... Kreisler
"Dubinushka" .. Arranged by Jacchia
Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais," Waldteufel
Russian Dance ..... Tschaikowsky

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Rossini
Waltz, "Dornröschen" ..... Chaikovsky
Solo for Saxophone, Old Slave Song Gaines-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Pirouette ..... Glazunov
By Moonlight ..... Bendel-Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Suite from "Snow Maiden" Rimsky-Korsakov
Macushla ..... MacMurrough-Jacchia
Rákóczy March ..... Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Her May 13

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Tonight will be Harvard Freshman night at the Pops in Symphony Hall but the concert is open to the public and of general public interest. The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verd
Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Song by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
"Up the Street" ..... Morse

Adv May 15

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

Agide Jacchia will offer the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture, "Beautiful Galatea" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ..... Strauss
Furlana, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" .... Glazounov
Romance ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea" Suppé
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ..... J. Strauss
Furlana from "La Gioconda" .. Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" .. Glazunov
Romance ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann". Offenbach
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever" Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Her May 16

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

The Pops Symphony orchestra under Agide Jacchia will be heard in the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Portia Law school will be present.

Military March, Schubert; Overture to "Il Guarany," Gomez; Whirling Dervishes, Godowsky; Fantasia, "Don Calos," Verdi; Prelude to "Lonhengrin," Wagner; Liebesfreud, Kreisler; Dubinushka, Arranged by Jacchia; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky- Korsakov; Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais," Waldteufel; Russian Dance, Tschaikovsky.

Adv May 16

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will play the following program at Symphony Hall tonight:

Military March ..... Schubert
Overture, "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Whirling Dervishes ..... Godowsky
Fantasia, "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Pfelude, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Liebesfreud ..... Kreisler
Dubinushka ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Finale, "Scheherazade" .. Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Cavalleria" ..... Mascagni
Waltz, "Toujours" ..... Waldteufel
Russian Dance ..... Tschaikovsky

Monitor May 17

Tonight at the Pops

Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
"Orientale" ..... Cui-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Spanish Serenade ..... Glazounoff
"Valse Triste" ..... Sibelius
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
"En Sourdine" ..... Tellam
Charge of the Hussars ..... Spindler

Globe May 18

Albert Spalding was engaged by Serge Koussevitzky to give the first Paris performance of Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto" for violin and orchestra at the opera last Thursday evening. Negotiations are under way for Mr Spalding to give the first New York and Boston performances of the work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr Koussevitzky next season.

AT THE POPS

The following program has been arranged by Agide Jacchia for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; Orientale, Cui-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint Saens; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Spanish Serenade, Glazounov; Valse Triste, Sibelius; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Marche Slave, Tschaikovsky; En Sourdine, Tellam; Charge of the Hussars, Spindler.

Her May 17

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

The following program has been made by Agide Jacchia for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight.

Overture to "The Barber of Seville" ... Rossini
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Orientale ..... Cui-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ... Saint Saens
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Spanish Serenade ..... Glazounov
Valse Trieste ..... Sibelius
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikovsky
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Charge of the Hussars ..... Spindler

Her May 18.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow night in Symphony hall the Pop Concerts will enter on their third week. Mr. Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will perform for the pleasure of those who sit at the tables and in the balconies and let the music become the basis of their sociable evening. So rich in variety and popularity is the Pops' repertoire that the seventy-odd numbers announced for the week leave no musical stratum untouched nor fail to find the most delightful in each.

MONDAY

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Norwegian Melodies ..... Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ..... Massenet
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhemj
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Afro-American Folk Songs Arranged by Jacchia
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa

TUESDAY

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song" .. Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" ..... Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 2" ..... Bizet
Indian Lament ..... Dvorak
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
Dance of the Hours ..... Ponchielli
Selection from "Thais" ..... Massenet
By the Waters of Minnetonka Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Philemon and Baucis" Gounod

WEDNESDAY

March from "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

Monitor May 18

Tonight at the Pops

WELLESLEY COLLEGE NIGHT

"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ..... Strauss
Overture to "William Tell" .. Rossini
Songs by Wellesley Glee Club
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann" ..... Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Wellesley Fantasy .. H. C. Macdougall
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
"Whispering of the Flowers" .. Blon
Second Regiment Connecticut. Reeves

Pittsfield May 18

Third Week of the Pops

Tomorrow night in Symphony Hall the Pop concerts will enter upon their third week. Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 Symphony players will perform nightly for the pleasure of those who sit at the tables and in the balconies and let the music become the basis of their sociable evening. So rich in variety and popularity is the Pops' repertoire that the 70-odd numbers announced for the week leave no musical stratum untouched nor fail to find the most delightful in each.

From each of these programs a few characteristic numbers may be mentioned. Monday, "The Blue Danube Waltz," Schubert's "Ave Maria," "William Tell" Overture, "Afro-American Suite." Tuesday, selections from "Manon Lescaut" and "Thais," Second "L'Arlesienne Suite" and "Dance of the Hours." Wednesday, "Marche Slave," "Espana Rhapsody," selections from "L'Oracolo" and "Madame Butterfly," and an organ solo. Thursday, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," selections from Act III of "The Mastersingers," Dvorak's "Largo." Friday, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," "1812 Overture," "Elli, Elli" and "Rigoletto" Fantasy. Saturday, "Freischutz" Overture, "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" by Liszt, Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody."

The second Sunday evening Pop concert will take place one week from today with a program of overtures and selections from the operas of different Nations. Besides the operas more familiar at the Pops there will be represented "Hansel and Gretel," "L'Amico Fritz," "Othello" and "The Love of the Three Kings."

Monitor May 19

Tonight at the Pops

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Norwegian Melodies ..... Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ... Massenet
Ave Maria (Solo violin) Schubert-Wilhelmj
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Afro-American Folk Songs Arranged by Jacchia
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ... Sousa

THIRD POPS WEEK TO OPEN TOMORROW

Tomorrow night, in Symphony Hall, the Pop Concerts will enter their third week. Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of eighty symphony players will perform nightly for the pleasure of those who sit at the tables and in the balconies and let the music become the basis of their sociable evening. So rich in variety is the Pops' repertoire that the seventy odd numbers announced for the week leave no musical field untouched.

The second Sunday evening Pop concert will take place a week from tonight, with a program of overtures and other selections from the operas of different nations, including "Hansel and Gretel," "L'Amico Fritz," "Othello" and "Love of the Three Kings."

"Reve Angelique" ..... Rubinstein
"Elli, Elli" ..... Jacchia
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Organ solo, Albert Smith
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Boston City Club Glee Club
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" ... Puccini
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Coronation March, from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture "The Roman Carnival" .. Berlioz
Waltz, "Miners' Light" ..... Zeller
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers" (Act III) ..... Wagner
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Gipsy Dance, from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

FRIDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Zampa" ..... Herold
Love's Dream After the Ball .... Czibulka
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Carnival in Paris ..... Svendsen
"Elli, Elli" ..... Arr. by Jacchia
Twilight on the Water ..... Rollins
Overture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Sixth Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

SATURDAY

Cortege from "Mlada" .. Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Der Freischtz" ..... Weber
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Andante Cantabile ..... Tchaikowsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
American Military Fantasy ..... Rollinson
Whispering of the Flowers ..... Blon
Slavonic Dance No. 3 ..... Dvorak

SUNDAY—Operatic Program

The Barber of Seville Overture .... Rossini
Eugen Onegil, Waltz ..... Tchaikovsky
Haensel and Gretel, Dream Music ... Humperdinck
Samson and Delilah, Dance ... Saint-Saens
L'Amore Dei Tre Re, Fantasia ..... Montemezzi
Othello, Tempest Scene ..... Verdi
L'Amico Fritz, Intermezzo ..... Mascagni
Thais, Meditation ..... Massenet
Carmen, Suite ..... Bizet
Tannhaeuser, Overture ..... Wagner

Trans May 19

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's City Club

Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Norwegian Melodies ..... Grieg
Aragonaise from "The Cid" ... Massenet
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Afro-American Folk Songs ..... Jacchia
Waltz, "Espafia" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever" Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Boston

Last week in Paris Albert Spalding, as soloist with the Paris Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first performance in the French capital of Respighi's new Gregorian Concerto. It is possible that we of Boston may hear the piece next season, with the same conductor and the same soloist, from our own Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

Jel May 16

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed by the Pops Symphony orchestra under Agide Jacchia in Symphony hall tonight.

Entrance of the Boyards, Halvorsen; Overture "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Strauss; Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; Suite, "L'Arlesienne No, 2," Bizet; Indian Lament, Dvorak; Tarantelle, Jacchia; Dance of the Hours, Ponchielli; Selection from "Thais," Massenet; By the Waters of Minnetonka, Lieurance-Jacchia; Bacchanale, "Pallemon and Baucis," Gounod.

Monitor May 20

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Boyards..Halvorsen
Overture, "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"..Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 2.....Bizet
Indian Lament .....Dvorák
Tarantelle .....Jacchia
Dance of the Hours .....Ponchielli
Selection from "Thais".....Massenet
"By the Waters of Minnetonka"
Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Philemon and Baucis"
Gounod

Globe May 20

Third Week of "Pops" in Symphony Hall

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall began the third week of the 39th season last night. Agide Jacchia and his orchestra of 80 players provide each night programs replete with variety and interest for the benefit of those who gather about the tables which cover the floor, or take their music without refreshment in the balconies. Next Sunday's concert will have an operatic program.

Tonight's program follows: "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Strauss; Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 2," Bizet; "Indian Lament," Dvorak; Tarantelle, Jacchia; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchelli; selection from "Thais," Massenet; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance-Jacchia, and Bacchanale, "Philemon and Baucis," Gounod.

Am May 20

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

The following program will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Entrance of Boyard ..... Halvorsen
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" .....Suppe
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" .....Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
Indian Lament ..... Dvorak
Tarantelle ..... Jacchia
Dance of the Hours ..... Ponchielli
Selection, "This" ..... Massenet
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Philomon ad Baucis" Gounod

AMUSEMENTS

Journ May 20

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "Poet and Peasant"...Suppé
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"
J. Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"....Puccini
Second Suite from the Music to "L'Arlesienne" .....Bizet
Indian Lament .....Dvorák
Tarantella .....Jacchia
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection from "Thais".....Massenet
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Philemon and Baucis" .....Gounod

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Post May 20

POPS TONIGHT

The following programme will be performed by the Pops Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia in Symphony Hall tonight.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"....Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 2".....Bizet
Indian Lament .....Dvorak
Tarantelle .....Jacchia
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection from "Thais".....Massenet
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Philemon and Baucis"..Gounod

Jd May 21

POP CONCERT

The Pop Concert in Symphony hall tonight at which members of the Boston City club will be present in numbers, will have the following program.

March from Tannhauser, Wagner; "Reve Angelique" Rubinstein; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; Fantasia, "L'Oracolo," Leoni; Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin," Wagner; Organ Solo, Albert Snow; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabriar; Boston City Club Glee Club; Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; Waltz, "La Barcarole," Waldteufel; Marche Slave, Tschaikovsky.

Journ May 21

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Boston City Club

March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Angel-Dream .....Rubinstein
Eili, Eili.
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Procession to the Cathedral from
"Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Organ Solo.
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier
Songs and Choruses.
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"..Puccini
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"....Waldteufel
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A Jacchia.
Assisting:
Albert Snow City Club Glee Club

Monitor May 21

Tonight at the Pops

March from "Tannhäuser"...Wagner
"Rêve Angélique".....Rubinstein
"Eili, Eili"
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Procession to the Cathedral, from
"Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Organ Solo .....Albert Snow
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrier
Boston City Club Glee Club
Fantasia, "Madam Butterfly".Puccini
Waltz, "La Barcarole"...Waldteufel
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky

Globe May 21

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed by the Pops Symphony orchestra under Agide Jacchia in Symphony hall tonight.

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song"..Strauss
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 2".....Bizet
Indian Lament.....Dvorak
Tarantelle .....Jacchia
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection from "Thais".....Massenet
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Philemon and Baucis"
Gounod

Globe May 21

POPS TONIGHT

Mr. Koussevitzky's program of his second concert in Paris, May 15, was as follows: Schubert, fifth symphony; Schmitt, Tragique Chevauchee; Malipiero, Impressioni dal Vero; Respighi, violin concerto (Mr. Spalding, violinist); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy.

Her May 22

POPS CONCERT TONIGHT

Tonight will be the annual Roxbury Latin school night at the Pops in Symphony hall. However, this concert, like all others, will be open to the public. The program follows:

Coronation March, from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"..Berlioz
Waltz, "Miners' Lights".....Zelle
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana".Mascagni
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers" (Act III).....Wagner
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Gipsy Dance, from "Carmen".....Bizet
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Selection, "Stepping Stones".....Kern
Kammenoi Ostrow.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Zampa".....Herold
"Love's Dream After the Ball" Czibulka
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
Carnival in Paris .....Svendsen
"Eili, Eili" .....Arranged by Jacchia
"Twilight on the Water".....Rollins
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" .....Delibes
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" .....Vollstedt
Sixth Hungarian Dance .....Brahms

From May 23

At the Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Zampa".....Herold
Love's Dream After the Ball..Czibulka
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen
Eili, Eili.....Hebrew Melody
Twilight on the Water.....Rollins
Overture, "1812".....Chaikovsky
Two Dances from the Ballet, "Sylvia" Delibes
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows".....Vollstedt
Sixth Hungarian Dance.....Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Her May 24

TONIGHT'S POPS

At the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, Agide Jacchia and his orchestra will offer the following program:

Cortege from "Mlada".....Rimsky-Korsakow
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Andante Cantabile.....Tschaikowsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
American Military Fantasy.....Rollinson
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Slavonic Dance No. 3.....Dvorak

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Monteux takes leave of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's concerts. The writer, as readers of the Globe's Symphony reviews will not need to be told, has not been a fervent admirer of his conducting. Yet his modesty, sincerity, well-schooled musicianship and ingratiating personality have made him popular as a person even with those who dislike his conducting of many great classics. Boston owes him a real and great debt for the patient skill with which he has restored an orchestra twice woefully shattered to something approaching its pre-war glories. His term of office has not been without great vicissitudes. No other conductor has ever had so many difficult situations to meet as Monteux. He has come through with an honorable degree of success and a large share of public and private regard. There have been numerous achievements in the performance of certain works, Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," Strauss' "Till," Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade" among them. At his best Monteux is a really great conductor. His future plans are not yet announced, but one doubts whether in all Boston there is a man who bears him real ill will so that he does not join in wishing Monteux good fortune whatever he may undertake.

POPS TONIGHT

The Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Boston City Club will be present in numbers, will have the following program:

March from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
"Reve Angelique".....Rubinstein
"Eili, Eili".....Arr. by Jacchia
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo".....Leoni
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Organ Solo.....Albert Snow
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier
Boston City Club Glee Club.
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky

CITY CLUB AT POPS.

This is Boston City Club night at the Pops. The program follows:

March, "Tannhaeuser" .....Wagner
"Reve Angelique" .....Rubinstein
"Eili, Eili" .....Arr. by Jacchia
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .....Leoni
Procession, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Organ Solo, Albert Snow.
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
City Club Glee Club.
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .....Puccini
Waltz, "La Barcarole" .....Waldteufel
Marche Slave .....Tschaikovsky

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight will be Harvard night at the Pops. The program follows:

Triumphal March, "Aida".....Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Songs, Harvard Glee Club
Scenes Pittoresques.....Massenet
Prelude (conducted by the composer) Walter Piston, '24
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Lezt
Songs. Harvard Glee Club
Overture, "1812" .....Tschaikovsky

POPS CONCERT

Tonight will be the annual Harvard night at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall. The program follows:

Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Dr Archibald T. Davison, Conductor.
Scenes Pittoresque.....Massenet
Prelude .....Walter Piston, '24
(Conducttd by Composer)
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "Madeleine".....Waldteufel
March, "Verita" .....Densmore

Amer May 22

SEASON OF POPS OPENS TONIGHT

When the season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall opens tonight, Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra of eighty symphony players will present the following program:

Hungarian March—"Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Waltz—"Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
Fantasia—"Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounov
Burlesca ..... Scarlatti-Jacchia
Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikovsky
Selection—"Wildflower," Youmans-Stothart
Ave Maria ..... Sschubert-Wilhelmj
Slavonic Dance No. 1.....Dvorak

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

When the season of Pop Concerts in Symphony hall opens tonight Agide Jacchia and the Pops orchestra of 80 symphony players will present the following program:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Waltz, "Tres Jolie," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Sampson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Oriental Rhapsody, Glasounov; Burlesca, Scarlatti-Jacchia; Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Marche Slave, Tschaikovsky; Selection, "Wildflower," Youmans-Stothart; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Slavonic Dance No. 1, Dvorak.

Post May 6

POP PROGRAMME

The following programme will be played at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, at which Simmons College will be particularly represented.

March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Strube
Overture, "Maximilian Robespierre"...Litolff
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Simmons Songs
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo from the "New World" Symphony Dvorak
Volga Bargemen's Song..Arranged by Jacchia
Rustic Dance, "Snow Maiden" Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Stepping Stones".....Kern
Invitation to the Dance .....Weber-Berlioz
American Patrol .....Meacham

American May 6

3000 ATTEND OPENING OF 'THE POPS'

Conductor Jacchia Given Ovation at Concert in Symphony Hall

Boston's unique entertainment, "The Pops," opened in Symphony hall for the thirty-ninth season to to a standing-room-only audience. It was estimated that 3,000 music lovers listened to the first program. That they thoroughly enjoyed themselves was clearly attested by the extended applause, which was stilled only after numerous encores had been added.

Although "The Pops" have been popless since the national prohibition amendment went into effect, they seem to be more popular than ever—clear proof that Bostonians do like good music, and that it was not the flowing bowl that attracted those who wended their way to this temple of music.

ENJOYED BY THOUSANDS.

Considering the low prices charged there probably is not a finer entertainment to be had anywhere in the country, in fact, an average evening at "The Pops" is far more enjoyable to thousands of regular patrons than many higher-priced offerings.

Persons were noted in the opening night audience who have been attending "The Pops" regularly once or twice a week for the past twenty or more years. What more could be said as to the popularity of an entertainment?

Agide Jacchia conducted the orchestra in fine manner. He was as "peppy" as ever, although there was no affectation or bombast to his leadership. The musicians played as though they really enjoyed having him wield the baton.

OVATION FOR CONDUCTOR.

Mr. Jacchia is a favorite with Boston audiences, getting a fine "hand" when he stepped to the front of the stage for the first number. Several of his own arrangements of various composers' works were given as encores and generously applauded.

"The Pops" are to continue for sixty nights, including programs every other Sunday evening. There will be many special nights for various fraternal organizations, colleges, etc. The first of these will be tonight when Simmons College students and graduates will hold forth there. Thursday will be "Wellesley College Night." A record season is looked forward to by management.

Adv May 6

CROWD ENJOYS POPS OPENING

A house crowded to standing room limits and warmth of applause which called for no less than six extra numbers were Boston's welcome to Agide Jacchia and 80 members of the Symphony Orchestra on the opening night of the 39th Pop Concert season at Symphony Hall.

Agide Jacchia

Mr. Jacchia for his initial program presented eleven numbers, most of them of interest, and all orchestrated and executed in a manner which assured the large audience that the coming Pops season will in no wise undo the reputation of former years. Several of the numbers were of Mr. Jacchia's arrangement.

The fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"; Glazounov's "Oriental Rhapsody"; Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slav" and the "Tristan and Isolde" Liebestod were particularly applauded. So was the Lohengrin prelude, given as an encore.

Selections from "Wildflower," musical comedy success, gave a popular tinge to the latter portion of the program.

Globe May 6

FIRST POP CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The 39th season of the Pops opened last evening in Symphony Hall. The capacity audience was manifestly enthusiastic at the performance of the music which Agide Jacchia, conductor, had set upon his program for the first concert and would not be satisfied until six encores had been played.

The orchestra for the present season numbers, by rough guess, about 80 pieces, the usual number. The front of the hall is lavishly decorated with flowers. The waitresses are again attired in their attractive grey and red uniforms. The programs, as announced in advance, betoken no great deviation from those of former years. In fact, an observer who had been absent from this country for a decade might detect but one difference between the Pops of today and that of his time, a difference of mood.

Prior to the advent of prohibition the pops depended for its success largely upon the spirit of sociability engendered, a spirit impossible in the regular symphony year. With the enactment of the law there were many who predicted the speedy demise of this series of concerts, despite the fact that it had become an institution. Like so many prophets they were wrong and today the Pops flourish even more than ever, and by all indications of last evening will surpass in the current season the attendance record set last year.

The only difference between the present and the past is, as has been remarked, one of mood. Sociability is no longer the word which may typify the audience, but rather attentiveness. There were many times last evening when a casually drawn cork, a match struck too audibly, even a loudly munched pretzel occasioned admonishing glances from the nearby tables. Assuredly the music is the thing today and to this extent the Pops have now become different from the European beer garden of which they still remain the foremost American counterpart.

Fittingly then the programs become more serious and more musical. There still remains music to suit every palate, popular miscellany of Schubert and Brahms, the Viennese waltz, the occasional excerpt from current light opera or musical comedy. But there also come more frequently to the program selections from the better of the operas and even movements from popular symphonies. Thus it was that the "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" was listened to in the deepest quiet and was applauded with the greatest fervor. Thus, too, that the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" met with equal favor.

Of all the other numbers the beautiful "Ave Marie," by Schubert, with the violin solo played melodiously by Mr Theodorowicz, drew the heartiest applause. The only answer was a repetition of part, omitting alas the solo part in the repetition. But all the other parts of the program were cordially received and the whole betokened an extremely successful season for one of Boston's finest institutions.

Her May 6

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight there will be graduates and undergraduates of Wellesley College, although the evening will be in every way public. The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Songs.....By Wellesley Glee Club
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann" .....Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Wellesley Fantasy.....H. C. Macdougall
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
Second Regiment Connecticut.....Reeves

Journ May 6

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Wellesley College

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....J. Strauss
Overture to "William Tell"....Rossini
Songs by Wellesley Glee Club
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" .....Offenbach
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Wellesley Fantasy.....Macdougall
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Whispering of the Flowers.....Blon
March, Second Connecticut.....Reeves

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Adv May 9

POP CONCERT TONIGHT MAINE DAUGHTERS AT

At the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight there will be a large attendance of members of the Massachusetts-Maine Daughters, headed by the president of the society, Mrs. Irving O. Palmer. Agide Jacchia will offer the following program:

March, "Tannhauser" .....Wagner
Overture, "Mignon" .....Thomas
Old Slave Song (saxaphone solo, A. Laus)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" .....Leoni
Hungarian Rhapsody .....Lisst
Meditation, "Thajs" .....Massenet
Waltz in A minor.....Grieg-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun.....Mascagni
Ballet Suite—"Nutcracker"....Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Cortege, "Queen of Sheba".....Gouno

Jd May 7

POPS TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight there will be grads and undergrads of Wellesley college, although the evening will be in every way public. The program follows:

"With Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; songs by Wellesley Glee club; first Hungarian Rhapsody, Lisst; "Barcarole" from "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach; "Procession to the Cathedral," from "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Wellesley Fantasy," H. C. Macdougall; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Second Regiment, Connecticut," Reeves.

Meridian Record May 8

BOSTON'S "POPS" CONCERTS AGAIN DELIGHT MUSIC LOVERS

The thirty-ninth season of Boston's famous "Pops" Concerts began in Symphony hall, Boston, Monday night and will continue regularly every evening for a number of weeks. Agide Jacchia conducts the orchestra with an impelling hand for rhythm, swing, and beat, driving through the swifter parts of some fantasia or laying down the tonal foundation for one great Wagnerian burst of sound.

The concerts will include the more popular things of Berlioz, Mozart, Waldteufel, Saint-Saens, Glazounov, Wagner, Chaikovsky, and Dvorak. The Glazounov "Oriental Rhapsody," given Monday night, deserves special mention, as does the Grieg Waltz, arranged by Mr. Jacchai. The programs are changed nightly.

Herald

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, at which there will be numerous members of the Massachusetts-Maine Daughters.

March, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Old Slave Song (Saxaphone Solo, A. Laus)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Meditation, from "Thais" ..... Massene
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacch
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ..... Masca
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaik
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Wal
Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".

Monitor May 10

Tonight at the Pops

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
"Macushla" ... MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Pirouette ..... Glazounoff
(Flute solo, Pasquale Amerena)
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Finale, Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky
Egyptian Ballet ..... Luigini
Waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Sunday Evening
RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Entrance of Antony, "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds, "Snegourotchka," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Eight Russian Popular Melodies, Liadoff
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounoff
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Hebrew Dance ..... Karganoff
Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

Monitor May 9

Tonight at the Pops

March, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Old Slave Song:
(Saxaphone solo, A. Laus)
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
Meditation, from "Thais" .. Massenet
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "The Skaters" .... Waldteufel
Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod

Ind May 9

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of the Daughters of Maine

March from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Solo for Saxophone, "Old Slave Song"
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo" ..... Leoni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Meditation from "Thais" ..... Massenet
Waltz in A-minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" .. Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" .. Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: A. Laus

Ind May 9.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra will present the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which there will be numerous members of the Massachusetts-Maine Daughters.

March, "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Old Slave Song (Saxaphone Solo, A. Laus); Fantasia, "L'Orocolo," Leoni; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Meditation, from "Thais," Massenet; Waltz in A Minor, Grieg-Jacchia; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Waldteufel; Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod.

Adv May 10

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be played at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Prelude, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Macushla ..... MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Pirouette (solo,), "Amerena" ..... Glazounov
Intermezzo ..... Mascagni
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet ..... Luigini
Waltz, "Roses from South" ..... Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

I saw this May 10

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

A Week of Too Familiar Pieces in Prospect—Occasional Variation and Diversion—Russians for Sunday

HAVING pleasured the public of The Pops with sundry new pieces during the first week of the current series, Mr. Jacchia now returns with a vengeance to the "old-established favorites," otherwise, as the spokesman of Symphony Hall terms them, the "imperishables." There they all are up and down the programmes for next week: "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812"; "Finlandia"; "Deep Rver"; "Pomp and Circumstance"; the Overture to "Rienzi"; the dances from "Sylvia"; "Dubinushka"; the Finale from "Scheherazade"; "Slavic March"; the Suite from "Peer Gynt." More: some of these pieces will be played twice in a single week. Sunday evening aside, the only freshening numbers are a Fantasia from Verdi's full-voiced and stately opera, "Don Carlos" and a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's folk-opera, "Snow Maiden." For this relief much thanks. A little more will come in the singing of the Tufts College Glee Club on Monday and of the Harvard Freshman Glee Club on Tuesday—the two "college nights" of the week.

Tomorrow evening, The Pops renew their alternate "Sunday Sessions" at which the listener may neither eat nor drink nor smoke in the concert-room. The law—and its functionaries—so ordain; while their subjects—management and audience—bow in submission. As last year, these Sundays bring a different and coördinated programme. This time, it is labelled Russian and stands:

Entrance of Antony from "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds from "Snégourotchka" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Eight Russian Popular Melodies ..... Liadov
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazunov
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Hebrew Dance ..... Karganov
Procession of the Sardar ..... Ippolitov-Ivanov

Ivan May 10

At the Pops Tonight

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Macushla ..... MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Solo for Flute, "Pirouette" ... Glasunov
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Finale from Fourth Symphony Chaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet ..... Luigini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" J. Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: P. Amerena

Ivan May 10

POPS PROGRAMS

The following programs will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Macushla, MacMorough-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; Pirouette (flute solo, Pasquale Amerena), Glazounov; Intermezzo from Cavelleria Rusticana, Mascagni; Finale, Fourth Symphony, Tshaikovsky; Egyptian Ballet, Luigini; Waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss; Fifth Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

The first Sunday Pop concert of the season and the first special program will take place tomorrow evening. The following Russian program will be presented:

Entrance of Antony, "A Night in Egypt," Arensky; Dance of the Birds, "Snegourotchka," Rimsky-Korsakov; Eight Russian Popular Melodies, Liadov; Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikovsky; Oriental Rhapsody, Glazounov; The Lark, Glinka-Jacchia; Dances, "Prince Igor," Borodin; Hebrew Dance, Karganov; Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov Ivanov.

Herald May 10

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Macushla ..... MacMorough-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Pirouette (flute solo, Pasquale Amerena) Glazounov
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Finale, Fourth Symphony ... Tschaikovsky
Egyptian Ballet ..... Luigini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" .... Strauss
Fifth Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Herald May 11

POPS IN SECOND WEEK

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will open the second week of the 39th season tonight with the first Sunday concert of the season and a Russian program. The first six nights proved the Pops to be a feast of music light in quality, exquisite in performance. Several of Mr. Jacchia's new numbers have taken undisputed place in popularity beside the "imperishables." Refreshments in astounding quantities have been consumed at the floor tables and at the Pops "Bar" and "Cafe." The programs of the week follow:

TONIGHT
Russian Program
Entrance of Antony, "A Night in Egypt" ..... Arensky
Dance of the Birds, "Snegourotchka" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Eight Russian Popular Melodies ... Liadov
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
Oriental Rhapsody ..... Glazounov
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Hebrew Dance ..... Karganov
Procession of the Sardar .. Ippolitov-Ivanov

MONDAY
Coronation March, from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Tufts Songs.
Finlander ..... Sibelius
Bacchanale, from "Tannhaeuser" Wagner
Lilt from "College Life" .... L. R. Lewis
Tufts Songs
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia" ..... Delibes
Waltz, "The Sirens" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa

TUESDAY
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Overture to "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee Club
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glees Club
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
"Up the Street" ..... Morse

WEDNESDAY
Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" ..... Tchaikovsky
Old Slave Song (Saxophone Solo), Gaines-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Finlandia ..... Sibelius
Pirouette ..... Glazounov
By Moonlight ..... Bendel-Jacchia
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Suite from "Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korsakov
Machushla (Orch. by A. Jacchia) MacMorrough
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz

THURSDAY
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," ..... Suppe
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ..... Strauss
Furiana from "La Gioconda" .. Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" .... Glazounov
Romance ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Selection, "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa

FRIDAY
Miltary March ..... Schubert
Overture to "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
Whirling Dervishes ..... Godowsky
Fantasia, "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Liebesfreud ..... Kreisler
Dubinushka ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais" .. Waldteufel
Russian Dance ..... Tchaikovsky

SATURDAY
Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Orientale ..... Cui-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Greig
Spanish Serenade ..... Glazounov
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Hussars ..... Spindle

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be played at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Orientale ..... Cui-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens
Suite, PeerGynt" ..... Grieg
Spanish Serenade ..... Glazounov
Valse Triste ..... Sibellus
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Marche Slave ..... Tachaikovsky
En Sourdine ..... Tellam
Charge of the Hussars ..... Spindle

Second Week of the Pops

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will open the second week of their 39th season tonight with the first Sunday concert of the season and a Russian program. Several of Agide Jacchia's new numbers have already taken undisputed places in popularity beside the "imperishable." Refreshments in astounding quantities have been consumed at the floor tables and at the Pops "bar" and "cafe."

From the program for the coming week the following features may be mentioned almost at random. At tonight's concert—selection from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Maiden," the "1812 Overture," Glazounov's "Oriental Rhapsody" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor." For tomorrow "Pagliacci" Fantasia, "Finlandia" and the "Tannhauser Bacchanale." The feature on Tuesday will be songs by the Harvard Freshman Glee Club, "Saint-Saens," "Danse Macabre," "Ride of the Valkyries," etc. Wednesday will bring Rossini's "Barber of Seville" overture, "Finlandia," "Tannhauser" overture and "Machushla" for trumpet solo. Of Thursday's numbers there may be mentioned selections from Mascagni's "Iris" and "The Tales of Hoffmann," by Offenbach, also the "Rienzi" overture and suite from "Sylvia." From the Friday program—"Whirling Dervishes," "Don Carlos" and "Cavalleria Rusticanna" fantasies, prelude to "Lohengrin" and finale of "Scheherazade." On Saturday's program will be the "Samson and Delilah" fantasia, "Peer Gynt" suite, "Tannhauser" overture, "Marche Slave" and other features.

POP CONCERT

In Symphoy Hall tonight, Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, will present the following program. Tuft's College to be represented.

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; Fantasia, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Songs: Finlandia, Sibellius; Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Wagner; Lilt from Suite "College Life" (new), L. R. Lewis '87; Songs: Ballet Suite, "Copella," Delibes, a. Valse, b. Czardas; Waltn, "The Sirens," Waldteufel; March, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa.

TONIGHT'S POPS

In Symphony hall tonight, Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, will present the following program. Tuft's college will be represented.

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Songs:
Finlandia ..... Sibellius
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Lilt from Suite "College Life" (new) L. R. Lewis '87
Songs:
Ballet Suite, "Copella" ..... Delibes
(a) Valse (b) Czardas
Waltz, "The Sirens" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa

POP PROGRAMS

At the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, Agide Jacchia will perform the following program:

Cortege from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakov; overture to "Der Freischutz, Weber; waltz, "The Skaters," Waldteufel; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Irish, rhapsody, Herbert; introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Andante Cantabile, Tschaikovsky; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; American Military fantasy, Rollinson; whispering of the Flowers, Blon; Slavonic dance No. 3, Dvorak.

The second Sunday evening concert of the Pop season in Symphony hall tomorrow night will consist entirely of operatic excerpts. The program follows:

The Barber of Seville overture, Roasini; Eugen Onegin, waltz, Tschaikovsky; Hansel and Gretel, dream music, Hamperdinck; Samson and Delilah, dance, Saint-Saens; L'Amore Dei Tre Re, fantasia, Montemezzi; Othello, tempest scene, Verdi; L'Amico Fritz, intermezzo, Mascagni; Thais, meditation, Massenet; Carmen, suite, Bizet; Thannhauser, overture, Wagner.

Journal May 12

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Tufts College

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppé
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Tufts Songs
Tone Poem, "Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" .Wagner
Lilt from the Suite, "College Life" Lewis
Tufts Songs
Waltz and Czardas from "Coppélia" Delibes
Waltz, "The Sirens" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Mr. Koussevitzky began last Thursday at the Opéra the four concerts in which he s taking leave of his Parisian public. At he third on May 22, he will produce Strainsky's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with the composer playing the solo part—the piece in which he will also be heard at the Symphony Concerts in Boston next January. At another of the concerts in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Spalding will play Respighi's new "Gregorian Concerto," for Violin and Orchestra, likewise destined for Boston next season.

Resident Czechs are mildly and reasonably wondering why Symphony Hall has paid no heed to the centenary of Smetana, their national composer, commemorated this spring up and down Europe. Too late, Mr. Monteux tried to find room for one of Smetana's pieces at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Jacchia, however, might easily slip into The Pops the overture to "The Bartered Bride" and the tone-poem, "The Moldau," both in the active repertory of the orchestra. With a little preparation, he might add to them the most gorgeous of all polkas—otherwise the tone-poem, "From Bohemia's Woods and Meadows." It has not been played in Boston since Dr. Muck's day.

Monitor May 12

Tonight at the Pops

TUFTS COLLEGE NIGHT

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Light Cavalry" .... Suppé
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
Songs
"Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Wagner
Lilt from Suite "College Life" (new) L. R. Lewis '87
Songs
Ballet Suite, "Coppella," (a) Valse; (b) Czardas .... Delibes
Waltz, "The Sirens" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Semper Fidelis" ..... Sousa

HARVARD FRESHMEN AT POPS

Tonight will be Harvard Freshman Night at the Pops in Symphony Hall, but the concert is open to the public and of general public interest. The programme follows:

1. "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
2. Overture to "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
3. Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
4. Songs by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
5. "Dance Macabre" ..... Saint-Saens
6. "Deep River" ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
7. "Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner
8. Song by Harvard Freshman Glee Club
9. Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
10. Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
11. "Up the Street" ..... Morse

HARVARD MEN AT POPS

Tonight will be Harvard freshman night at the Pops. The concert is open to the public. The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Overture, "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Songs by Freshmen Glee Club.
Dance Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Song by Freshmen Glee Club.
Selection, "Stepping Stones" ..... Kern
Waltz, "La Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
"Up the Street" ..... Morse

Tonight at the Pops

"Pomp and Circumstance"....Elgar
Overture to "Pique-Dame"....Suppé
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee Club
Danse Macabre .....Saint-Saëns
"Deep River" .....Burleigh-Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee Club
Selection, "Stepping Stones"....Kern
Waltz, "La Barcarole"...Waldteufel
"Up the Street".....Morse

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

This will be Roxbury Latin night at the Pops: The program follows:

Coronation March .....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Waltz, "Miners' Lights" .....Zellez
Fantasia, "Cavalleria" .....Mascagni
Excerpts, "Mastersingers" .....Wagner
Largo, "New World" Symphony....Dvorak
Gipsy Dance "Carmen" .....Bizet
Pomp and Circumstance .....Elgar
Selection, "Stepping Stones" .....Kern
Kammenoi Ostrow .....Rubenstein
Waltz, "Blue Danube" .....Strauss

HARVARD MEN AT POPS

Tonight will be Harvard Freshman night at the Pops in Symphony hall but the concert is open to the public and of general public interest. The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Overture to "Pique Dame," Suppe; Fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; songs by Harvard Freshmen Glee club; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Deep River, Burleigh-Jacchia; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; song by Harvard Freshmen Glee club; selection, "Stepping Stones," Kern; waltz, "La Barcarole," Waldteufel; "Up the Street," Morse.

DURANT NIGHT AT POPS

Durant members will celebrate at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville'.....Rossini
Waltz, "Dornroeschen" .....Tschaikovsky
Old Slave Song .....Gaines-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".Saint-Saens
"Finlandia" .....Sibelius
"Pirouette" .....Glazounov
"By Moonlight" .....Bendel-Jacchia
Overture, "Tannhauser" .....Wagner
Suite, "Snow Maiden" ...Rimsky-Karsakov
"Macushla" .....MacMurrough-Jacchia
March, "Rakoczy" .....Berlioz

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following program at the Pop Concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss; Furiana from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Fantasia, "Iris," Mascagni; Ballet Suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Spanish Dance, "Panaderos," Glazounov; Romarce, Rimsky-Korsakov; Overture to "Rienzi" Wagner; Selection, "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; Deep River, Burleigh-Jacchia; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea".Suppe
Waltz "1001 Nights".....Strauss
Furiana from "La Gioconda....Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Iris".....Mascagni
Ballet suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Spanish dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Romance .....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Selection "The Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
"Stars and Stripes forever".....Sousa

At the Pops Tonight

Military March .....Schubert
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Whirling Dervishes .....Godowsky
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Liebesfreud .....Kreisler
Dubinushka .....Russian Folk-Song
Finale of "Scheherazade".....
Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..
Mascagni
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais".....
Waldteufel
Russian Dance .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

POPS TONIGHT

The Pops Symphony orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of the Portia law school will be present:

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Whirling Dervishes.....Godowsky
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Liebesfreud .....Kreisler
Dubinushka.....Arr. by Jacchia
Finale of "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakov
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"....Mascagni
Waltz, "Toujours ou Jamais".....Waldteufel
Russian Dance.....Tschaikovsky

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will conduct the following program in Symphony hall Symphony orchestra.

Entrance of the Gladiators, Fucik; Overture to "Zampa," Herold; Love's Dream After the Ball, Cilibulka; Fantasia, "Rigoletto," Verdi; Carnical in Paris, Svendsen; "Elli, Elli," Arranged by Jacchia; Twilight on the Water, Rollins; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikovsky; Ballet Suits, "Sylvia," Vollstedt; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

At the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight Agide Jacchia will present this program:

Cortege, Mlada .....Rismky-Korsakov
Overture, "Der Freischut" .....Weber
Waltz, "The Skaters" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Boheme" .....Puccini
Irish Rhapsody .....Herbert
Introduction, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Andante Cantabile .....Tschaikovsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
American Military Fantasy .....Rollinson
Whispering Flowers .....Bion
Slavonic Dance, No. 3 .....Dvorak

Fourth Week of Pops

The pop concerts in Symphony Hall are now entering their fourth week. Rich musical fare is promised by Agide Jachia and his full-sized Symphony Orchestra. There will be other specialties to make the various nights eventful. Tonight will bring the second Sunday pop concert of the season, with an operatic program, including selections from such operas as "The Barber of Seville," "Hansel and Gretel," "Love of the Three Kings," "Othello," "Tannhauser," etc.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard night, with two groups of songs by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald T. Davison, conductor. From Tuesday's program there may be mentioned the "Oberon Overture," "Meistersinger," Prelude, Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody and organ solo. From Wednesday's program the "Holy Grail," music from "Parsifal," trumpet solo, Mascagni's hymn to the Sun, "Espana," rhapsody, etc. From the program of Thursday, the finale of "Scheherazade," "Lohengrin," Fantasia, "Elli, Elli," "Bacchanale" from "Samson and Dalilah," "Marche Slave," etc.

Memorial Day, on Friday, will bring a special holiday program, with Hadley's "Cachuca," Finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, "William Tell" Overture, and Dunham's "March of the Doughboys," along with other numbers. Saturday, May 31, the middle group will consist of selections from the operettas of Sir Arthur Sullivan, together with his "Lost Chord," to be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the oldest member of the orchestra, who was the principal conductor of these operettas when in the last century they were the rage of the hour.

Special Feature Planned at Coming "Pops"

Special features will be added to the programs of the coming week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. On Monday, which is the annual Harvard Night, the Harvard Glee Club, under A. T. Davison, will sing On Memorial Day, next Friday, there will be several numbers by American composers and on Saturday, the middle group will be devoted to the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan, to be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the orchestra, who many years ago was the most prominent conductor of these operettas, when they were first performed in America. The second of the Sunday concerts will be given tomorrow with the following program:

"The Barber of Seville," overture...Rossini
"Eugen Onegin," waltz .....Tchaikowsky
"Hansel and Gretel," dream music....
Humperdinck
"Samson and Delilah," Dance of the Priestesses .....Saint-Saens
"L'Amore Dei Tre Re," fantasia.Montemezzi
"Othello," tempest scene .....Verdi
"L'Amico Fritz," intermezzo.....Mascagni
"Thais," meditation, solo violin.....
Julius Theodorowicz
"Carmen," suite: (a) "Aaragonaise, (b) "Dragoons of Aalcala," (c) "Prelude" .....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Week-end Pops Programs

TONIGHT

Cortége from "Mlada"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "Der Freischütz"..Weber
Waltz, "The Skaters" ....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "La Bohème" .....Puccini
Irish Rhapsody .....Herbert
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"
Wagner
Andante Cantabile ....Tschaikowsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
American Military Fantasy .Rollinson
"Whispering of the Flowers"....Bion
Slavonic Dance No. 3.....Dvořák

SUNDAY EVENING

"The Barber of Seville" Overture
Rossini
"Eugen Onegin" Waltz
Tschaikowsky
"Hansel and Gretel" Dream Music
Humperdinck
"Samson and Delilah" Dance
Saint-Saëns
"L'Amore Dei Tre Rè" Fantasia
Montemezzi
"Othello" Tempest Scene .....Verdi
"L'Amico Fritz" Intermezzo
Mascagni
"Thais" Meditation .....Massenet
"Carmen" Suite .....Bizet
"Tannhäuser" Overture.....Wagner

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

Programmes and "Nights" Through the Week to Come—Music from Harvard—Mr. Mullaly as Guest-Conductor

INCIDENTS promise to be many at the Pop Concerts next week. For tomorrow, Sunday, evening, Mr. Jacchia sets his first "Operatic Programme," and upon it for relatively novel number is a Fantasia from Montemezzi's rich-voiced and full-freighted music-drama, "L' Amore dei Tre Re." Otherwise, the list traverses:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville"...Rossini
Waltz from "Eugen Onégin".....Chaikovsky
Dream-Music from "Hansel and Gretel"
Humperdinck
Dance from "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saëns
Tempest Scene from "Othello".....Verdi
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"....Mascagni
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Monday brings the annual "Harvard Night," with a programme diversified by six songs from the Harvard Glee Club led by Dr. Davison, and decked with a Prelude for Orchestra by Walter Piston, the conductor of the Pièrian Sodality at the university. Out of the list of pieces for Tuesday stand the overture to Weber's "Oberon" and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers." For Wednesday, Mr. Jacchia has discovered a relatively unhackneyed fragment of Wagner—pages of the "Grail Music" in "Parsifal." The programme for Thursday assembles "old favorites" with which the public of The Pops is ever unsated; while that of Friday—American holiday—finds room for four American composers, Alden, Herbert, Hadley and Dunham. Finally, on Saturday evening, Mr. John Mullaly, veteran violinist and conductor, emerges from retirement to conduct in four numbers from Sir Arthur Sullivan—three out of the operettas.

One Recital More

On Tuesday evening next in Steinert Hall, Mr. Willard Erhardt, tenor, will try his fortunes in public through a song recital. His programme begins with old airs of Purcell, Salvator Rosa and Carissimi; proceeds with songs of Schubert, Schumann and Wolf; ends with Irish [illegible] pieces and an American miscell[illegible]tude and

FEATURES AT THE POPS

Delightful music from Conductor Jacchia and the Symphony orchestra and other events of interest are promised for the fourth week of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall. The feature of the annual Harvard night tomorrow, will be the appearance of the Harvard Glee Club (Dr. Davison, conductor). Several American numbers will be performed on the program of Memorial day. On Saturday, the middle group will be given over to selections from Sullivan's operettas, conducted by J. C. Mullaly, the oldest living member of the orchestra, who was the principal conductor of these operettas when in the last century they were first performed in America.

SUNDAY, MAY 25

The Barber of Seville Overture ....Rossini
Eugen Onegin, Waltz.....Tchaikovsky
Haensel and Gretel, dream music,
Humperdinck
Samson and Delilah, Dance ..Saint-Saens
L'Amore Dei Tre Re, Fantasia.
Montemezzi
Othello, Tempest Scene .....Verdi
L'Amico Fritz, Intermezzo .....Mascagni
Thais, Meditation.....Massenet
Carmen, Suite .....Bizet
Tannhaeuser, Overture.....Wagner

MONDAY

Triumphal March, "Aida" .....Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi" .....Wagner
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Davison, Conductor.
Scenes Pittoresques .....Massenet
Prelude .....Walter Piston, '24
First Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Madeleine" .....Waldteufel
March, "Veritas" .....Densmore

TUESDAY

Coronation March, from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"..Wagner
Organ Solo.....Wilson T. Moog
Andante Cantabile.....Tchaikowsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
Intermezzo (Act III) "Jewels of the Madonna" .....Wolf-Ferrari
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

WEDNESDAY

Military Polonaise.....Chopin

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard College

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club.
Scènes Pittoresques .....Massenet
Prelude for Orchestra.Walter Piston, '24
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Numbers by Harvard Glee Club.
Overture, "1812" .....Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Madeleine" .....Waldteufel
March, "Veritas" .....Densmore

Conductors:
A. Jacchia. A. T. Davison. W. Piston.
Assisting: Harvard Glee Club.

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS

Tonight will be the annual Harvard night at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall. The program follows:

Triumphal march from "Aida," Verdi; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Fantasia, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Songs by Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison conductor; Scenes Pittoresques, Massenet; Prelude, Walter Piston, '24, conducted by the composer; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Songs by Harvard Glee club; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Waltz, "Madeline," Waldteufel; March "Veritas," Densmore.

POPS PROGRAM

The Pop concert at Symphony hall tonight will have the following program:

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Heyerbeer; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Wagner; Organ Solo, Prof. Wilson T. Moog; Andante Cantabile, Tchaikovsky; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Ballet Suite, "Coppelia," Delibes; Intermezzo (Act III), "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; March, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

Tonight at the Pops

Coronation March, from "The Prophet" .....Meyerbeer
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"
Wagner
Organ solo.....Prof. Wilson T. Moog
Andante Cantabile.....Tschaikowsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Ballet suite, "Coppélia".....Delibes
Intermezzo (Act III) "Jewels of the Madonna" .....Wolf-Ferrari
Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

POPS PROGRAM

The Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight will comprise the following program:

Coronation March from "The Prophet"..
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Organ Solo.
Prof. Wilson T. Moog.
Andante Cantabile.....Tchaikovsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
Intermezzo (Act III), "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
March ,"Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude to "The Mastersingers."Wagner
Organ Solo
Andante Cantabile.....Chaikovsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Ballet Suite, "Coppélia".....Delibes
Introduction to Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
March, "Pomp and Circumstance"
Elgar

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: William T. Moog

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Coronation March, "The Prophet".Meyerbeer
Overture, "Oberon" .....Weber
Waltz, "Espana" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Prelude, "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Organ solo .....Prof. Wilson T. Moog
Andante Cantabile .....Tschaikowsky
Sacred Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
Intermezzo, "Jewels of Madonna".....
Wolf-Ferrari
"Pomp and Circumstance" .....Elgar

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS DRAWS CROWD

Harvard Night, long an annual feature of the Pop concert season, drew to Symphony Hall last evening an audience that filled every possible nook and corner of the hall. The Harvard Glee Club, conducted by Dr Davison, sang two groups of numbers, which were cordially received. George Renwick, a member of the Glee Club roused great enthusiasm by his beautiful singing of the tenor solo in an arrangement of the Irish folk song, "The Foggy Dew." A Harvard composer, Walter Piston, now an assistant in the Division of Music at Harvard, conducted the orchestra in the performance of his own prelude. Mr Jacchia included "Our Director" among his encores.

The combination of prohibition with a program containing very little music of the sort that can be called "popular song hits" produced a change in the atmosphere. Harvard Night of old used to be far more lively and boisterous an occasion than last night's decorous entertainment proved. Yet one doubts whether audiences in the old days really had a better time.

There were no banners or other decorations in honor of the occasion except a "Harvard" in crimson lights at the back of the stage which was not lighted until the Glee Club were on the stage for their first number.

Mr Jacchia's numbers were from composers like Liszt, Verdi, Wagner, Massenet and Tchaikovsky, for the most part. An orchestra larger than of old played them all with more finish and more spirit than used to be displayed at these concerts. And nearly everybody in the audience kept still and listened while the music was going on.

There are those, however, who would welcome a few of the works of such deservedly popular composers as Jerome Kern, Irving Berlin, Zez Confrey and George Gershwin at the Pops, if the problem of arranging them for this orchestra, which differs markedly from a jazz orchestra, could be solved.

The Glee Club sang with the clarity of enunciation, beauty and power of tone, and smoothness of style which now make them preeminent among amateur choruses. A lively chorus from Sullivan's "Gondoliers," the Scotch song, "The Hundred Pipers," Morley's "My Bonnie Lass" and Brahms' "Marching" gave especial pleasure. The football song final encore particularly pleased one faction in the audience.

Mr Piston's prelude won enough applause to recall him twice. It is well written and capably scored music, derivative from Wagner and from the modern French and English schools. There is an effective climax and a skilful use of modal harmonies in an ecclesiastical interlude.

"Fair Harvard," as usual, closed the evening. Mr Jacchia has arranged attractive programs, all of them open to the public for the remainder of this week. For Memorial Day there is a special holiday program. Saturday night John C. Mullaly, who conducted the first American performance of "The Pirates of Penzance" and many other early performances here of Gilbert and Sullivan operas, will conduct a group of numbers by Sullivan.

HARVARD NIGHT AT POPS CONCERT

Glee Club Gives an Entertaining Program

The program at the Pops concert last night was headed "Harvard Night." It might with propriety have been called "Glee Club Night"—and of course "Glee Club" hereabouts means but one thing—the Harvard Glee Club and its famous conductor, Dr. Davison.

The Glee Club sang, officially, eight numbers: "Morning Hymn," King; "Marching," Brahms; "Mother Moscow," Tschaikowsky; "My Bonnie Lass," Morley; "In Harvest Time," Merikanto; "The Foggy Dew," Irish folk song; "The Hundred Pipers," Scotch folk song; chorus from "The Gondoliers," Sullivan. It added unofficially, one football song. In modern parlance, it all "went over big," not leaving behind even a single note by the spirited and sympathetic pianist. The Irish folk song is in reality a tuner solo with a hummed accompaniment by the club. It was sung by George Renwick, who has a voice with marked possibilities.

The rest of the Pops program was made up of the usual favorites, albeit some of the most time-worn ones.

The hall was filled, as always on Harvard night, but the festive air of Harvard nights of older days was absent. To be sure, there was the word "Harvard," illumined with crimson lights, over the stage, and there flitted between the tables gentle waitresses with mint-bedecked crimson refreshment. But many things were among the missing—the Harvard banners that decorated the balconies (at least at the concert's beginning), the crimson and other color streamers, the intermittent cheering, the laughter and many another item that contributed to memorable Harvard nights. Alas, the occasion has grown impersonal, formal—or should one say "perfunctory"? At any rate, serious.

H. L.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Post May 25

First Leader of the 'Pirates,' Hub Man, to Conduct Pops

John C. Mullaly, 77, Led Orchestra at 16---Gives New and Intimate Stories of Great Musicians

Shiver and shake and shimmy! . . .
Wiggle and wobble and waltz! . . .
That's the way NOT to conduct an orchestra.

John C. Mullaly of Dorchester, is 77 years old, plays regularly in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (and for 39 years past) and is its oldest member of the organization in years. Because he conducted its first performance of the "Pirates of Penzance" in America, he will conduct the Pops orchestra next Saturday when it plays selections from the Gilbert & Sullivan operas.

In an interview for the Sunday Post this accomplished veteran, whom Monteux considers one of the most valuable members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells of his experiences.

He has a fund of "yarns"—intimate, funny and idol-smashing.

By J. R. Milne

John C. Mullaly

A glance at Mr. John C. Mullaly emphasizes the gradually growing conviction that a musician, to be a good musician, does not have to wear a queer floppy hat over long hair, nor a Bohemian tie, nor a baggy suit, nor betray any of the host of eccentricities that joke magazines insist a fiddler must possess.

True, he wears a bow tie, but you'll find one of these decorating the neck of many a banker, butcher, or shoe salesman even in this day of the flowing four-in-hand.

His face is not thin, pale, and "artistic." Just the opposite. It is an exceptional face, rough-hewn and strong, but it is not the sort of face commonly associated with a dreamer.

Mr. Mullaly is impressive on several counts. First of all, the face: it commands attention. The eyes sparkle and flash. And the eyebrows—striking, but not easily describable—tell of the power behind the flash.

PLAYED AT 15

Most impressive of all is his age, and his physical denial of that age. He was born in 1847, which makes him 77 or thereabouts. He doesn't look it. You'd give him 60, or 65, reluctantly, but you wouldn't believe the 77.

Mr. Mullaly came to America from Newcastle, England, when he was six years old. When he was fifteen years old he joined "Gilmore's Band," a Salem organization famous everywhere. At 16, first violin, he led the band.

When he joined Gilmore's Band he also had another job. He was orchestra leader at the Old Tremont, managed by Mrs. Julia Barrowes.

"I sat on a high stool," he said, "and played my violin as leader. Of course, it wasn't what you would call a symphony orchestra! The theatre didn't go in for opera; it was all comedy.

"Those were glorious days. In New York the world's most famous musicians were to be seen each season. There was the Italian opera, the French opera, and the German opera. The original productions, with the same singers who had sung the roles in Europe—Nielssen, Capoul, Mario—all the great names of the old days.

"In the early seventies I conducted the orchestras at the Globe (in Arthur Cheney's time), was first violin at the Boston Theatre for Nate Lothian, and at the Music Hall. For a long time I was at the Hollis. And I've played everything from Wagner to burlesque."

Mr. Mullaly was conductor of the Pops in their second season, 1886, when it ran for four months. He conducted the orchestra at the Newport Casion for 27 summers, and pleased the ears of the Vanderbilts, Havemeyers, and Belmonts of those days.

In 1885 he began his work with the Symphony Orchestra—work that he has stayed with, off and on, ever since.

The first American performance of "Pirates of Pensance" took place in 1888. An English troupe came to America, and Mullaly, first violin, was the only American in it.

Sullivan Great

In addition to himself there was an English conductor.

But he didn't stay. One day he said to Mr. Mullaly: "You can handle the job better than I can. No sense of my staying!" And back he went to England, leaving the first violin 'n command.

[illegible] Sullivan. Mr. Mullaly says:

"There are people who scoff at Gilbert and Sullivan. And yet I say that these two men gave more pleasure and entertainment to more people of all classes than almost any others in history! Some scoff at Sullivan, as they scoff at Offenbach. And it is not just.

"We do not know Offenbach well in this country. Most of his best works are unknown to us. I know of at least one score, 'Robinson Crusoe,' that is worthy to stand beside the 'Tales of Hoffman.'"

Then he spoke of conductors.

"Orchestras have changed greatly since my youth. They have grown larger. They have new instruments. In the old days a large orchestra would have four horns. Now it has eight. It would have 12 first violins; now it has 16.

"Our playing was limited. There are scores today that we could not have played then. New instruments have come to make the playing of these scores possible.

"Frenzied Conductors"

"And as for conductors—Well, Tom Lawson wrote a book some time ago called "Frenzied Finance." Today we have what I call the frenzied conductor. Not all of them, mind you. But even one of these is too many!

"You see them before their orchestras . . . Their very bodies quiver as they wave the baton; the left hand moves sinuously, like a snake; and the baton itself!

"And when the orchestra has finished the frenzied conductor bows to the audience, and how they applaud.

"'Oh, he is wonderful!' they say to each other. 'What force! What personality! His whole heart and soul are in every note!'"

Mr. Mullaly chuckled. "It may be so. Perhaps heart and soul are in every note. But there is no need for his frenzy."

And he told me of the rehearsals. Here the conductor tells his men just how he wants them to play. When rehearsals are over, and the performance is on, the men are supposed to know themselves what to do. And why, therefore, is it necessary for a conductor to go into frenzies.

"I suppose," I broke in. "To any one with a knowledge of music and a sense of humor it must seem much the same as if the prompter in a theatre were set on the stage in full view of the audience."

That was was about it, he admitted. Music is for the ear, not for the eye. A conductor does not show his great work when his men play for an audience, but in the long, hard hours of rehearsals, when he instructs them.

"Muck was not a frenzied conductor," he said. "Nor Monteux, nor Gericke, nor Nikisch.

Lays Down Baton

"Many a time I have seen Dr. Muck lay down his baton while the orchestra was playing. He would just stand and look. His eyes would rove, and with his eyes he could direct that orchestra.

"It was the same with Bruno Walter. He did not need to use the baton. He did not work into a frenzy to make the audience believe that he was, himself, squeezing the last bit of power out of a man. He had done that already, in rehearsal.

"Gericke was a drill master. He was a hard man to work with, but he achieved results. And when he left he had built up a wonderful organization for the next man, Nikisch.

"Nikisch was not a drill master. But he was perhaps the best, most talented, and most natural leader of the orchestra. How much credit for the splendid performances the orchestra gave under his leadership is due to Gericke no one can estimate. Certainly the orchestra would not have done such good work under Nikisch if Gericke had not preceded him to build it up.

"Koussevitsky will come to succeed Mr. Monteux. And Mr. Koussevitzky will find a Boston Symphony Orchestra as fine as any of other years. He will find, I think, that he brings just one thing to us: Russian music. We have the rest; we have learned it."

Speaking of the frenzied conductor, Mr. Mullaly recalled one time when he had witnessed one in action, and had heard the comment of a player.

Leader Led!

While the conductor waved his hands, swung his baton, and shimmied his shoulders, making many of the audience believe that they were witnessing a masterpiece of orchestral directing, a violinist said:

"He's following the boys tip-top!"

And that is what many an orchestral player says about the frenzied conductor. Their playing is giving him a chance to show-off. He's not leading them, but following them, and drawing a fancy, fantastic decoration about their work.

The effect of a frenzied conductor on an audience is one thing. The effect of a great name is another, but has the same effect.

